Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): Although the Minister would not give way, there is sufficient time in this debate to emphasise what I was trying to say in my intervention. He said that he was committed to BBC World, but he also said that he should have no influence on or interest in BBC World. He did not show any practical commitment to it; we have heard only soft words.

The Minister said that the 1988 decision had been vindicated, but this debate would tend to suggest that it has not been. He must think carefully about the way in which this country projects itself abroad. BBC World is an integral part of that image. It and the BBC World Service provide the same service, but on different platforms and using different technologies.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) rightly said that the way in which Britain projects itself abroad, through the British Council and the World Service, pays dividends in all sorts of ways, and that many benefits are returned to our economy. If we project our culture, methods and society abroad and engage foreign countries effectively, we can develop industries and other commercial activities on the back of that success.

Mrs. Gillan: In the time that remains, I must stress that the Minister was disingenuous in the way in which he—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member has already spoken once. We should at least give the Minister the opportunity to say the odd word.

11.29 am

Mr. Hain: I want to respond to the comments of the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith), who seemed to suggest that the service was going downhill and collapsing. It now reaches 150 million homes in 200 countries, and BBC World television is going from strength to strength. It does so with the Government's active support and backing.

This morning, we discussed a decision about which hon. Members and I are concerned. BBC managers say that the decision was taken in order to protect the BBC's competitive position in relation to audience reach. Hon. Members are free to disagree, and have disagreed, with that decision.

The idea that the Government are turning their back on BBC World television or radio services is a total travesty. We give more support to the BBC than has been given previously; we back the service in every way that we can, and we shall continue to do so. Our debate will allow BBC managers to take account of the real concerns that have been expressed about BBC World television. No doubt, they will want to reflect on the points that have been made. I shall happily meet them but—if I may be forgiven for putting it this way—I cannot accept lectures from the Liberal Democrats, and certainly not from the Conservatives, who spent year after year attacking the BBC's domestic and international services. An unrivalled expansion of the BBC World Service and of BBC World television occurred under the present Government, and we shall continue—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now move on to the next debate.

Benzodiazepines

11.30 am

Mr. Phil Woolas (Oldham, East and Saddleworth): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for the privilege of opening this debate. This is the first time that I have spoken in the new Chamber. Westminster Hall is not bad as lean-tos go. I shall be grateful for your guidance.

The debate has been given weight by the recent report of the Select Committee on Health on procedures related to adverse clinical incidence and outcomes in medical care. I draw that report and the evidence gathered by the Committee to the attention of hon. Members.

The story of benzodiazepines is of awesome proportions and has been described as a national scandal. The impact is so large that it is too big for Governments, regulatory authorities and the pharmaceutical industry to address head on, so the scandal has been swept under the carpet. My reasons for bringing the debate to the Chamber are numerous and reflect the many strands that weave through the issue.

I was first alerted to the matter when a constituent, Mr. Barry Haslam, wrote to me describing the nightmare in which he has lived as a result of having taken benzodiazepines. He was prescribed Ativan—one of the family of benzodiazepine drugs—for 10 years. As a result, he suffered permanent brain damage, hearing and thyroid problems, fatigue and mood swings, bad circulation, pains in his limbs, slurred speech and memory loss so severe that he cannot remember the past 10 years of his two daughters' growing up: he has lost 10 years of his life. He and other members of the Oldham Tranx support group would have been here today had that been possible.

There are good days between the bad days for the victims of tranquilliser addiction. Like many others of the Victims of Tranquillisers group, Barry is a campaigner. My first impression was that he was a member of the green spidery ink brigade—he bombarded me with letters, documents, quotations and research that he and others had painstakingly eked out of officialdom. However, my constituent is not an obsessive, but a highly intelligent and articulate man with enormous courage and a loving wife who has supported him throughout his campaign. He is a victim of damage to his brain caused by years of heavy dosages of benzodiazepines. There are in this country many thousands of similar cases in which harm has been done, not only to individuals who take the drugs, but to the children of mothers addicted to benzodiazepines while pregnant.

I have permission to cite the case of Mrs. Jackie Gillard, a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith). Mrs. Gillard wrote to me:

> "My life is in the pits. I am unable to go out. I get panic attacks. I go to bed and ask God to let me die in my sleep."

Mrs. Gillard's is an especially difficult situation, as her two sons also appear to be victims of the addiction.

Angela Smith (Basildon): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for having given way; I want not to detract from his excellent comments, but to place on record my gratitude that he has mentioned my constituent.

I have been distressed by the letters that I have received from my constituent on the matter, in which she details not only the impact of the drugs on her, but the effect on her family. She could not even attend her father when he died in hospital, because she could not go out. I ask my hon. Friend for his comments on something else that she has said:

"Life just frightens me every day."

Mr. Woolas: I have received correspondence from hon. Members on both sides of the House describing awful and heart-rending cases such as Mrs. Gillard's from round the country. Recent media interest includes documentaries by the respected "You and Yours" programme on Radio 4 and Tyne Tees Television, and numerous television and radio news reports supported by press reports.

Evidence submitted to the Select Committee by Dr. Peart, national co-ordinator of Victims of Tranquillisers, details the story of benzodiazepines for the past 40 years. In his introduction to that evidence, he says:

"the catalogue of misprescribing, misdiagnosis and mistreatment . . . has cost this country billions of pounds."

The side effects of benzodiazepines are not widely known, despite publicity. Patients are not given the full information about the side effects and are, therefore, unable to make an informed choice. My constituent, Mr. Haslam, would never have taken the drugs had he known the problems that they cause, despite the difficulties that they were originally intended to cure.

As early as 1980, a report in this country on the use of benzodiazepine-based drugs suggested that they were effective for only 10 days, after which they were no longer effective against the wide variety of problems for which they were originally prescribed. It is now an established fact in the medical profession that it takes only seven to 14 days for addiction to take hold of someone taking benzodiazepines. The problem is twofold: the addiction and the paradoxical side effects.

Guidelines on the prescription of benzo-based drugs suggest that patients should be closely monitored while using them, but that does not happen in practice. Patients are able to obtain repeat prescriptions of the medicine without seeing a health care professional, which can lead to patients being prescribed benzos for many years without being offered an opportunity to lower the dosage or try alternative treatments.

There are many problems related to the drugs beyond addiction and side effects. They can have catastrophic effects on children born to women prescribed them, such as congenital defects, and physical and mental handicaps; there is evidence that they can cause attention deficit disorder and autism. Increasing problems related to the black market and street use of benzodiazepines are emerging. In 1996, the previous Government made the benzodiazepine Halcion illegal. However, there is an increasing street market in other benzodiazepines: Rohypnol—the date rape drug—is a benzodiazepine. Benzodiazepines are increasingly used and abused with alcohol and opiate-based drugs.

The group that campaigns for action on the issue claims that there has been a contravention of the Medicines Act 1968 by drug companies producing these pharmaceuticals. It is claimed that they knew about the cases of addiction, toxicity and side effects before the drugs were even licensed. The Journal of the American Medical Associations reported the problems as early as 1969. The Department of Health must increase its funding of research into the after effects and consequences of the drugs.

My constituent, Barry Haslam, has permanent neurological damage and other disabling conditions, yet he has recently been refused disability living allowance, which he had received for many years. On most days, he would fail all seven tests for mobility allowance and all four tests for care allowance, but on other days he is perfectly articulate and able to look after himself, get about and hold down part-time work, were any available.

The issue also concerns the Department of Social Security, which must urgently improve the disability benefits handbook on the matter. I remind hon. Members that MIND estimates that 1.2 million people are affected by addiction to benzodiazepines. For 20 years or so, benzos, including Valium, Ativan and Lorazepam, were fashionable drugs. They were prescribed in abundance on both sides of the Atlantic and considered to be the cure-all for depression, sleepless nights and a range of problems thought to be associated with the modern world. However, it took more than 25 years for United Kingdom medical authorities to issue guidelines, and it was not until 1988 that the committee on review of medicines toughened up the prescription guidelines for general practitioners.

In 1979, some 30 million prescriptions for benzos were issued in this country. Drug manufacturers, led by the company Roche Products Ltd., launched an onslaught on the medical profession, including 1,000 visits a week made by company representatives to general practitioners. Despite the 1980 review, prescriptions continued to be issued at similar levels throughout the 1980s. Even today, on the latest figures available, MIND estimates that 16 million prescriptions are issued each year. The drugs are being prescribed to one in four adults, to women more commonly than to men—indeed, twice as often. More than 1 million pensioners take benzodiazepines every night, supposedly to help them sleep. Despite the weight of evidence from both sides of the Atlantic and the current guidelines on prescriptions, no victim from those 20 to 30 years has ever been compensated. All collective legal actions have been withdrawn as legal aid licences have ended. A solicitor of Drummond Miller of Edinburgh, a well-known law firm in Edinburgh city, described as impossible the fight that the campaign has waged against the "might of the multinational drug companies".

Indeed, in the United Kingdom, only one individual's legal case remains outstanding—and all power to his elbow.

I have no doubt that controlled and time-linited use of benzodiazepines can bring enormous relief to some patients. However, 40 years after their introduction, 30 years after the first warnings, and 10 years after the UK authorities put on the brakes, they remain commonplace and are still prescribed above the recommended level. The blight on our streets is getting worse. Home Office statistics show that such class C drugs are now a commonplace commodity in the street market. In the past three months in my constituency, benzos have been the target in two burglaries of pharmacies, and there are hundreds of such cases throughout the country. The 1998 Home Office statistical bulletin shows that, from 1990 to 1995, 1,602 deaths were directly related to benzodiazepines, including 683 suicides. In the same period, 218 deaths were linked to heroin, and 483 to methadone. That is the scale of the problem.

In a recent Home Office pilot project undertaken in five locations throughout England, 61 per cent. of people arrested tested positive for drugs, one fifth of whom—12 per cent. of the total—tested positive for benzodiazepines, compared with only 10 per cent. for crack and cocaine combined and 8 per cent. for methadone. The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs has recommended the introduction of additional controls on the import, export and possession of benzodiazepines, which, according to parliamentary written answer No. 93720, the Home Office is "actively considering". I believe that, in the lexicon of Sir Humphrey, "actively considering" means "probably". Let us hope that the Home Office acts forcefully and quickly.

We need joined-up policy. Leading academics on the subject have presented evidence to the drugs tsar, Mr. Keith Hellawell. We need recognition of the harm done to thousands of people, robust guidelines that are forcefully promoted and a review of the classification of benzodiazepines. We need stringent support for addicts in the NHS, social services and the voluntary sector, to ensure that the withdrawal from such drugs is beneficial and does not increase the pain and suffering of many addicts. The problem of benzodiazepines is an iceberg, involving, according to accepted figures, 1.2 millon people addicted as a result of over-long prescription of the drugs. It involves an increasingly dangerous street trade and a level of ignorance and lack of awareness that is perpetuating the problem rather than solving it, 40 years after the first warnings of the effects of Valium.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth (Mr. Woolas) on having raised this important issue. I assure him and my hon. Friends the Members for Basildon (Angela Smith) and for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn)—he takes a close interest in such matters—that we treat the issues raised extremely seriously, and have no intention of sweeping them under the carpet.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth said, a great deal of research has been conducted and much has been written on the topic over the past 25 years or so. In the past three years, the Medical Research Council has commissioned more than £1.5 million-worth of research into benzodiazepine use. The largest project, which is worth more than £1 million, deals specifically with benzodiazepine addiction.

Based on the findings of existing research, current advice from the Committee on Safety of Medicines is in the British National Formulary, which as my hon. Friend will know, is distributed regularly to all doctors. It states clearly that benzodiazepines are indicated for the short-term relief of anxiety that is severe, disabling or subjecting the individual to unacceptable distress, occurring alone or in association with insomnia or short-term psychosomatic, organic or psychotic illness. The use of benzodiazepines to treat short-term mild anxiety is now considered inappropriate and unsuitable. The Committee on Safety of Medicines advises that benzodiazepines should be used to treat insomnia only when it is severe, disabling or subjecting the individual to extreme distress.

My Department has taken several measures to support the appropriate use of such drugs, a matter to which my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth referred in his thoughtful and well-constructed remarks. We recently published a new national service framework for mental health services, in which we spell out national standards for mental health, taking into account mental health promotion, primary care, access to services, effective services for people with severe mental illness, and other issues. Of particular relevance to this debate is that primary care services in the national service framework are required to work with specialist care providers to develop and implement assessment and management protocols for several mental health problems, including anxiety disorders, for which benzodiazepine is prescribed. Those protocols will draw on the best available evidence and will help to establish proper consistency in managing such conditions throughout the country.

My Department has also been focusing on preventing addiction or dependence from ever occurring, by warning GPs and other prescribers of the potential side effects of prescribed medicines and in particular of the dangers of addiction to benzodiazepines.

My hon. Friend raised the issue of the side effects of pregnant women using benzodiazepine. I understand and am currently advised, that there is no proven link between benzodiazepine use and damage to developing foetuses. Current advice is that all drugs should be avoided in pregnancy if at all possible. The Government keep the issue of benzodiazepine use in pregnancy under close review, as we do the use of other drugs, through organisations such as the Advisory Council on Drug Misuse.

Doctors have an ethical responsibility to inform patients about any treatment proposed, including possible side effects of prescribed medicines. It is the responsibility of health authorities to ensure that adequate prescribing controls are in place. Conspicuous poor prescribing would result in disciplinary action from either the health authority or the General Medical Council. The use of clinical audit and peer review has also provided a powerful incentive for local clinicians to study their patterns of care and improve prescribing standards, which is now part of the Government's clinical governance agenda.

The Department funds a number of publications that provide up-to-date information on a variety of treatments. Those are made readily available to GPs, pharmacists and other health professionals. As my hon. Friend will know, the British National Formulary is published by the British Medical Association and the Royal Society of Great Britain and is issued every six months, free of charge to all GPs, pharmacists and other health professionals. The medicines resource centre publishes a monthly bulletin giving up-to-date information on the treatment of various conditions and the drugs involved in such treatment.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Does my hon. Friend agree that our knowledge of the chemistry of the brain is in its infancy, and that the rash, vast over-prescribing of benzodiazepines has done damage that dwarfs all that done by illegal drugs, as my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth (Mr. Woolas) made clear? We are repeating those experiments now with the prescription of Prozac and Ritalin. Ritalin is prescribed to 2 million children in America. Should we not tell pharmaceutical companies that they should not be allowed to use dangerous drugs with unknown consequences in an experiment that serves not the public's need, but companies' profits?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. Of course, the subject of the debate is benzodiazepines, but he raises the subject of Prozac. I am quite happy to correspond with him about his concerns, or he could come into the Department and discuss them with officials and with me. If possible, I would like to confine my remarks today to the issue of benzodiazepines.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody): Order. That is indeed the subject to which the Minister must confine his remarks.

Mr. Hutton: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am trying hard to do so, tempting though my hon. Friend's intervention is.

In addition to the literature available to GPs, most health authorities employ professional advisers, both medical and pharmaceutical, whose role is to provide another source of advice and information on medical and prescribing issues to GPs in the area. Those arrangements have had tangible success in the sense that the number of prescriptions for tranquillisers continues to fall. That focus on preventing people from becoming dependent on these drugs has resulted in the number of prescriptions of benzodiazepines dispensed in the community falling steadily from more than 20 million in 1985 to a little more than 13 million in 1998, which is lower than the figure quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth.

The volume of benzodiazepine prescribing in the community is monitored and has this year been included as a national indicator of performance of the national health service through the performance assessment framework. That should allow health authorities to compare how they perform against national averages, and to benchmark themselves against similar organisations within the NHS, so as to identify where they can improve their performance. The monitoring of prescriptions of benzodiazepines is further developed in our recently published national service framework. Local clinical audit programmes are being asked to focus on prescribing rates for a range of drugs, including the benzodiazepines. As the mental health minimum dataset, which is being piloted, is rolled out across the country, the prescription of benzodiazepines will be monitored in relation to hospital, as well as community, prescribing. I hope that my hon. Friend welcomes that.

What have we been able to do to tackle dependence on these drugs? Treatment may be offered in primary care or in more specialised settings. Clear advice is given in the British National Formulary that withdrawal of benzodiazepines from patients who have developed dependence problems must be gradual. In some cases, a withdrawal programme may extend over many weeks. It is important that people are well supported during the process and helped to develop other ways of coping with their anxiety, sleeplessness and other symptoms.

For those who have developed dependence on tranquillisers, treatment may be offered in primary or secondary care settings. Anxiety management, which may be provided on an individual or group basis, often includes a focus on cessation of usage of tranquillisers. Therapy in secondary care may be made available in clinical psychology departments by way of a day hospital or community mental health team. Counselling and psychotherapy are available on the NHS and form an important part of the range of medical and non-medical provision for people with mental health problems. All such issues are covered by the national service framework. We know that such treatments can be effective. They are increasingly popular and are in great demand. That is why we are committed to ensuring that the right treatments are delivered where they are needed most.

The Department issued "Drug Misuse and Dependence—Guidelines on Clinical Management" to all GPs in April. Those guidelines were written and peer-reviewed by experts. They give advice on treating misuse of a range of drugs, including benzodiazepines, and will reflect best evidence and knowledge of what works in treating drug misusers. For example, they contain advice on the best way to manage benzodiazepine withdrawal. Given that the only source of benzodiazepines is through diversion of prescribed medication, the guidelines stress to doctors and professionals the importance of appropriate and secure prescribing.

There are, of course, several organisations working to help people to overcome benzodiazepine addiction and that includes voluntary sector bodies. In 1994, the Mental Health Foundation produced an excellent publication entitled "Guidelines for the Prevention and Treatment of Benzodiazepine Dependence", which was aimed at general practice. It not only gives a summary of good practice in prescribing, but sets out a protocol in the management of benzodiazepine withdrawal. It remains as valid today as it was in 1994, and those working in general practice would be well advised to apply the principles that it sets out. The Mental Health Foundation also issued a booklet aimed at people who use tranquillisers, entitled "A Guide to Starting and Stopping Tranquillisers and Sleeping Tablets", which contains good, practical advice.

Apart from the Mental Health Foundation, I should like to mention the Council for Involuntary Tranquilliser Addiction. CITA aims to raise awareness of the problems of drug addiction and to support the withdrawal and rehabilitation of those addicted to tranquillisers. It helps to train doctors and other health workers in respect of benzodiazepine withdrawal, and provides support to a variety of health professionals. It does that by running 27 clinics in GP practices and by providing training through workshops, conferences and literature, as well as a helpline that is open five days a week. In addition, it provides a valuable resource for the media, fielding inquiries and providing information.

I mention that because my Department helped to maintain and consolidate CITA's helpline with funding of more than £30,000 over three years. In addition, earlier this year, my officials met representatives of CITA to discuss its current work programme and to see what further help we could give. I am pleased to say that CITA has now made an application for further assistance from next April to help to establish a number of clinics on Merseyside. That will build on its existing good work, most notably in Wigan and Bolton, and provide for face-to-face counselling coupled with the innovative use of natural therapies in helping patients to cope with withdrawal. I am not in a position to say today what the outcome of the application will be, but I hope that we will be able to include it in our wider programme of support for the voluntary sector.

I now want to concentrate on the concerns raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth about our part of the world, the north-west. He raised concern about the proportion of people attending drug misuse treatment in his constituency who report benzodiazepines as their main drug. Nationally, that proportion is relatively low—about 2 per cent. I understand that that figure is roughly the same in my hon. Friend's local health authority—the West Pennine health authority—and the north-west region as a whole.

Much more worrying is the proportion of people who report using benzodiazepines as a subsidiary or secondary drug. Nationally, that figure is about 16 per cent. I understand that the figure for the West Pennine authority is much higher, at about 40 per cent. That is also higher than figures for elsewhere in the north-west region.

I assure my hon. Friend that we are acting to reduce high levels of prescribing. For example, in the West Pennine authority, audits have been carried out of GP practices. In addition, the health authority intends to run a series of workshops aimed at primary care staff to inform the way in which they prescribe benzodiazepines. The West Pennine health authority plans to relaunch its guidelines for planned benzodiazepine withdrawal, and that will be fully audited to determine the success of GP withdrawal programmes. There will also be a review of the evidence for use of benzodiazepines by drug misusers to develop further guidance for GPs. As part of the Department of Health's north-west regional offices's performance review of its health authorities, benzodiazepine prescribing will be monitored very carefully.

I fully understand my hon. Friend's concerns about benzodiazepine prescribing in his constituency and I hope that he will be reassured about the action we are taking. The regional office and the health authority will continue to consider the issue closely in future. We are aware that, although a lot of good work is already under way, there is more to be done to ensure that everyone has access to the best possible services.

Although benzodiazepines will continue to have a place in treating short-term mental health problems, alongside counselling and other psychological interventions, I can assure my hon. Friend—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

12 noon

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): I am grateful to have this opportunity to raise the issue of public transport in south Gloucestershire, and in my constitutency of Northavon in particular, because the issue affects the quality of life of my constituents more than many others. Because Northavon is a mixed rural and edge-of-city constituency, car use is not a luxury, but a necessity in many cases. I frequently receive letters about public transport, so I am grateful to have the chance to draw the issue to the Minister's attention today.

At the outset, it is important to acknowledge and welcome what has been done during the past few years. Although I have many criticisms of the current situation, there have been some small steps in the right direction. We were grateful to receive funding through the rural bus grant scheme and the rural bus challenge scheme, which has funded some vitally needed community transport initiatives in south Gloucestershire. Those initiatives have identified an untapped demand and have been overwhelmed by interest from people who need those services, but have hitherto been unable to access them.

A preliminary skim—I confess to no more—of the Transport Bill suggests that its measures on bus services will be a modest step in the right direction. However, my contention is that the measures that have been taken, welcome though they are, are insufficient to deal with the scale of the problem. I shall talk about bus services in south Gloucestershire and say a few words about train services and rapid transit schemes to highlight my concerns, in the hope that the Minister can reassure me that the Government's strategy is adequate to deal with the scale of the problem.

One of my main concerns is that bus subsidy arrangements are not providing the taxpayer with good value for money, because bus companies have councils over a barrel. I shall give one example of how I believe that things have gone wrong. Recently, a new out-of-town shopping centre, The Mall at Cribbs Causeway, opened in my constituency. Many of my constituents shop or work there; one of the smaller private bus operators in the area spotted the potential for a new commercial route from Yate, the largest town in my constituency, to The Mall, and it set up a bus service. The dominant bus company spotted this and decided that it, too, would run a service along the same route. Before long the inevitable happened, and the first company was driven—almost literally—out of business.

The slightly sinister twist to the story is that the dominant bus company then decided that it could not continue to run the service either and told the council that it could not keep the service going. The council was then faced with the problem of shoppers who wanted to go to The Mall and workers who wanted to get to their jobs; both groups had established patterns of travel by bus. The council was faced with something similar to blackmail: either it could let the service die, with the result that the shoppers and workers would clog up the roads even more, or it could step in and provide subsidy. Sure enough, public money was found to subsidise what had previously been a commercial service.

Public money should be used to provide better bus services, but it is only lining the pockets of the bus operators. The inequality of power between the bus company and the local authority greatly concerns me. At the start of the process, the private operator decides which services it can run on a commercial basis. That leaves the council to identify from among the remainder routes where tendering is required, but that tendering process is almost a joke. In parts of my constituency, 80 per cent. of tenders go to one company, so there is one dominant group—the First Group, in various incarnations. That company knows that, if it does not identify a route as a commercial route, there is a good chance that the council will pay it to run a service on that route anyway. I am concerned that, in that way, money that should be used to improve services is being used to help bus companies.

What about the quality of services? There is a traffic commissioner, who, in principle, is supposed to keep an eye on such things. However, I am reliably informed that, if I were to say that he had a handful of inspectors in my constituency, I would be guilty of gross exaggeration. He does not have adequate resources to deal with the task. I am not convinced that public subsidy for bus services in south Gloucestershire is good value for money. I believe that to be is a legacy from the deregulation that took place 10 to 15 years ago. I accept that some modest steps in the other direction may have been taken, but I have reservations about whether those steps have gone far enough.

I have mentioned the rural bus grant, which I welcome, but it takes a long time to change people's patterns of travel, especially in rural areas. People move to rural areas in the knowledge that they can get to work by car, and the availability of a bus service for a year or two will not change that pattern. Only if people know that a service will continue, year in and year out, and be reliable and dependable, will they have the incentive to change their habits. Therefore, I should be grateful if the Minister would outline for south Gloucestershire's residents what the future holds for services provided through the rural bus grant when the money runs out. What will happen in two or three years' time? Will those services simply cease, or can my constituents base their travelling patterns on the assumption that the services will continue?

I understand the need for the rural bus grant to produce new services, but that rule has created some anomalies. I understand that money cannot be used for services that were in place on 1 May 1998, but that services started then and subsequently discontinued can be resurrected under the scheme. That creates an arbitrary distinction between services that are borderline—those which have been running for a few years and need to be kept going in the interests of the public transport infrastructure, but which cannot be supported through the scheme—and new services, for which there is not much demand, but which can be funded. I wonder whether that arbitrary cut-off date should be reconsidered.

Other arbitrary features of the scheme affect south Gloucestershire. The limit on communities numbering 10,000 or fewer has some odd consequences for my constituency. In neighbouring parishes, one can have a bus service and another cannot because of population density. In towns such as Thornbury, which is probably the second largest town in my constituency, the public transport network is poor. The area is rural, on any understanding of that term, but it cannot benefit from the grant. Clearly, there mut be a cut-off point, but I am not convinced that it has been drawn in the right place.

I should like to make one final observation on bus services before I move on to consider rail issues. The community transport support has been warmly welcomed. The Thornbury-Severn Vale link was opened by the previous Minister of Transport and, as I said earlier, demand for those services has been considerable. However, once again, we are faced with the question of what will happen in the long term. The money has bought the buses, hired the office and provided someone to run the scheme, but what is the future for the pensioners and disabled people who have become dependent on those services? In two or three years' time, will they still be able to go to their lunch clubs, visit their relatives or get to hospital? Some indication of the long-term position would be very valuable. I contend that people will change their behaviour only if they have security, predictability and reliability, and if they know that services will continue, rather than just exist for a while and then disappear. Indeed, the very act of taking away the subsidy at the end of a certain period demoralises people and causes them to think that they cannot rely on bus services.

I have dwelt at some lengths on buses because they are often seen as the poor relation of the transport network, but I want to touch on two other categories of local public transport. The local train services in my constituency—there are stations at Pilning, Severn Beach and Yate—are the Cinderella services. To give one example, when the rugby world cup was held in south Wales, trains were taken off the Severn Beach to Bristol line in order to take passengers to Cardiff. There is often a lack of investment in track and the quality of service is unreliable, so people give up using rail. Once people have given up using the railway, it is an almost impossible task to persuade them to come back. I hope, therefore, that the Minister will offer some reassurance that those local networks that are not mainline networks will have a key place in the future.

In that context, I must mention one issue that affects south Gloucestershire and many areas beyond, where a crisis is imminent. That is the threat by British Rail, or its successor, Rail Property Ltd., to sell off land adjoining stations and land that previously contained rail track. I understand that, in January 2000, 14 sites in south Gloucestershire may be sold off to the highest bidder. I should like to read from a letter from the public transport manager of South Gloucestershire council to the chief executive of Rail Property Ltd., sent in mid-November, in which the public transport manager expressed his concern. It states:

> "It appears . . . incongrous and . . . disappointing to a local authority that two different agencies of central government are working towards apparently diametrically opposite ends. One, the British Rail Property Board . . . has a remit to sell off former rail land to the highest bidder. The other, the DETR . . . has objectives of increasing use of the rail network (an objective which is clearly not helped if some of the most valuable land required to expand the rail network has been sold off for other development)."

Once that land is sold and there are houses on it, it will not be used for rail again and an opportunity will be gone. We need a clear steer from the Government, demonstrating that they are aware of the urgency of this issue and that they have it in hand. My local council's planning committee will meet on Thursday to consider the issue. All it can do to preserve those sites is to buy them at market value, but there is no money in the budget to do so, so what can it do? Must it watch the sites being sold and lose any hope of improving services, rather than withdrawing them? This is an urgent issue and I look forward to hearing the Minister's response.

Finally, I turn to the light rapid transit scheme from south Gloucestershire into Bristol, which has been a long-standing dream of many in the south Gloucestershire public transport sector—although a nightmare for others. Last year, I attended a presentation on that scheme. An experienced councillor said to me afterwards, "That was all very interesting, but I heard the same thing five years ago." People simply do not believe that it is going to happen. Trying to work out the Government's approach to this matter is akin to Kremlinology—we get a nudge here and a wink there. First, the new Government are assumed to be pro-public transport, then we hear that there is no money for light rail; now we hear that an area that might have road charges, such as Bristol, may get some money. We do not know what is really going on or when we will hear for sure. I would be grateful for a clear answer—whatever it is—so that we can plan local public transport services.

The problems I have described have deep roots. There is no overall strategy to address growth in road traffic in south Gloucestershire, yet still more houses are being built, still more people are moving in and dependence on the private car is increasing, not decreasing. I am unclear whether the Government's strategy for south Gloucestershire is that road traffic should fall, remain at current levels or rise by only a certain percentage; I am not even sure that they have said what their current strategy is. The pattern of development—that is, where houses and businesses are located—is reinforcing the pressure on the area's roads. I welcome what has been done so far, and we are grateful for it, but I feel that the scale of what has been done is not up to the scale of the problem. I hope that the Minister can convince me otherwise.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Keith Hill): I congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on securing the debate. I am grateful for his reference to the modest benefits and advances resulting from Government policies to date; I suppose that we should be grateful for small mercies.

Local public transport is a popular and topical theme; indeed, I was dealing with the same subject only yesterday evening in a debate introduced by the hon. Gentleman's west country colleague, the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Cotter). This debate is also timely in the light of last Wednesday's publication of the Government's radical and wide-ranging Transport Bill. The Bill is a significant step towards a safer, more integrated and better quality transport system. It puts into practice many of the measures that we set out in our White Paper on the future of transport, the first comprehensive Government statement on transport in 20 years, which we published within 18 months of being elected.

Before I discuss the provisions of the Transport Bill, I shall respond to some of the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised about transport in his constituency. I am sure that he will know that each local transport authority is now required to prepare a local transport plan setting out its transport strategy and the measures necessary to carry that strategy forward. The provisional local transport plan for south Gloucestershire is being assessed by my officials in the Government office for the south-west, so I must be careful not to comment on the merits of its proposals or to speculate on the likely allocation of resources. I can make some general comments on the plan, but before I do so, it is important to set the scene in south Gloucestershire.

I know that there has been a great deal of new development in the district over the past 20 years, particularly in the north fringe of Bristol. The result has been growing traffic congestion, a trend that South Gloucestershire council is anxious to reverse through a variety of measures designed to increase the use of public transport. The provisional local transport plan identifies a wide range of opportunities to improve public transport in the district, including a scheme—to which the hon. Gentleman alluded—to establish a light rail system from Bradley Stoke on the northern fringe of Bristol to the city centre. It is being promoted jointly by Bristol city council and South Gloucestershire council and is envisaged as the first in a network of such links across Bristol and the surrounding area. The scheme's estimated capital cost is about £102 million, some 60 per cent. of which is expected to come from the private sector. The preferred method of meeting the remainder is through the private finance initiative; both councils are seeking support for that from the Government.

A full assessment of all local transport plans is under way. All major schemes, including light rapid transit systems, are being considered on their transport merits and on how they are integrated with the plans' objectives and strategies. We expect to announce very soon a shortlist of projects that might be supported over the next five years. Although I am unable to give a commitment on this particular LRT proposal, the Government welcome Bristol's innovative approach, especially its interest in piloting a congestion charging system. Given the long-standing enthusiasm of the hon. Gentleman's party for congestion charging, I hope that the Liberal Democrat-led South Gloucestershire council will maintain its support for that proposal.

South Gloucestershire council has an evolving quality bus partnership, which is designed to improve the quality and quantity of bus services. In developing that partnership, the council will address issues of fares and through ticketing for multi-stage journeys. Work is also under way in the north fringe of Bristol to establish an infrastructure for bus priority junctions through the introduction of urban traffic control systems. That will lessen delays and enable more accurate timetabling.

I recognise that conventional public transport cannot always meet the diverse accessibility needs of all in our communities. Voluntary action is the strength of local communities everywhere, so we are conducting a review of voluntary and community transport activity to gain a better understanding of the role played by the voluntary sector. We envisage parish councils in England as valuable partners in improving accessibility in rural areas. We would like them to take an increasing role in community transport and to use their powers to fund community bus services.

South Gloucestershire council is also working with Railtrack and the train operators to improve facilities and services and to investigate the potential for making better use of under-used rail infrastructure. In particular, the line to Severnside could be reinstated to service existing development at Cribbs Causeway. Interchanges between public transport and other modes form the key nodes of the transport system. By establishing and improving those interchanges, the council will try to achieve a more integrated public transport system with a greater focus within south Gloucestershire.

Mr. Webb: The Minister mentioned the route to Cribbs Causeway. That would go through Henbury, which is currently closed; moreover, it is one of the sites that the British Rail Property Board wants to sell off. Can the Minister tell me how the council might set about preventing that, given that there is no budget for it to buy the land itself?

Mr. Hill: I fully intend to address the issue of British Rail property in due course.

The council is committed to making information on public transport services readily available through a variety of media in a user-friendly format. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's concerns about bus services, I note that he welcomes the benefits that the rural bus grant initiative has brought to south Gloucestershire. The area has received nearly £200,000 through the initiative, which has produced 31 entirely new or improved bus services in country districts. One of the conditions of the new rural bus subsidy grant was that it could not be used to fund services that were running on 1 May 1998; in other words, it cannot be used to fund withdrawn services. Therefore, an operator threatening to withdraw a service could not expect to be rewarded by receiving a contract that is funded by a rural bus subsidy.

There might be cases in which an operator has to withdraw from a contract because it is no longer economic for it to provide the service under the terms of that contract. The 1 May 1998 rule for the rural bus service grant has caused some difficulties, but it is an important principle that new funding must be used to support new services. I do not apologise for that. Local authority associations were fully consulted on all the grant conditions and they specifically supported the 1 May principle.

The Government did not want the new money to leak into maintaining the status quo—for example, operators withdrawing services in the expectation of subsidy, or authorities with many conflicting priorities cutting their subsidy spending. However, we will consider whether the rules should be changed in future. The Government are carefully monitoring the effects of the rural bus grant initiative with a view to taking decisions in due course about its future operation.

[Mr. Hill]

Local bus services operate in a deregulated market: 85 per cent. of services are run by commercial operators and only 15 per cent. are subsidised by local authorities. It is for commercial operators to decide which services they wish to operate. Local authorities have the power to plug gaps, but we recognise that they often have to make difficult choices between conflicting calls on resources. The Government also propose to strengthen the powers of the traffic commissioners with regard to bus companies, as part of the new Transport Bill.

The hon. Member for Northavon expressed concern about developments on disused railway tracks. That matter has been considered by the Select Committee on Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs—a most distinguished Select Committee, if I may say so, Madam Deputy Speaker. As a result of the Committee's recommendations, we have taken steps to ensure that Railtrack, railway companies and local authorities will be kept informed of land sales, giving them the opportunity to acquire sites that could be used to re-establish the rail network.

The Government have now taken a major step in promoting a more integrated transport system through the publication last week of the Transport Bill. The centrepiece of the Bill is better public transport, which will offer more choice for motorists and for everyone else. The Bill contains radical measures designed to deliver the safe, modern, high-quality transport system that this country needs and deserves. These include promoting the use of railways through the Strategic Rail Authority, improving bus services and reducing road congestion and pollution. The Bill is the most comprehensive piece of transport legislation for 30 years.

The question of the apparent delay in introducing this legislation has been raised. However, there are no instantaneous solutions, and much preparatory work has been required to enable us to identify the policies needed to overcome the failures of the past 20 years. We inherited high and growing levels of road traffic congestion, poor public transport, inadequate provision for pedestrians and cyclists, and significant under-investment in road maintenance. Nevertheless, we have already made significant headway through increased investment, especially in public transport and road maintenance. The measures in the Bill pave the way for the modern, effective transport system that the country needs and deserves.

Mr. Webb: I sense that the Minister has moved away from the issue of the sale of rail-owned land. He said that the local authorities had been notified about the land sales. Certainly, they have been told that there is a threat of certain routes being sold off, and that they will never be able to use them, but what can they do about that?

Mr. Hill: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. However, we do not envisage local authorities acting unilaterally to acquire land that might be used for either rail or alternative public transport purposes. We certainly do not expect the full burden of any financial responsibility accruing from the acquisition of such sites to fall entirely or even largely on local authorities. The Government's committment in transport policy is towards partnership: we certainly expect local authorities to operate in partnership with private operators, developers and other interested parties in such disposals in future.

The Government recognise that motorists will not readily switch to public transport unless it is significantly better and more reliable. We also realise that we cannot achieve these measures unless we are prepared to put more resources into public transport. That is why the comprehensive spending review allocated a further £700 million over the next three years. We are also spending an extra £170 million on rural buses, which has so far resulted in an extra 1,800 new and enhanced services in England.

A key measure in the Bill is the establishment of the Strategic Rail Authority, which will make railway regulation more effective and make sure that the fragmented rail companies provide a decent national service. We also recognise that buses are crucial to the success of our integrated transport system and that they can provide a real alternative to car use. Local authorities will be given the tools necessary to develop quality public transport in their areas, and to tackle road congestion and pollution. The Bill will enable authorities and bus operators to deliver more through ticketing, higher quality buses, more frequent services and better information. About 130 quality partnerships have already been established on a voluntary basis with bus operators throughout the country, the result of which has been an increase in bus usage of between 10 and 40 per cent. in the areas involved.

To deal with congestion and pollution, the Bill gives local authorities new powers to introduce charges on congested roads and to introduce workplace parking charges. The money raised will be put back into improving local transport, improving choice and tackling congestion. We welcome the strong interest expressed by the city of Bristol in the opportunities offered by this scheme.

The Transport Bill will set the national framework, but the onus will be on local authorities to put the measures into practice. We believe that local people are best placed to find local solutions to local transport problems. The hon. Member for Northavon will be aware that we have introduced local transport plans as a centrepiece of our proposals. Those set out authorities' strategies for transport and are the key mechanism for pulling all local activity together. Authorities will also have to prepare a bus strategy and will be given powers to make effective changes to benefit bus passengers. Together, the local transport plan and the bus strategy will provide a solid basis for implementing integrated transport policies at local level.

As a first stage in this process, all county and unitary authorities have now submitted their provisional five-year transport plans, on the basis of which resources will be allocated for the next financial year. Authorities will then roll on their plans by one year and submit full plans next summer for the period 2001 to 2006. We are assessing the provisional plans and will shortly announce the allocation of resources for next year.

From the feedback that we have received so far, authorities seem to be responding positively to the challenge of producing local transport plans. They have overwhelmingly welcomed the national policy framework, and the process of preparing plans is acting as a positive force for change.

The Transport Bill now provides a solid framework for creating a more integrated transport system in this country. It will now be up to the local authorities to take measures forward. South Gloucestershire council is clearly committed to creating a more integrated transport system in its district. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that it is too early for me to speculate on the outcome of the local transport plan process in south Gloucestershire, but the position will become clearer when the allocations are made for the new financial year.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody): Order. As the hon. Member raising the next Adjournment debate is present, and the Minister is also with us, we shall now move on.

Methadone

12.30 pm

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): Rehabilitation centres have relied on methadone as the primary treatment for drug addiction from the national health service for almost 30 years. I believe that there is a place for methadone in the clinic. However, although it is commonly used in the treatment of opiate addiction, and its use is endorsed in "Drug Misuse and Dependence: Guidelines on Clinical Management", it is now widely recognised as a street drug in its own right. It was solely responsible for 48 deaths in a six-month period in 1998. Nearly 59 per cent. of those who died had obtained the drug illegally, demonstrating clearly the view that methadone now has its own street currency.

Methadone is implicated as a drug of misuse, often associated with other drugs, in more than 400 deaths a year in the United Kingdom. Many addicts have reported that they find methadone harder to give up than heroin.

In Scotland, the use of methadone as a treatment for opiate addiction has been hailed as a state-sponsored drugs plague. It appears that methadone has been misused and over-used as the only pharmaceutical method of treating opiate addiction. Therefore, why is methadone widely advocated in this country as the optimum method for the treatment of opiate addiction? There are a number of reasons, and cost is not among them.

First, an inadequate appraisal has been made of the research evidence available on methadone. Secondly, we are too accustomed to the drug. It has been prescribed for more than 20 years for the treatment of opiate addicts, and doctors are not encouraged to prescribe alternatives. There is a lack of will to change prescribing habits in the United Kingdom. If we are to reduce the number of deaths each year in which methadone is cited as the sole drug used, those habits must change.

In France, where Buprenorphine has been widely prescribed since 1996, the experience is different. Buprenorphine is the generic name for a drug branded as Subutex by Schering-Plough, which distributes the drug in the United Kingdom. It is a partial opioid agonist, unlike heroin and methadone, which are full agonists. The effect of that difference is realised in the treatment of opiate addiction. As a partial agonist, Buprenorphine decreases cravings for street heroin, tempers withdrawal symptoms and, importantly, negates any effect if street heroin is used simultaneously. It also carries a significantly lower risk of overdose, especially in polypharmacy cases.

By prescribing methadone alternatives, it is possible to save lives and encourage the rehabilitation of addicts. Since Buprenorphine was licensed in 1996 in France, the number of deaths from heroin overdoses has fallen year on year—from 336 in 1996 to 92 in 1998. Clearly, any pharmaceutical treatment must be given in the context of other therapy that helps addicts to sustain their treatment and find a new life for themselves. Even if the drug was administered in a multi-therapeutic context, a degree of success must still be attributed to the use of Buprenorphine.

However, the use of Buprenorphine is not clearly endorsed in the Department of Health clinical guidelines to which I referred. That is because of previous research highlighting the potential for its abuse, especially as the analgesic Temagesic. Although a degree of risk exists, it is comparatively less than that associated with the use of methadone. In France in 1997, six deaths occurred among the 49,000 people treated with Buprenorphine. There were more deaths in the same period among only 2,350 patients treated with methadone.

An economic gain can also be realised indirectly from the wider use of Buprenorphine, through a reduction in the need for health care and a reduction in the impact on the criminal justice system. Schering-Plough estimates the cost to the state as nearly £10,000 per addict per year, but the annual cost of treatment with Buprenorphine would be £2,000, with some added cost for additional suppport.

In France, 300 heroin addicts who were treated with Buprenorphine took part in a longitudinal study that demonstrated a 70 per cent. reduction in heroin use, a 25 per cent. improvement in housing and a 15 per cent. improvement in employment. Other indicators are available that demonstrate a shift to social re-integration—there was a 14 per cent. decline in drug dealing, a 7 per cent. decline in criminal activity and more than 40 per cent. of those who took part in the study reported improved personal relationships. Such a relatively small study easily demonstrates how effective treatment of opiate addicts can provide real benefits to the individuals concerned and society at large.

I should stress that Buprenorphine is not the only currently available alternative to methadone to combat opiate addiction. Indeed, two other drugs have been shown to be effective—laevo-alpha-acetylmethadol, which is commonly known as LAAM, and laevo-methadone. Unfortunately, those drugs are not licensed for such use in this country, although their efficacy is acknowledged in the clinical guidelines. LAAM is now licensed for use in Australia and the United States of America. Because the two drugs are longer-acting, it is claimed that they are much safer. They can also be administered orally, thereby minimising the injection culture and the consequent risk from hepatitis and HIV. As the new biotransformation process proposed by a north-west research laboratory now significantly reduces the cost of production of LAAM and laevo-methadone, the two drugs offer not only a clinically effective but a cost-effective alternative to methadone. One thing is clear: we must stimulate primary research and clinical trials in this area. I ask the Minister to give his attention to that.

The French experience is remarkable but not unique. Another large study in New South Wales showed that LAAM and Buprenorphine are at least as effective as methadone, and safer. In the United States of America, a study of the two drugs conducted at the John Hopkins School of Medicine showed that heroin use could be reduced by 80 per cent. The market for methadone alternatives is improving all the time. In two years' time, Buprenorphine will be available in a form that includes Naloxone, which will greatly reduce any risk of overdose. It is estimated that 1,000 lives could be saved by the wider prescription of methadone alternatives such as Buprenorphine.

To prescribe Buprenorphine for the treatment of an opiate addict within the guidelines, however, a doctor must write 14 separate prescriptions for a fortnight's supply—one every day. That is because Buprenorphine, while licensed under the UK Medicines Control Agency and recognised by the clinical guidelines, is not included on the FP10 form used by general practitioners. Until it is included on that form, use of Buprenorphine will be unnecessarily hindered in this country. I ask the Minister to examine that issue urgently.

I applied for this debate in order to urge the Minister to widen the choice of drugs available for the treatment of opiate addiction, and to ask him to stimulate research into the discovery and use of other opiate substitutes that are safer than methadone. If the Government are to succeed in reducing drug misuse and associated criminal behaviour, they must take the issue of drug rehabilitation seriously. They must remove any barriers to choice, in a safe and supportive way, for addicts and health professionals who treat them. I look forward to the Minister's reply.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) on raising such serious issues, and on his thoughtful comments. I am aware of his personal interest in the issues and of the good work that he does as chairman of the all-party group on drugs misuse.

My hon. Friend will be aware that the Government take the issue of drugs misuse seriously. One of the key objectives of the Government's 10-year strategy, set out in "Tackling Drugs to Build a Better Britain", is to enable people with drug problems to overcome them and live healthy and crime-free lives. That is why we will have allocated, over the next three years, an additional £50 million to health authorities and more than £20 million to social services departments for the provision of effective treatment services. The aim of any treatment, ultimately, is to enable the patient to achieve the goal of abstinence. We recognise, however, that drugs dependence is a chronic, relapsing condition, and that patients will need support, at times, when they relapse into drugs misuse after periods of abstinence. As my hon. Friend recognised, long-term methadone maintenance may help the patient to reduce or stop using illicit opiates.

Methadone is used internationally in the treatment of people who are dependent on opiates such as heroin. A substantial body of research supports the use of drugs such as methadone in managing dependence. For example, the national treatment outcome research study showed that both in-patient and community methadone programmes dramatically reduced patients' involvement in crime, and use of heroin and other illicit drugs. Furthermore, about one fifth of those on methadone abstained from opiates after two years' treatment. That shows that some drug misusers who enter methadone substitution programmes can abstain and are not necessarily maintained on the medication for long periods without reduction.

Prescribing should be seen as an enhancement of other medical and social interventions, rather than the sole treatment component. Support and advice on issues such as housing, education and training are important elements in enabling people to improve their lives and end dependence on illegal drugs.

We also recognise the other benefits of taking medications orally. As my hon. Friend noted, injecting behaviour, which is physically damaging, is reduced. In turn, that can reduce the spread of blood-borne diseases such as HIV and hepatitis B and C, which can be spread through sharing injecting equipment. Regular appointments with prescribing doctors and drug workers also keep drug misusers in contact with treatment services, and provide a better opportunity to meet their general physical and mental health needs. The 1993 update report by the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs concluded that "the benefit to be gained from oral methadone maintenance programmes both in terms of individual and public health and cost effectiveness has now been clearly demonstrated".

Much good work is being undertaken around the country to improve prescribing and dispensing practice. For example, we are aware of the four-way agreement in Berkshire, which links general practitioner, pharmacist, community drugs team and patient through a contract agreed by all the parties before any methadone is prescribed. The contract includes dispensing details such as supervised consumption and frequency of dispensing. The scheme is based on clear, commonly agreed protocols and a real partnership. It has at heart the needs of patients, but does not compromise the safety of the community and the professionals involved.

Although schemes such as this are very encouraging, we recognise that methadone is a powerful drug that, like any opiate, has addictive properties. Prescribing should not be undertaken without full assessment and regular reviews of the patient. Naturally, treatment should be tailored to the specific clinical needs of individual patients. That is why, in April, the Department of Health published "Drug Misuse and Dependence: Guidelines on Clinical Management", which guides all doctors on appropriate clinical interventions for drug misuse, including assessment, management of withdrawal and dependence, and prevention of relapse.

Those guidelines were drawn up by an expert working group and are based on a number of sources, including expert committee reports. We also took written evidence from professional bodies such as the Royal College of General Practitioners, the Royal College of Psychiatrists and the Royal Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. The guidelines were also peer reviewed, and all incorporated research was extensively examined.

The guidelines lay out the principles of safe and responsible prescribing to ensure maximum safety and benefit for the individual and the community. They state that, as a general principle, substitute drugs should initially be dispensed daily, which reduces the possibility of accidental overdose. In addition, they recommend the supervision of methadone consumption, which will help to prevent leakage on to the illicit market.

My hon. Friend referred to deaths linked to methadone and the percentage of people who obtain it illicitly, rather than on prescription. Although the figures are worrying, better prescribing and dispensing practices, informed by the clinical guidelines, will help to bring about improvements. Nevertheless, I assure my hon. Friend that we are not complacent about what is a serious problem.

In addition to the advice given in the clinical guidelines, £12 million was distributed to health authorities earlier this year from the drug misuse special allocation element of the modernisation fund. In using that money, priority was given to the introduction of supervised consumption schemes, particularly in community pharmacies. The nationwide implementation of those measures should substantially reduce methadone-related deaths.

There are also difficulties associated with attributing drug-related deaths to specific substances. As my hon. Friend will know, many deaths involve a mixture of drugs and alcohol, and it is not easy always to determine the relative quantities of different substances, or which was responsible for the individual's death. The reduction in injecting behaviour resulting from the use of such prescribed substitute drugs will help to reduce deaths from blood-borne diseases such as hepatitis B and C, in conjunction with other harm-minimisation measures such as needle and syringe exchange programmes. The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs prevention working group is producing a report on reducing drug-related deaths. Its findings will form the basis of a comprehensive action plan to reduce such deaths, which is a target of the drug strategy.

As my hon. Friend said, although liquid methadone is currently the most commonly used drug in maintenance prescribing, it is important that a full range of effective medications is available to doctors. We welcome the introduction and use of appropriate and effective new drug treatments, and we will carefully review evidence of their effectiveness. The clinical guidelines provided information on alternative opiates and other drugs used in treating drug dependence that were available at the time of publication, including Lofexidine, Naltrexone, LAAM and Buprenorphine.

With regard to reducing illicit drug misuse, criminality and risk behaviour, such as sharing injecting equipment, LAAM's results have been comparable to methadone. However, as my hon. Friend, who has a relevant professional interest and expertise, will know, it is a longer acting drug and can be dispensed less frequently. So far, it has not been licensed for use in the UK for opioid dependence, but it shows promise as an alternative form of treatment. Buprenorphine, however, was licensed in the UK last year for the treatment of opioid dependence. Trials suggest that it may have an efficacy similar to methadone 50 to 60 mg, and we are sure that it has a valuable place in the overall treatment of opioid dependence.

The Department of Health is actively considering including Buprenorphine in the list of drugs on the special prescription form to which my hon. Friend referred. That form enables doctors to prescribe the dispensing of drugs on one prescription in daily instalments for up to a fortnight. My hon. Friend asked me to consider prescription on an instalment basis, and the measure may lead to that. We anticipate a decision in the near future.

Like methadone, Buprenorphine is a powerful drug and not without its problems. It has potential for diversion and misuse, and it will not be suitable for all patients. It must be used carefully for patients with higher levels of opiate use, because it may precipitate partial withdrawal. It is also readily soluble, so dispensing must be carefully supervised to minimise the risk of injection. There is literature to suggest that, in other parts of the world, it has been used for injection.

My hon. Friend referred to the French experience with Buprenorphine. We understand that, on its introduction in France, there was considerable leakage on to the illicit market and substantial intravenous use. Furthermore, its use in the UK during the early 1980s resulted in similar concerns about safety and suitability. It is likely that only a relatively small percentage of patients who are currently treated with methadone would be treated instead with Buprenorphine, although some patients who are thought unsuitable for methadone may be suitable. However, we are pleased that another medication is now available to doctors in the treatment of drug dependence.

I assure my hon. Friend that we are not unaware of the importance of the issues that he has raised today, and we are looking at them carefully. He also asked for further research into other substitute medications in this country. There is a research base for LAAM and Buprenorphine, but most research has been conducted in north America, and we recognise the need for further research in this area in the UK. The United Kingdom deputy drugs tsar, Mike Trace, has confirmed that he will seek a meeting with the Medical Research Council to discuss research into alternative drug substitutes.

Although substitute prescribing has an important role, it should not be pursued in isolation. Drug dependence is a complex issue, and a full range of services should be available to meet all needs, including those of non-opiate users. Those services should include giving advice and information, needle exchange programmes, counselling, prescribing services and residential rehabilitation. Treatment should be carried out in a shared care scheme, involving specialists, general practitioners and other professionals such as community psychiatric nurses, pharmacists and general drug workers. That should ensure that all patients receive appropriate treatment and care, although we are aware that there are gaps in service provision in some areas of the country. That is why we have made an additional £70 million available to health authorities and local authorities over the next three years to enable the development of important new services across the country.

We are also concerned to maintain the quality of all treatment types. In addition to the clinical guidelines, the Department of Health has funded the substance misuse advisory service to produce a document entitled "Commissioning Standards for Drug and Alcohol Treatment and Care", which was published earlier this year. We have also assisted the Standing Conference on Drug Abuse in producing a set of quality standards for treatment services.

Providing good quality all-round treatment is key to the success of our strategy. It is probable that substitute prescribing will remain a key part of treatment for many drug misusers who are currently dependent on heroin. Methadone's effectiveness is proven, and we are taking seriously and acting on the problem of deaths linked to its use. Although methadone is currently the most commonly used drug, and will probably remain so, we appreciate the importance of making available a wide range of effective drugs, including Buprenorphine. We remain open-minded, and would welcome other new substitutes that are shown to be effective in the management of drug dependence.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eight minutes to One o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 8 December 1999

[MR. MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

Oil Fabrication

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Touhig.]

9.30 am

Mr. David Stewart (Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to deal with the important issue of the oil fabrication industry in the United Kingdom. First, I shall focus on the Barmac oil construction yards, some of which are located in my constituency. Hon. Members will be aware that more than 3,000 redundancies were announced in the yards. Secondly, I shall focus on the wider issues that affect investment decisions in the UK continental shelf. I am grateful that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Competitiveness in Europe will reply to the debate. She has an excellent level of expertise on the matter and chairs the oil and gas task force.

I understand that a number of hon. Members may want to contribute to the debate, especially my hon. Friends the Members for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran), for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) and for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor). I am sure that the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) and the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) will also wish to contribute, although that is a matter for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I shall begin with some of the background to the issues surrounding Barmac. As hon. Members may be aware, Barmac is a joint operation, involving Brown and Root and McDermot's. Those corporations are the only two to have survived in their present form since day one of the development of the UK oil fabrication sector. They operate in Ardersier and Nigg in the north of Scotland and their work force statistics will give some context to my points. In 1998, the work force numbered 6,000 people and this year the average work force is 3,500. The work force are skilled, well trained and well managed under the direction of Don Wright, the managing director. They have a comprehensive list of skills, from engineering to IT, fitting, welding, rigging, crane operation, scaffolding and painting.

Barmac's annual wage bill for the highlands and islands is approximately £85 million, which is a substantial sum for the region, and it is the largest private employer in my area and north of the central belt. The joint operation is also one of the largest private employers in Scotland and, interestingly, it is also the largest steel manufacturer in Scotland. Historically, as independent sites, the two yards survived an industry bedevilled by peaks and troughs. Barmac is the largest trainer of skilled labour in Scotland. More than 7,000 people have received training from it, in a variety of skills. Currently, more than 90 apprentices are involved in training.

Oil analysts predict that next year will be the leanest on record for downstream construction work. The immediate effect of such changes at Barmac has been the loss of 3,000 jobs. That loss is a tragedy for the work force and for the families who are facing a bleak winter without a wage or job. Both yards face the new millennium with the possibility of care and maintenance costs and near empty books, which may occur in particular towards the middle of next year. If Barmac were to close, the effect on the highland economy would obviously be disastrous. The gross domestic product of the highlands and islands is already less than the European and British averages, which triggered off the area's objective 1 status.

The management and work force have not been waiting for the crisis to happen. They have implemented the CRINE—cost reduction in the new era—regime. They have also opened a dry dock, which gives them a lot more flexibility and for which they had more than £3 million of objective 1 funds. The beauty of dry docks is their flexibility, especially for the construction of floating production vessels.

The management have sought new markets abroad, in Canada, Mexico, Norway and Denmark, and have considered diversification closely, especially in respect of the decommissioning of redundant rigs. Such decommissioning will be an important factor for the UK sector, especially post Brent Spar. The key issue is when it will come on stream. It may be some considerable time before substantial decommissioning work is available to the sector. The management and work force have also looked at renewables, which are very important for the future of the UK sector and not just for Barmac. I refer in particular to wind and wave power.

The campaign to generate new work is very different from that which occurred in the early 1990s, especially for Barmac. In the early 1990s, the game plan was to ensure in the UK continental sector that work went to UK yards rather than to allegedly highly subsidised yards in Spain and Italy. Now, matters are different, and there is little work in the UK sector. The campaign now is to convince the oil and gas companies to bring forward their exploration and drilling work.

What about the wider environment? First, how much oil is there? That is a difficult question to answer. Many seasoned observers, such as Dick Winchester, the director of technology at the Centre for Marine and Petroleum Technology in Aberdeen, estimate that between 4 billion and 4.5 billion barrels of oil remain to be developed. There are also between 80 and 180 undeveloped oilfields. The problem, inasmuch as one exists, is that the remaining fields are very small in the scale of things. Do small fields and large companies go together? Many companies have said that their strategy is to develop much bigger fields, such as the one that is to be developed in the gulf of Mexico. Shell has negotiated a deal in Iran and BP is known to be bidding for 50 licences in the same area.

I am concerned about the UK block leasing terms, which do not provide any incentive to accelerate development work, as ownership periods range from 30 to 40 years. The earliest licences expire in 2010. First, my right hon. Friend the Minister may wish to comment on whether changes should be made to the block leasing scheme to provide greater incentives for oil companies to invest in development in existing and new fields. Such changes may motivate companies to explore and drill.

[Mr. David Stewart]

My second practical suggestion is that we consider encouraging the establishment of new, smaller companies with fewer overheads and more manoeuvrability than their larger counterparts. Such an approach has worked well in the United States of America, where clusters of small companies have operated a small number of small fields. In the UK, such companies would, of course, benefit from lower corporation tax. Thirdly, I believe strongly that the UK has no national champion or flagship operator in the same way that Norway has Statoil and France has Elf and Total. Despite being free-market companies, those organisations are highly supportive of Norwegian and French industry and technology. I believe that every United States oil company is a United States champion.

I am pleased to have had the opportunity to initiate the debate, to which I know that several hon. Members will wish to contribute. I shall summarise some of my key points. I have faith in the UK fabrication sector generally and in the local Barmac yards. The yards have an excellent work force, are well managed and have world-class facilities. I regret the loss of 3,000 jobs, which is damaging to the fragile highlands and islands economy. I shall meet the major oil companies—Shell, BP, Texaco and Conoco—and my game plan is to bring forward exploration and drilling work. This morning, I met Dr. George Watkins, the chairman and managing director of Conoco and I thank him for arranging such an early meeting.

The investment decisions made by oil companies depend on a series of factors, such as the price of oil, accessibility and geology of fields, demand, level of resources and exploration costs. Perhaps the key issue is confidence. No one can force large companies to invest in the UK sector. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor kept his side of the bargain, as the fiscal machinery remains unchanged.

Perhaps it is now time for the oil companies either to use their licences or to lose them, although some people might say that I would say that. I want to quote from the September issue of Petroleum Review, which said:

"There is an established production infrastructure and a comprehensive construction capacity close to hand."

That is, in the North sea. It continued:

"There is a ready pool of skill, manpower, sympathetic government and regulation, and a ready market for all that can be produced. Taxation is low (the UK is the second or third most attractive regime in the world, Norway less so)."

We need to encourage smaller companies to enter the market, as in the United States, and to look at the development of a UK champion, as in Norway and France. Let us not forget about gas. Gas-fired power stations may prove to be an important factor and the Minister may wish to say something about the current moratorium on those.

The oil industry is a volatile, cyclical and global market, which has been dominated by multinational companies and the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries. However, the harsh reality is that decisions by oil companies to mothball exploration in the UK sector condemn thousands of highland workers to the dole over Christmas.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I congratulate the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) on securing this debate at this particular time because all of us, irrespective of our party-political allegiance, share a deep concern about the implications of events at Barmac and about the long-term future of the UK industry as a whole. We do not need to emphasise the scale of the problem in human terms and the manufacturing implications for the highland economy—the loss to the economy that will result from the closures, or at least the mothballing or care and maintenance, whichever term we care to use, of those yards. It is important to remember that the arguments for objective 1 status did not take into account the cyclical nature of the industry. If we revisited that argument now, we might be in a better situation.

I am sure that the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) and I share a sense of déjà vu because, on many occasions, he and I have taken part in meetings with Ministers, Adjournment debates and interventions on debates on this subject, throughout all of which we have tried to ensure a cohesive approach to this important industry, because it is the sole manufacturing industry in the highlands of Scotland. We were all proud of the work undertaken by Barmac in rationalising the yards at Nigg and Ardersier. I find it strange that people still tell me that there is an itinerant work force in those yards. Gone are the days of the Kishorn commandos. In the highlands, we have built up a skilled and dedicated work force, as we saw during the building of the turret for the Schiehallion field, one of the frontiers of the oil fabrication industry. We shall pay tribute to that skilled work force who live in our communities. I know only too well that, when Ardersier and Nigg are doing well, the small shops and hotels in the villages in my constituency do extremely well. When that purchasing power has gone, there will be a knock-on effect on the rest of the economy. In Moray, it is estimated that 500 jobs will go as a direct result of the announcements and that will have a knock-on effect on other sectors.

I am sure that we all wish to make this a contructive debate and that none of us wishes to score party political points. I want to raise one or two issues with the Minister, who chairs the oil and gas task force. Some of us have been arguing in the Scottish Parliament that there should be a general task force to consider the issue as it relates to the highlands and that the task force should include representatives from the oil industry. As the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber said in his opening remarks, it is important to involve the oil industry in discussions because it has the technical expertise—I do not pretend to be a technical expert in these matters. It is important that, in addition to involving local enterprise companies, Highlands and Islands Enterprise and the councils, we should include representatives from the oil industry, with their skills and knowledge, to talk this through. I should like a specific task force to be set up, as one was set up to deal with the problems at Continental in the Lothians and Kvaerner in Govan. That would reassure many people in the highlands, who still feel at times that they are regarded as being all tartan, haggis, sheep and granny's hielan hame, when, in fact, we have a skilled facility in our communities that we do not want to lose.

Such a task force should tackle some of the issues relating to research and development in the smaller fields. Much emphasis has been placed on the Clair field and how that might be developed. Can the Minister tell us what is happening with the Clair field development, what the time scale for that is and what the implications will be? Secondly, from her knowledge of the tax regime, can the Minister give some consideration to how some of these issues have been dealt with by the Chancellor? If we go back to the Finance Act 1997, we can see that the allowance for development drilling was then 100 per cent. If we could have an allowance of at least 100 per cent. for drilling, that might be an incentive to oil companies to consider giving work to our yards.

Thirdly, the royalty and tax system impacts harshly on projects in mature fields. A royalty relief, remission or reduced rate and/or some petroleum revenue tax relief for incremental projects, such as uplift on incremental investment or a petroleum revenue tax credit for such expenditure, could provide a reasonably cheap incentive. The gain in tax revenues from incremental projects might exceed the value of the tax reliefs. The Government would need permission to do that because the oil price is currently high, but I think that it would be extremely worth while in the context of the problem that we face.

In terms of dealing with the immediate crisis, at a meeting last week of all the Members of the Scottish Parliament with constituencies in the highlands and islands, the Scottish Minister for Enterprise and Lifelong Learning, indicated that resources would not be a problem if Highlands and Islands Enterprise, which is dealing with this with local enterprise companies, were to require additional resources. Perhaps that needs to be confirmed through Government Departments in England, because it is important. We want to put in place the structures that are necessary to retain the work force in the area. The Department of Trade and Industry and the Scotland Office must ensure that they work closely together, along with the Scottish Executive, to ensure that that will happen. Tomorrow afternoon, there will be a meeting at Ardersier with the Minister from the Scottish Executive and highlands and islands Members of the Scottish Parliament—I am unsure whether Members of Parliament have been invited—

Mr. David Stewart indicated assent.

Mrs. Ewing: The hon. Gentleman says that they have. I wonder what input the Department of Trade and Industry and the Scotland Office have made to that.

We do not need to emphasise the scale of the problem in personal and humanitarian terms. We should like a long-term structure for the yards in our constituencies—the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber and I have argued that case long and hard. I know that there is a problem in the United Kingdom because skills are being sought elsewhere in the world, but we have a responsibility, as an oil and gas producing country, to ensure that we retain our skills and give people a secure future.

9.50 am

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, Central): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) on securing it.

This is an important issue for the north of Scotland. I stress the north of Scotland rather than the highlands because what is happening in Barmac reflects events in the oil industry in general. My constituency of Aberdeen is recognised as the oil capital of Europe and we are also experiencing difficulties, although they are not as apparent as the fairly dramatic circumstances at Barmac.

I shall speak about employment in the oil industry and how we should proceed. The industry tells us that it employs 380,000 people directly or indirectly in the United Kingdom. That massive number of people reflects the importance of the industry. However, it is wrong to think of the employment as being concentrated in one part of the country. A survey by the Offshore Contractors Association about a year ago showed that 220 hon. Members in the House had more than 500 oil jobs based in their constituencies. The business permeates the whole of British industry. My local council estimates that 40,000 jobs in its area are directly related to the oil industry.

For 30 years, the oil industry has taken workers from all parts of the UK. When it began to develop in the 1960s and 1970s, the bulk of workers came from the traditional heavy engineering and manufacturing industries on Teesside, Tyneside and Clydeside—I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) is here to represent that interest—and that remains the case. Any day of the week, the southbound train from Aberdeen is full of Geordies and Teessiders who are heading home after two or three weeks on the rigs.

It is important to understand the nature of employment in the North sea industry, which includes onshore facilities such as Barmac. It is a cyclical industry. Some of our major economic crises in the past 20 years stemmed from the oil crisis in the early 1970s. At that time, the UK industry was in its infancy, but when the price collapsed from between $32 and $35 a barrel to between $8 and $9 a barrel almost overnight in 1985–86, industry in my area was devastated. It was estimated that the oil industry lost 50,000 jobs virtually overnight. Investment was immediately stopped and no money was spent on new projects. Drilling, exploration and rig construction were halted, although existing contracts were fulfilled. The industry suffered severely for three or four years, especially the onshore fabrication yards in Scotland, such as those at Ardersier and Nigg.

There is a particular culture to offshore employment that is difficult to find anywhere else in Britain. About 10 per cent. and, in some cases, 20 per cent. of onshore and offshore employees are directly employed by oil companies in my area. The remaining jobs are contracted out. A meeting in my constituency on Friday night was attended by 50 or 60 people who run one-person companies—IR35 companies as they are known. They are highly skilled, but the industry refuses to employ them directly. Instead, it prefers to take on employees through agencies or other contracting operations. That shows the way in which the industry operates: it demands flexibility. The other 80 to 90 per cent. are employed through single-person companies or other companies to fulfil contractual requirements—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not know who owns the machine that is making that noise, but Madam Speaker takes a dim view of such disturbances.

Mr. Doran: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

That practice underlines the flexibility of and the insecurity in the industry. The people that I was with on Friday night strongly wanted full-time permanent jobs in the oil industry, but they knew that that was not going to happen. In times of downturn—a year ago, the oil price decreased to about $9 a barrel—those people are dispensed with at little notice. They do not figure dramatically in large-scale unemployment such as that experienced at Barmac, but they lose their jobs as readily. However, they know that there will be opportunities when the industry picks up, as it is doing now—today's price is about $25 a barrel. The industry is cautious and there is little sign of real investment over the next year, so the problems will be with us until it is certain that the oil price is stable and it can make longer-term decisions.

The same culture exists in the rig construction yards, although they have managed to achieve some stability. They went through difficult times in 1985–88. Rig construction yards have been an important resource for the oil industry. One of the major failings of the industry is that it has not trained people. Instead, it has developed its facilities offshore and plucked skilled employees from other parts of the country, such as plumbers, boilermakers, electricians and engineers who were drawn into the oil industry as their traditional manufacturing industries declined. The rig construction yards were used as a training base. Many of the people who work in the oil industry were first trained in the yards. I suppose that that could be considered an indirect subsidy by the oil industry, which paid for the rigs, but the enlightened training policy at Barmac has been important in bringing new recruits into the industry. The oil industry's failure to train must be recognised.

I was pleased to hear the reasoned contribution by the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) who has a long involvement with the industry. Indeed, we have occasionally worked together on issues. Her speech contrasted sharply with the behaviour of some of her colleagues in Scotland on this issue. Fairly hysterical comments have been made in an attempt to pin the blame for the problems on the Government. It is important to understand the way in which the industry operates and I have deliberately spent time spelling that out. I back wholeheartedly the hon. Lady's suggestion that the Government have a role, but it is important to recognise that the oil industry also has a role.

People throughout the UK have benefited from the oil industry, with which I have been pleased to work closely in my area. It has created employment and paid huge taxes into the national coffers, and it has helped to build new skill bases, for example in information technology and underwater technology, which we are beginning to export. That will benefit us in the longer term, but the legacy of the oil industry is that there is little sign of any company bedding down in our communities.

The industry is in a long and slow decline phase. Oil companies in my constituency assure me that we have at least another 30 years and some have shown me the long-term plans that demonstrate their commitment. However, those companies are not making major contributions to the community. The perception is that they come in and take what they need in skills and Government assistance. They work within the system and buy what they need. I realise that they pay heavily for what they do, but they do not seem to feel a social responsibility to the areas in which they operate. There is a sense that, when the oil has gone, they will simply up sticks and go to the next great oil province. There have been a number of recent scares in that respect. For example, when the former Soviet Union territories opened up to western investment, it was strongly felt that, as the oil there would be a lot cheaper to exploit than it is offshore in Scotland, we would lose out on new investment. That has not yet happened, mainly because of the political difficulties in the former Soviet Union, but it could happen at any time.

In conclusion, we should learn the lessons of Barmac—as hon. Members have said, we have been here before. It is, however, important that the oil industry, the Government and local authorities work together. We must recognise the important contribution that our local authorities have made. Aberdeen city council is now recognised as a world expert because it has enabled its local area to make the transition from a non-oil, semi-rural economy, which relied on, for example, fishing, agriculture and meat production, to an oil economy. Other authorities in Mexico, Canada, the former Soviet Union, the far east and Australia are learning lessons from the experiences of Aberdeen city council. Local authorities together with the oil industry and central Government must work out a programme or task force to deal with the industry's decline. What happened at Barmac emphasises the importance of planning for that final stage.

10.2 am

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a brief contribution to the debate. It is fortuitous that the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) secured the debate, although all the hon. Members present—particularly those of us who represent constitutencies in the highlands and islands—would agree that the reasons that occasion the debate are far from fortuitous. Both the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) outlined those reasons and I do not intend to repeat them. I would, however, underscore from a constituency point of view the overwhelming importance of Barmac's presence, not just the immediate employment, massive though that is—it is the largest private commercial sector employer in the mainland highlands—but equally the ancillary and spin-off employment opportunities and the social and economic underpinning that comes with them.

Although, as a result of redistributions, the Nigg part of the Barmac site is no longer within the boundaries of my constituency—it now lies just over the border in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan)—there is no doubt that over the years one could track, in constituency surgeries and the postbag, the fortunes of the local economy by the employment and contractual fortunes of the Barmac sites—the one is in direct proportion to the other. I fear that we are in for a significant economic downturn next year as a result of the recent shock to the system.

From my dealings in the past decade and a half with Nigg in particular—now Barmac—in its split site and various mutations, there is no doubting or escaping the essentially cyclical nature of the oil industry. One of the lessons that has been learned commendably by those at management level—aided and assisted by the trade unions, which have contributed powerfully and responsibly over the years—is the need for diversification based on substantial investment in forefront technology. The industry has done that to a considerable extent, but of course that in itself is not enough to cushion the blow that has just been felt as a result of the recent downturn in extraction activity in the North sea in particular.

As the debate relates to the UK in general and not just to the local situation—overwhelmingly important though that is to some of us here—it is worth considering the assessment that the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association has made on likely probable developments as they affect the fabrication sector and oil exploration as a whole. It says that the most recent data from Wood Mackenzie "suggests that the number of probable new developments is down from 45 in 1998 to 38 in 1999."

It goes on:

"However, few are likely to require major platform structures of the kind that will create major employment opportunities in the fabrication yards. Of the 35 proposed near term developments"— they are only proposed developments; they are not yet contracts—

"17 are expected to use subsea technology tied back to existing infrastructure"— so less fabrication opportunity there by far—

"9 may use 'not normally manned platforms'"—

more of the same—

"4 may use fully integrated platforms,
5 are expected to be developed by Extended Reach Drilling."

In other words, even with the diminished number of orders likely to come on stream and assuming that the price per barrel remains more buoyant than it has been of late, the changed nature of the technology means that there is less potential for the Barmacs of this world to achieve the huge fabrication contracts that have been their mainstay hitherto. That poses serious questions for the medium to longer term, leaving aside the fact that there are still several decades of North sea extraction left—I agree with the hon. Member for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran) on that.

I am, however, critical of the Government in this respect. After the last election, when the then new Chancellor announced his review of the fiscal regime of the North sea, several of us warned that the fact that the price of oil was falling internationally was bound to add to the climate of uncertainty in what is a very reactive business on a global level; and, indeed, it did. Anyone who has dealt with the oil majors over the years knows that the business involves a great deal of brinkmanship—that is the nature of the beast. Some of the companies that announced in lights that they were postponing major developments may well have used the Chancellor's review as an excuse to bring forward an announcement that they may have been likely to make anyway; I am not so naive as to suppose that that was not so. Without doubt, however, the fiscal review, against the backdrop of the plummeting price per barrel of oil internationally, contributed to added uncertainty, which led to some genuine postponements, if not cancellations. That has certainly not helped the domestic fabrication sector.

There needs to be a twofold approach. First, there is the micro-approach. Highlands and Islands Enterprise and Government Ministers sitting in the Parliament and Executive in Edinburgh can attempt to cope with the immediate local economic and social impact. I know that they are trying to do that and they deserve—and will receive—all possible support in their endeavours. However, that is merely Elastoplast after the event. Action is also needed on the macro level, which is where Westminster comes in—the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry in particular. There is an argument to be made—we have been here before under Nigel Lawson's tenure—for fiscal stimulus as it affects marginal field extraction and development, not least the satellite technology around existing fields. The high rates of marginal taxation that are applied to existing satellites could be diminished to try to increase the likelihood of further fabrication contracts.

Our approach needs to work locally and regionally, as well as on a macro level, which is why it is appropriate that the debate takes place here, in the presence of the Minister for Energy and Competitiveness in Europe. I have had the opportunity of a brief exchange with the right hon. Lady, whose concern is well documented and whose interest and support are much appreciated, and I also met the Chancellor last week. At a time when the highlands has received such a setback in the cutting edge of technology—coincidental with our traditional sectors all suffering so severely, although for very different reasons—there is an urgent need for the Chancellor to consider in the run-up to the next Budget what tax stimulus he might be able to give. Nigel Lawson's actions some 10 years ago undoubtedly helped confidence nationally and internationally and the flow of orders that followed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I should tell hon. Members that I intend to begin winding-up speeches by calling the Liberal Democrat spokesman at 10.30 am. Three hon. Members who wish to speak have caught my eye; if they are brief, I am sure that they will be able to do so.

10.10 am

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): I, too, am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) for securing the debate. The name of his constituency might be rather a mouthful, but, unlike the more obscure name of my constituency, it has the advantage of naming the towns and settlements within it so that people know where it is.

Mr first point is that the oil and gas fabrication industry is not just a Scottish industry—there are fabrication yards along the east coast of England, even stretching down to East Anglia and the town of Lowestoft, which I represent. We have two yards in the town—the Odebrecht yard, which is part of an international company, and the smaller but no less successful KYE yard, which is a local company. We must remember that, in addition, there is a chain of small and medium enterprises that make component parts and supply engineering services which feed into the industry. All of them are affected by reduced investment in the North sea; the task force forecasts that that will fall by 50 per cent. by 2002 if no action is taken. That would affect hundreds of jobs in my constituency, as well as the thousands of jobs of which we have already heard.

The oil and gas industry is enormously valuable to our country. We have so far had tax revenues from it of £89 billion and, as has been said, 30,000 jobs offshore and more than 300,000 on land depend on it. I am told that investment in the North sea is equivalent to the cost of building a channel tunnel every two years. We are dealing with a hugely important industry.

The entire industry suffers from the reduction in investment, but those of us connected with the fabrication yards most feel the effect because the greatest concentration of jobs lies in the yards. The yards are vital to coastal towns up and down the country. They took on people from closed shipyards, just as the supply and standby vessels took on people from the fishing industry. Shipbuilding and fishing were the mainstays of the Lowestoft economy until the shipyards were closed and the fishing fleet was decimated. We are now reliant on the fabrication industry.

The Odebrecht yard in Lowestoft is in the centre of the town, at the entrance of the harbour. It is not big enough to build the jackets; instead, it builds the top sides and the accommodation modules. Visitors to the town often ask what those rising structures are. I tell them, and say also that the structures symbolise a barometer of the health of the local economy—while we have them there and while they move up, people are in work. When one project is completed, there is anxiety about whether another contract will follow. We live with that; there is currently less and less work to bid for.

The changes to the oil and gas towns are comparable with those that have affected coalfield communities. We are extremely dependent. We must not forget that real people and real communities are at the end of decisions. People naturally look to Government and ask what Government can do. In many respects, the Government have already acted—my area, like others, has been submitted for assisted area status and objective 2 European funding. It is important that the Government see the negotiations in Brussels through to the end; the granting of the status and the funding is vital to my area. Coastal towns suffer from being peripheral. We suffer from poor transport links in East Anglia. The firms and community of my constituency will need that external support.

I should emphasise to the Minister that it is vital, when we have those designations, that the oil and gas industry is able to access assisted area status funds and European structural funds—we have previously had problems with that. It is important that we encourage industries to diversify into related activities. They will need support with capital expenditure to do that. Lowestoft was given those designations by the Government as recognition that, for a long period, it had been one of the top—or bottom—10 travel-to-work areas for unemployment. The problem will be made worse if we also lose jobs in fabrication. I urge the Government to include in the urban White Paper being devised a special remit for coastal towns, and not just to consider the problems of big inner cities. Whole Government policies could then be driven in that way.

Gas represents a big share of activity in the North sea—our gas reserves will outlast our oil reserves. Why do we continue the moratorium on gas-fired power stations? Extra confidence would be given to the industry if it was lifted. I cannot understand why it was imposed, and I do not think that it is necessary. The Government declared that they wanted to reform the energy pool. It takes several years to build a power station; the operator of a power station would have to take the risk of buiding one knowing that there might be a different energy market once it was completed. It would help if that decision were reconsidered. Gas is the best fuel environmentally after renewables, which can meet only some of our needs.

We should consider what the oil companies could do. They were clearly going to be cautious when the price of oil was as low as $10 a barrel—investment was discouraged. The price has returned to $25 a barrel. We do not know that it will stay at that level, but I ask the oil companies to reconsider and to be more positive about investment in the new situation.

We must focus on the big issue—the macro-economic situation concerning the future of the oil and gas industry. We cannot alter geology. It took millions of years for the oil and gas to form, and we must accept that the North sea industry is now in its mature stage. The big fields have been discovered and, therefore, the days of big kit, such as big platforms, are over. The all-party offshore oil and gas group, which I chair, recently saw what might be the last such construction to be built at the Wallsend yard for the Shearwater project. That does not mean the end of our industry—we can exend its life if we fully exploit the smaller and more marginal fields. Thirty years ago, people were saying that the industry would be finished by now. It is not finished; it has not yet peaked because of innovation, technical advance and cost reduction since those early days. We must maximise the life of the industry of the United Kingdom continental shelf in that way.

The Government industry task force, which has been a model of co-operation between Government and industry, is addressing that matter. The Leading Oil and Gas Industry Competitiveness initiative, supported by the Department of Trade and Industry, will also have a great part to play. A special section will study fabrication and how we can learn from the gulf of Mexico and get down to the cost levels of the industry there. We shall have a future if we do that.

Developing opportunities in recommissioning and decommissioning will also be important. In East Anglia, we are keen to be involved in those opportunities as they represent a great source of employment. It will be important to maximise the industry's export possibilities, as we are world leaders. The task force has set an ambitious target of a 50 per cent. increase in exports. That is difficult currently because of the high pound. One of the yards in my constituency told me yesterday that it was buying raw materials from Germany and Italy; if it used our raw materials, it would be uncompetitive when exporting the final product.

We must focus on innovation now because the window of opportunity is small. We cannot build satellites once the major installations have gone or have been closed. We must develop our industry now, while the infrastructure is in place.

The Government have their part to play in the actions identified by the task force. I am pleased that they have already acted by introducing more flexible regulations, modernising the licence award system and granting capital gains tax roll-over relief. It is crucial that the Government recognise that not merely oil price but field size will be the key factor in determining investment for the future. I hope that the Treasury will take a long-term view of taxation and realise that, if it can gradually be planed down as the marginal fields are exploited, it will help to stretch the life of the industry, make the fields more viable and keep more people in work. It will mean more overall tax revenues to the Treasury and enable good environmental husbandry of the finite resources if what is there is taken out when the installations are available to do so.

The Government have agreed to keep royalty and petroleum revenue tax under review. The industry must then convince the Treasury that any relief given will bring forward increased investment. It would help if the oil companies could show that they would respond to the higher oil price by keeping their part of the deal.

We must remember that more jobs are with the contractors and the suppliers than with the oil companies. It is important that the fabrication industry is represented in the task force, which is to be relaunched at the beginning of next year. It should reflect the whole industry, including contractors and fabricators, and also have a geographical balance so that all parts of the country have confidence in it. The trade unions, too, should be fully involved. It is for the industry to decide who it puts forward, but I am sure that ultimately the Minister can insist on a fair and balanced representation from the industry.

There must be a national effort. Oil and gas is a great industry, which has cast off the old image of being dirty and irresponsible; it is now a leading-edge, high-tech industry. We must all work together, remember that there are people at the heart of it and do everything that we can to maintain levels of employment.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) for securing the debate and for giving us the opportunity to contribute to it. As you requested, I shall be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I begin by paying tribute to the work force and management of Lewis Offshore, which operates the Arnish yard in my constitutency. I was closely involved with the reopening of the yard in 1991, which seemed like a leap of faith at that time. The economic context was in many ways even less promising than it appears today. Moreover, whereas the Arnish yard had been operated in the 1970s and 1980s by large multinationals, the new operation, when it was restarted, was unique: it was locally managed and very much locally controlled.

Under that local management, the yard succeeded beyond our most optimistic hopes at the time. Employment was consistently about 200 people, largely drawn from those living locally. At times, the number increased to about 500 people, some drawn from outside, adding to spending power in the local economy. Sadly, the company is now in receivership, but it is to its great credit that it kept the yard active for what was, it transpired, the longest continuous period of operation since it first opened in the early 1970s.

As several hon. Members have said, the industry is subject to ups and downs. Arnish has been caught by the current downturn. Given the yard's excellent record in the past decade and the crisis elsewhere in the industry, there is no shame in its present predicament and I firmly believe that the yard still has good prospects for the future. The qualities of the work force are such that it still has a good chance of attracting new investment when the climate becomes more favourable.

In terms of that more favourable climate, a number of hon. Members have already talked of the need to encourage new development. One of the areas to which people look for new development is off the west coast of Scotland. That development will be technically difficult and hugely expensive, but the shift westwards has already begun. I am told that west of Shetland has the largest producing fields on the British shelf. It will be useful to hear the view of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Competitiveness in Europe of the prospects for further development off the west coast in the next few years.

Many hon. Members have mentioned the importance of the gas industry. There are anxieties about the impact of the moratorium on development and production and it will be useful to hear my right hon. Friend's view of it. What has been the impact on gas development? It might be appropriate to have another look at the moratorium.

There is also the prospect of large amounts of work decommissioning old, redundant platforms, as my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber said in his opening speech. The combined value of the work in the next decade and beyond is reportedly billions of pounds. If only a small part of it were won by the yard in my constituency, for example, it would generate contracts even more valuable than have been achieved in the past decade. Again, it would be extremely helpful to know the Department's view of how the decommissioning work might develop, how big it might be, when it is likely to start and the likely trend of development.

At the first signs of decommissioning work, British yards face strong competition from Norway. With the help of the Department of Trade and Industry, it is vital that we keep a close eye on the development of that market. An important task for the Government will be to advise and assist British companies to keep abreast of their Norwegian rivals.

The other big tasks for the Government are, first, to keep viable the yard in my constituency and all the other yards that are suffering, so that they continue to be available for future business. The second task will be to maintain the skills and training of the work force so that they can take advantage of any future work in the industry. A third task in my constituency, which is perhaps more directly suited to the Department rather than to the local economic agencies, is to assist Lewis Offshore in its pursuit of outstanding creditors, especially when it is owed substantial sums from companies that are based overseas.

I would welcome the Minister's assurance that the Government are focused on those tasks and that the Department of Trade and Industry will assist the Scottish Executive and Highlands and Islands Enterprise in pursuing these matters. The Government cannot create work, but they can help companies such as Lewis Offshore and the others that have been mentioned this morning to be ready to make competitive bids for work when it arrives. I am sure that such opportunities will come along and I am hopeful, too, that my right hon. Friend will continue to take a close personal interest in the fate of the industry, especially the yards in the highlands.

10.29 am

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South): I am grateful to have a few moments to speak at the end of this debate and I am grateful, too, to my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) for securing it.

The Tees is absolutely distraught at the state of the oil and gas fabrication industry, in which more than 8,000 people in that area are employed one way or another. An impact assessment shows that, if the industry goes down, our economy will lose about £220 million. That is a sizeable amount, and it is creating serious trauma.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran) stated that many Geordies travel to the north-east of Scotland on a week-by-week basis. He might have added that so do many thousands of Teessiders, who are boilermakers, fabrication workers, engineers and welders. We have a tradition of travelling to where the work is. The commitment of this work force is to work and they want to hear from the Government that they, too, are committed to giving the oil and gas industry a chance.

So much of what I could say has been said in the debate, so I will not repeat it. We have seen Kvaerner's Triton sail out into the North sea. It is an astounding piece of engineering. We have also heard it said that the industry is finished. That cannot possibly be true or acceptable. The workers have inordinately high skills. The industry is value added. We should not be allowed to say goodbye to it.

I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, Central questioning what the industrialists and the industry are doing. My goodness, was he reading my mind? Last year, the industry achieved record profits. It has had difficult times, but in the past 20 years it made record profits virtually every second year. My community wants to know where the payback is. People ask what is being put back in. What is that industrial community doing about it? What will they help to develop? The skills and the technology are there. The community is looking to the industry—to Kvaerner, Odebrecht, and Heerema, which are very large companies. We do not want them to run to the easy fields of Mexico. We want to hear them say that the shallow beds in the North sea are still worth extracting from; that submersible engineering and other forms of engineering are greatly valued; that the work force are valued; and that they have a commitment to the community, so they will stay.

I have had two minutes in which to speak. This industry is crucial for me and my colleages from the Tees, and for the trade unionists. I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me that two minutes.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am delighted that we were able to fit the hon. lady into the debate. I knew her late father well. He spoke with great passion; so does she.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): I congratulate the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) on securing the debate on a most important issue. Everyone present would agree that we face a tragic loss of jobs. The impact on the local community, the industry and the economy of not only Scotland but the United Kingdom will be devastating, as hon. Members have pointed out.

Broadly speaking, what is happening is part of an overall loss of momentum in the UK oil industry. In part, it is due to the inescapable facts of geological life. Available oil reserves are now smaller and harder to find and they are expensive to extract. The marginal cost of bringing them ashore is also higher. That will have a fundamental and unavoidable impact on the industry in the coming few years, but there is still a good deal of life left in those fields and a good deal of investment still to be made.

Some significant facts of life must also be confronted. This time last year, oil and gas prices were probably historically at their lowest point ever—certainly well below what investment analysts had expected a decade earlier. That has a serious impact on the industry's profitability and the effectiveness and value of investment. The price of oil has multiplied two and a half times, but is clearly in a period of considerable instability. Gas is extremely cheap on the international market.

The industry has also to cope with the political facts of life. Here I join my right hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), who said that the Government must look back at part of their record of the past two and a half years. The uncertainty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's review of the fiscal regime left the industry unclear about the future economic profitability and viability of its investment in the UK oil sector. His acceptance of that review was a little tentative. In the words of a representative of the oil industry to whom I spoke yesterday, it was acceptance for the time being. This is not the basis on which long-term investment decisions at a marginal and critical level can be soundly based.

The uncertainty of purpose of the fiscal regime was somewhat compounded by another uncertainty—that of developing and exploiting alternative energy systems. The hon. Member for Inverness, East Nairn and Lochaber said that the yard had tried to look at diversification into wave and wind energy fabrication and construction.

We need steadfastness and stability of purpose not only in the oil industry, but in the broader energy market. The key to that is confidence. The industry must have confidence in its investment decisions, not least because it is a global industry and, essentially, perhaps the ultimate market-driven industry. It is not given to sentiment or to spending a great deal of time on its social obligations. Therefore, it is essential for the Government to supply what they can by way of fiscal and investment support and the stable framework so necessary to reassure that investing community.

I make two pleas. The first is to the companies to hang on in there and not give up on the UK industry or the Scottish oil industry. I ask them to have faith in the skills and added value that the Scottish fabrication industry and the wider UK industry have and can contribute to their profitability in the coming decades. My second plea is to the Government—and I want to leave time, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for them to respond. I make three requests. Please will they give a clear signal about long-term fiscal stability and help for the industry based in and around the UK oil and gas sector? Please will they respond to several pleas made this morning for a clear direction to their strategy on decommissioning, where a great deal of investment and creation of jobs will be necessary in the future? Please will they give today a clear signal about how they intend to facilitate the diversification of investment into alternative energy technologies? The skills, manpower and capacity are there and, with the alternative sources of energy, we have a rich environment.

This is not the day for scoring party political points. I simply ask the Minister to respond positively to this tragic set of circumstances.

10.38 am

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) on securing this important debate. There is no doubt that the two impending sets of job losses at the Barmac yards at Nigg and Ardersier are personal and economic tragedies not only for the 3,000 individuals directly involved, but for the surrounding community because of the indirect effect of job losses there. The hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) pointed out that when the Nigg and Ardersier yards are doing well, the small shops and hotels in her constituency do well, too.

The reasons for the absence of new orders after the Elf Enterprise Elgin platform, which will be completed in March next year, have been well rehearsed. The UK continental shelf is now a mature development, with remaining reserves confined to smaller fields. The low long-term oil price—recent but temporary hikes notwithstanding—is also a major contributor. Exploration and appraisal drilling are at the lowest level since the 1970s. The 35 proposed near-term developments in the North sea are unlikely to be of the size and type to require substantial new rigs from the fabrication yard. According to the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association, which the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) mentioned, 17 of the 35 developments are expected to use subsea technology, using existing infrastructures; so there will be no need for further infrastructure there. Nine use not usually manned rigs and five are expected to be developed by the new technology in drilling—the extended-reach drilling techniques.

According to the Department of Trade and Industry's figures, whereas development expenditure was £5.1 billion in 1998, it fell to £3.2 billion in 1999 and is set to fall to £3.1 billion next year and £2 billion for the following two years. Despite that, Barmac remains relatively optimistic about the long term. Its managing director, Don Wright, said:

"We may be down, but we are definitely not out".

He went on to say:

"The heavy engineering end of the oil industry is notoriously boom and bust and the bottom of the cycle will be reached by next spring."

That is odd: I had thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had abolished boom and bust, but obviously not in the oil industry. Mr. Wright continued:

"In a worst case scenario, we will be down to 400 next year"—

400 employees, that is—

"But we actually believe that we will have enough success to ensure that we are still employing 800 on average."

There do seem to be some long-term trends, which may be hard to resist. We need to ask whether the Government are doing enough to slow those trends down, or alternatively, whether they are making the situation worse. I pay tribute to the hon Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber for his energy in raising these important matters with industry and the Government. More controversially, his exemplary activity on behalf of his constituents contrasts sharply with the insouciance of the leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West, whose constituency neighbours the Nigg fabrication yard. Although the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber used his opportunity commendably at Prime Minister's Questions last week to raise the subject of the Barmac fabrication yard, the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West failed to use either of his two weekly opportunities to raise the issue. Last week, he even made a joke and asked about the London tube instead.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran) says that the Government are not to blame. The Government's approach, however, has been confined to establishing the oil and gas industry task force, now to be renamed PILOT, and Leading Oil and Gas Industry

[Mr. Nick Gibb]

Competitiveness, which is about lowering costs. As I said, the key question is whether the Government are making matters worse. The answer is yes.

The United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association believes that one of the most important requirements to achieve the goals that the oil and gas industry task force set itself is "extending the life of existing infrastructure in the UK continental shelf. This provides a large potential for 'brown field' development—but the window of opportunity for incremental investments for maximum reserves recovery is limited. . . Currently, such incremental investments are discouraged by taxes as high as 69 per cent."

That 69 per cent. is made up of a combination of petroleum revenue tax, royalties and corporation tax—a combination that still applies to some of the older fields. As the hon. Member for Moray also pointed out, there is scope for the Government to reduce those burdens in the light of changes to the market and, in particular, to the North sea oil sector.

The North sea oil tax review—also referred to by the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West—which seems to hang dangerously over the industry, has been put on hold. When the Minister said that the review had been put on hold, she referred to the low price of oil as the reason for doing so. Now that the oil price has increased, I hope that the Government do not intend to reignite the threat that the oil tax review presents to the oil industry.

There is also the gas moratorium, a policy implemented by the Government solely for internal Labour party reasons. It has resulted in higher than necessary electricity prices and carbon dioxide emissions, and lower than necessary demand for North sea gas. Even the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) cannot understand why the moratorium was imposed: the reasons given in the energy White Paper simply do not stack up.

Three Government policies, therefore, are adding to the difficulties of the North sea sector. No one would claim that those three policy solutions could deal with all the problems in that sector, but they would at least be a step in the right direction instead of a step in the wrong direction, which is making matters worse.

10.45 am

The Minister for Energy and Competitiveness in Europe (Mrs. Helen Liddell): May I join right hon. and hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) on securing this debate? He has been particularly active on this issue and those of us who know him would expect nothing less.

I welcome our reasoned and thoughtful debate, marred only by the contribution of the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), who gave a singularly ill-informed and ungracious speech. Several important points were raised in the debate and I may not be able to do justice in 15 minutes to the depth of some of them. However, I have been most impressed by the depth of knowledge and the local insights from right hon. and hon. Members and I will convey a copy of the Official Report of this debate to the oil and gas industry task force, which will be able to see the ideas and the passion generated in our debate.

Like you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor). She had only two minutes, but managed to say what many of us have been trying to say for a long time. I note also that my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar) was trying hard to enter the debate, but was unable to do so. I shall seek to converse with him in due course.

I feel a sense of poignancy in this debate, particularly regarding the problems of Barmac at Nigg, Ardersier and Arnish. I recall many years ago visiting Nigg before even a sod had been cut in the grass. The scale of development there has changed considerably now. The history of the Barmac operation in the highlands of Scotland has been put into context for us. We are talking not about metal bashing, but about a major operation with a highly skilled work force. I pay tribute to that work force and to management, who are showing a commitment to the community. The work force are excellent and I know that recent decisions have not been taken easily. I pay particular tribute to the work of the shop stewards at Barmac. I woke up in the early hours of Monday morning to a report from Canada. The convener of shop stewards had been there to look for work opportunities for the Barmac work force.

In common with the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing), I am well aware of the multiplier effects of the yards on local communities. The hon. Lady asked about the possibility of a wider task force. She would acknowledge that that is more a matter for the Scottish Executive than for the House. However, I shall liaise with my colleagues in the Scottish Executive, which knows that it can call on my Department's resources to assist in this matter.

I have already met the oil and gas industry task force and I will provide more detail in a moment. I would like to announce now that the oil and gas task force met on 1 December and the main item of discussion was the difficulties faced by the UK fabrication industry. I chaired the task force and was supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Central Fife (Mr. McLeish), who is also a member of the Scottish Executive, and by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scotland Office.

Following that meeting, several plans were formulated. I have asked all relevant Government Departments and agencies to meet, with the facilitation of the Department of Trade and Industry, to discuss their existing strategies in response to the challenges faced by the fabrication industry, to formulate a coherent UK-wide plan to mitigate current difficulties. The Scottish Executive, Scottish Enterprise, Highlands and Islands Enterprise, the Glasgow development agency, One North East and representatives from the oil industry national training organisation are to be invited to a meeting in the DTI on 20 December.

Picking up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber about industry champions, one of the great advances since the development of the oil and gas industry task force is the way in which companies operating in an intensely competitive market have sat around a table to examine difficulties in the industry to plot a way forward. I want the fabrication industry to enter into that, so that we have a champion for UK fabrication.

Let me try to give some comfort to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South. Much of the debate has been about Scotland. Last week, I spoke at the Northern Offshore Federation, which has a major event planned for February next year, supported by the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. It will be a major showcase for the supply industry—not just in the north of England, but throughout the United Kingdom.

Many points have been made today about the decline in the UK continental shelf, but we must separate that issue from the prospects of the industry as a whole. That is what the oil and gas industry task force has been seeking to do. The right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) made the excellent point about the geological challenge of the UK continental shelf. There is significant change in the North sea and we must manage that change.

The Government's initiative in bringing together the oil and gas industry task force has brought about significant progress. The reduced world demand, caused not merely by the dramatic fall in the oil price, but by the changing nature of energy markets, has been recognised. Indeed, the increase in the oil price has changed the situation a little, too. I shall come back to that when I talk about decommissioning, which has been changed by the increased price per barrel of oil. The continental shelf is undoubtedly maturing and is geologically more difficult. It is imperative therefore to reduce the cost of operating on the UK continental shelf, but we must not lose sight of the opportunities for exploration, production and the development of oil and gas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber spoke about the marginal fields and mentioned that a number of licences have been issued for fields that are not being developed. One exciting initiative by the task force is to set up an organisation called LIFT, the Licence Initiative for Trading, which is a virtual trading market in licences. If a company has a licence for a marginal field that it does not want to develop, it can trade that licence in a way that has not existed before. That initiative will work together with other initiatives such as LOGIC, which stands for Leading Oil and Gas Industry Competitiveness.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran) talked about small suppliers such as one-man companies and self-employed contractors, many of whom have fantastic expertise. I have seen some of that expertise. It is world-leading stuff, but often, because they are small, they are not plugged into the mechanisms of the large oil companies. LOGIC aims to deal with that and to ensure that, right through the supply chain, big businesses can see what small businesses have to offer. Linked to that is the industry technology facilitator. Many of the far-sighted technological ideas come from small operators, who lack the money or expertise to market them themselves. Through the Department of Trade and Industry, we will help both LOGIC and the industry technology facilitator to make sure that those ideas are marketed too. This is about putting a coherent supply chain into place.

The task force has far-reaching aims. It is aimed at ensuring that investment is sustained at £3 billion per annum from UK continental shelf activity. That should ensure that production remains at or about 3 million barrels of oil equivalent a day. It is about prolonging self-sufficiency in oil and gas. It is also, and this is the bit that I want to work at particularly hard, about a 50 per cent. increase in export in oil and gas supply products. That amounts to something like £2 billion in value. I shall meet the OSO board tomorrow to talk about export opportunities.

My Department, through British Trade International, works hard to exploit the opportunities for a world-class industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) mentioned that our industry is world class. We believe that it is possible to secure £1 billion additional value from new businesses supporting up to 100,000 jobs—more than there would otherwise have been. We recognise that there will be a decline in jobs. This has been a sensible and reasoned debate which has acknowledged that change. However, there is the opportunity for the future too. We must deal with the short-term issues that affect communities such as those in the north of Scotland and down the east coast of England. That is a key area for us.

A number of right hon. and hon. Members mentioned the fiscal regime. One of the benefits of the task force is that it has brought together industry leaders, and I include trade unionists as well as representatives of the Government, with the Chancellor. One direct consequence of that was capital gains roll-over relief. The industry can therefore discuss the whole fiscal framework for the North sea directly with the Chancellor, who will keep it under review. It is not for me to speak for him, but he is aware of the difficulties in the North sea.

A number of hon. Members asked what the industry is doing about this problem. I have also asked that question and, indeed, I put it to the industry last week. The reply was that the industry took a bad hit in the past year because of the fall in oil prices. I ask the industry now to show its commitment to the people who made it the great success that it is and to recognise the skills that there are in the North sea. I have found a ready response from the industry, but I will keep in touch and I will keep the pressure on too.

A number of hon. Members raised the stricter gas consents policy. There is an irony here. Two weeks ago, I was replying to an Adjournment debate about the coal industry and was asked to ensure that the stricter gas consents policy was kept in place. The policy was put in place to allow us to reform the energy pool. We know from the Queen's Speech that there will be a utilities Bill in this Session, which will allow us to put in place that reform of the energy pool. I do not underestimate the impact of the gas consents policy on the UK oil and gas industry. I am aware of that, as is the Secretary of State. We wish to give fairness, and not favours, to the coal industry and we seek to give the same to the oil and gas industry. We hear what the industry says about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) talked about the problems of Arnish. I am sad that the company is in receivership, which is largely due to a commercial dispute. The local work force are excellent—like the Teesside work force they are international and have transformed their abilities over the lifetime of the Arnish development. My officials will do everything that they can to assist the yard. The company and yard are well regarded and the management has respect throughout the industry. We will do what we can to help.

The hon. Member for Moray asked about the Clair field and a number of hon. Members referred to the need to look at development west of Shetland. The field is very difficult geologically. It operates in difficult weather conditions and is the only field awaiting development there. A large number of licences are involved. BP Amoco is leading attempts to align the various interests but, as to timing, we must take into account the serious environmental impact on the area west of Shetland. The earliest possible approval and contract award would be mid-2001. Regrettably, I cannot suggest anything earlier.

I listened carefully to the points that have been made. Hon. Members know that I am available to them at any time to discuss the difficulties that the industry is experiencing. I do not want to hear us talk about the decline of the UK oil and gas industry: we are talking about managing change from the UK continental shelf in a way that secures an oil export industry that is for the benefit of all of us.

European Legislation (Parliamentary Scrutiny)

11 am

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope that I have the right protocol, because, like many hon. Members, I am somewhat of a novice in that regard. None the less, it is a great pleasure to appear before you for the first time in this new Chamber.

I also thank the Minister for coming here today and for getting off his bus. I understand that he has been touring the country in it and that it is called Eunice—perhaps it should be called EU nice. I suspect that he will have discovered the European Union's deep unpopularity as he travelled in his bus outside the world of Westminster and Whitehall. He shakes his head, but he might not have visited the parts of the country that I and my hon. Friends inhabit. In any case, I welcome the Minister, who is off his bus and, no doubt, off to Helsinki. I hope that he will not sign up to some of the changes that have been forecast for the new intergovernmental conference agenda.

I hope that the Government will not sign up for more qualified majority voting and that they do not move into areas such as the European defence structure. In particular, I hope that they will not deal with the revision of the treaties, about which we have read in today's papers, because that would give the European Union some competence over our tax affairs. The Government want to limit the IGC agenda to matters that are called the leftovers from Amsterdam. However, my fear, and that of many of my colleagues, is that the Minister will not succeed and that the European Union will manage to advance integration and federalism at the next IGC.

One issue that will be missing from the IGC agenda next year will be the power of national Parliaments and their ability to scrutinise the European Union's affairs. That is a great pity, and the Government should seek to strengthen Parliament's role in scrutinising European legislation.

The European Union reminds me of one of the old London Routemaster buses which still run past this building. They were designed in the mid-1950s, at about the same time that Europe was born, to replace trolleybuses in the city. London Transport has a wonderful desire to keep them for ever and over the years it has re-engineered them in one form or another, keeping the same old pre-war design, which is totally unsuitable for the modern London traveller. The European Union is doing exactly the same.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): As a user of the type of bus that my hon. Friend described, I have just one question. Does he agree that the ability to hop on and off while the bus is on the move matches the flexibility that our party seeks in its dealings with Europe?

Mr. Atkinson: That is an ingenious way of taking the Routemaster further into the question of Europe. The problem is that, although my right hon. Friend might be able to hop on and off, it is quite difficult to do so if one has a child, a pushchair or some shopping, or if one is somewhat infirm.

Europe is doing exactly what I have described: it is repeating the mistakes that it made in the past. On the important issue of enlargement, the machine that Europe is seeking to build simply will not work.

The new democracies of eastern Europe, which we shall, I hope, welcome into the European Union, are relatively fragile. The countries in that area have not long had proper democracy. Their political parties have still not properly bedded down or coalesced. There is a danger that they will lose their enthusiasm for their new democracy if the European Union forces too much acquis communautaire on them. That is the great danger in the proposals for the intergovernmental conference.

The problems were well identified in the report by the three wise men—Mr. Dehaene, Mr. von Weizsäcker and Lord Simon. That paper is worth reading, if only because it identifies the problems very well. It does not, of course, identify any of the correct solutions. The authors stress that the European Union should find ways of connecting or reconnecting to the people of Europe. That is important for the way in which we scrutinise the affairs of Europe.

The present system is wholly inadequate to deal with the volume of rules, regulations and decisions that come out of Europe. I speak as someone who had some experience in the previous Parliament of serving on the Select Committee on European Legislation. It has now been renamed the Select Committee on European Scrutiny, although it works in much the same way. I attended a meeting—you may have been to such a meeting yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker—at which we completed our agenda in four minutes. We had about 60 or 70 items to consider, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) will recall. We whizzed through the matters without any sensible debate. That is not to criticise those who work in the Department. Some of our most excellent staff work is done by those who have joined the European scrutiny process and who examine European legislation. Previously, those involved were largely retired civil servants who had rejoined us and who thought of nothing better than getting back at their masters. They had the knowledge to do so and they provided an excellent service.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): I have been on the Scrutiny Committee since 1985 and have seen quite a wide range of activity on it. The people on the Committee—I mean no disrespect to them personally—appear to have been hand-picked to encourage the process of integration. In the previous Parliament, the views of a significant number of people were well known to be favourable to the direction in which the establishment wanted to go. That is a great pity. We need to be sure that people in the Scrutiny Committee, as in the Public Accounts Committee, are intent on asking serious questions all the way down the line.

Mr. Atkinson: I echo my hon. Friend's comments. That is correct. I got some instructive figures from the Library about the number of pieces of paper that emanate from Europe. For instance, in 1996, 39 directives, 2,341 regulations and 2,806 decisions came from the Commission. Among the papers from the Council, which are more important, were 58 directives, 247 regulations and 179 decisions. It is totally impossible for our existing scrutiny system to deal with those. The Scrutiny Committee considers about 1,000 documents a year, which sometimes go round in circles, perhaps two or three times. It reports on about 475 documents and recommends debate on about 60. It recommends that 12 of those debates should be held on the Floor of the House. I have not discovered exactly how many of those recommendations are carried out. My suspicion is that far fewer than 12 of those debates take place on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes): I have had the honour and privilege of being on the Select Committee on European Legislation. I forget how long it has been, but it has been a long time. Is my hon. Friend aware that the Committee is supposed to approve directives, rules and regulations that add up to a couple of hundred sheets of paper most weeks? Does he agree that there must be a serious question mark in our minds as to whether it can have any value at all when it simply rubber-stamps hundreds and thousands of documents, which it is quite incapable of reading and studying and on which it is quite incapable of making any judgments? Even if it disagrees with the subjects of the rules and regulations, it has no powers. All that it can do is write a letter to the Minister to ask for more information or that the matter be debated in a Standing Committee. Does the Committee have any value at all? Is it just a front and a pretence?

Mr. Atkinson: My hon. Friend reinforces the point more eloquently than I am making it. I agree entirely, but I do not want to imply any criticism of members of staff, because we rely on them to make decisions on our behalf.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): I apologise to the hon. Gentleman because I must shortly leave on an urgent constituency matter. However, I want to interject one matter from the viewpoint of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. Following recommendations made by the Modernisation Committee in 1998, the Scrutiny Committee no longer only pursues bits of paper, as he suggests: it is entitled to examine related matters. That raises the question of the parliamentary scrutiny of European affairs as a whole. For example, the Foreign Affairs Committee, on which I serve, has in its remit the intergovernmental conference. The Scrutiny Committee went ahead without consulting us. There is a clear need to clarify the roles of different Select Committees, even if we do not go down the road of having a full European Committee.

Mr. Atkinson: No one knows scrutiny byways better than the hon. Gentleman. He put his finger on precisely the point that I was trying to make. There is so much material to debate that we cannot concentrate on the key issues. We do not separate the wheat from the chaff, and there is too much to deal with properly.

The gold-plating of regulations is an additional problem that occurs after we have dealt with them. Legislation may be nodded through the Scrutiny Committee; it may go through a brief debate in a European Standing Committee; but it may be thoroughly gold-plated when it eventually comes into force. The directive on abattoirs is an example. It originally took up two sides of A4, but the final version produced by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was a book. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) knows all about that.

Mr. Christopher Gill: (Ludlow): I want to talk not about the abattoirs directive specifically, but about directives in general. Would it not be a good idea for Members of Parliament to see the original directive and compare it directly with what is translated into legislation in this country? Both documents should be made available at the same time so that a useful comparison may be made and Members of Parliament can see the score, determining to what extent the directive has been gold-plated by our own Departments.

Mr. Atkinson: I agree absolutely. There is still too much material from Europe for us to scrutinise it properly

Things can be done. For example, the Danes have a system that may be applicable to ours: Ministers are called before their scrutiny committee and must face questions. In essence—and this is the heart of our policy—we should be doing far less in Europe. That is one of the central differences between the Opposition and the Government. We believe that the only way in which we can scrutinise Europe properly and citizens can have confidence in their national Parliaments is for Europe to do far less.

The national Parliament—which voters elect and kick out—is one of the great safety valves of democracy. Kicking out the Government is one of the ordinary citizen's greatest democratic weapons. Without doubt, my backside is still smarting after 1997; that, however, is the nature of the democratic safety valve. If more and more decisions are apparently taken by an unaccountable Commission or institution in Europe, the public will experience genuine frustration at not being able to influence decisions.

One of the worst things for a Member of Parliament is having to say, "I'm awfully sorry, but I can't do anything about this because it's a European matter." In that context, it is depressing to face a farmer suffering genuine financial problems. Even if the Government wanted to help, they cannot because of the European structure. I urge the Minister and the Foreign Secretary—when he goes to Helsinki—to press the case for a wider, shallower Europe, which does less, but does it better.

Mr. Steen: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way: he will be doing so again to many of my hon. Friends, who have valid points to make.

Two matters concern me. Is my hon. Friend aware that the Scrutiny Committee sits in private? The public and press are not given an opportunity to learn about some of the directives, rules and regulations that it considers. For example, there was a draft directive aiming to change the technical specifications on farm tractor passenger seats to take account of the wide and varied work now undertaken by farm tractor passengers. Should the public not hear about those absurd rules and regulations?

Mr. Atkinson: That is exactly the trouble with Europe's image. For the majority of people—as the Minister will discover when he is driving around in Eunice—the image of Europe involves tractor seats, square bananas and carrot jam. Of course, that is quite wrong and damages Europe's reputation.

Several things must be done, apart from Europe doing less and doing it better. Europe needs some proper institutions and should look across the Atlantic for ideas about that. For a start, Europe needs an equivalent of the National Audit Office; the European Parliament could create something strong along those lines. Also urgent is reform of the European Court of Justice, which polices the single market and is of enormous importance to this country's role as a free trading country, but is ultimately a cumbersome and almost hobbled institution. The fact that French defiance in relation to the importation of British beef may take the court up to two years to deal with makes nonsense of the whole procedure. Substantial reform of the court is required, and that, again, may reduce the burden of material emanating from Europe.

The most important thing to set up is an independent competition authority, as outlined in a speech last week by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples), who is shadow spokesman on foreign affairs. We need a competition guardian to snuff out regulations such as those on tractor seats, thus stopping them coming to national Parliaments.

Mr. Steen rose—

Mr. Atkinson: Several of my hon. Friends wish to speak, so I would be grateful if my hon. Friend keeps his intervention short.

Mr. Steen: Does my hon. Friend agree that we need to worry about more than the lack of transparency in the Scrutiny Committee? I mentioned tractor seats, but the Committee has just approved, by the Chairman's casting vote, a £5 million grant enabling the 11 official EU languages to be learned by all member states. As a result, Lëtzebuergesch, the language of Luxembourg, can be taught in Ireland—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. It is improper to raise in this debate proceedings of Select Committees that have not been reported to the House.

Mr. Steen: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The item that I mentioned was considered, voted on and approved by the Scrutiny Committee, so it is now part of that Committee's legal arrangements. Surely it is not a secret matter and may be referred to. There is nothing wrong in mentioning in Westminster Hall an item that has already passed through a Select Committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Regardless of whether a vote has taken place in Committee, the matter has not been reported to the House, so it is not relevant to raise it in this Chamber. In any event, we do not want overly lengthy interventions.

Mr. Atkinson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I believe that the lack of efficient scrutiny damages the reputation of national Parliaments. If the reputations of national Parliaments are damaged, the reputations of the institutions of Europe are also damaged, by proxy. A proper system of scrutiny is vital. The avalanche or blizzard of legislation that comes to Parliament cannot be properly scrutinised. We have to turn off the tap. It can be turned off by having a wider and more flexible system in Europe.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A number of hon. Members have sought to catch my eye. The winding-up speeches, which will start with the representative of the Liberal Democrat party, will be about 12 o'clock, followed by speeches from the main Opposition and then the Government.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): May I first congratulate you on your appointment, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and express my delight at seeing you in the Chair for our proceedings this morning?

I come to the debate as a former Fisheries Minister who had a lot of dealings with European business involving both the Council and the United Kingdom Government, and now as a humble member of European Standing Committee C, which is the tail-end Charlie of scrutiny procedures before Ministers go to Council to agree various matters. My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) is right to draw our attention to the volume of European paper. Anyone who goes to the Vote Office daily can pick up a yellow piece of paper which lists sometimes hundreds of documents on which we might wish to comment. It is difficult enough for us to keep up with the volume of UK legislation, never mind trying to keep up, understand, comment on and react to the volume of European legislation.

If we look at such documents, we are struck by one area in which our current parliamentary scrutiny procedures do not act. Our present system is centred on legislation that is making its way through the institutions of Europe—usually the Council or the European Parliament. When the Government of the day produce a White Paper or a Green Paper, we can comment and shape the Government's views before final legislation becomes cast in concrete. Any legislature always finds it easier to change its mind before it has come to firm and final conclusions. Our parliamentary scrutiny procedure does not cater for dealing with draft material. Given the volume of stuff coming from Europe, one way of heading off some of the material at the pass would be for us to become involved at an earlier stage. That raises the fundamental question of how to keep track of all the material.

I have been impressed by a publication which the European Commission makes available to Members of Parliament and the public, called "The Week in Europe". Two sides of A4 are produced, summarising some of the key events that are taking place in Europe. As a result of the changes introduced by the Modernisation Committee, the House of Commons has established an office in the European Parliament to try to develop links and liaison with Europe to keep an eye on what is going on. Over time, we shall develop an expertise in keeping better track of European business. In view of our electronic communication—the parliamentary intranet—we should start to develop the equivalent of the weekly bulletin that we have in the UK Parliament. In one document, we can keep track of what is happening in this Parliament. Sensible editorial control would help to keep us better posted about what is going on from the inception of a consultative document through to the passage of legislation in the European Parliament. However much we may desire to comment on everything, we cannot do it. We need more help to be able to comment on the issues that matter to our constituents. To do that, we need to keep better track on what is going on.

Even within the Scrutiny Committee, there is difficulty in keeping up with the volume of legislation. My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham made that point. One of the new developments, which I welcome, is post-Council scrutiny. A Minister reports back on what has happened. I caught sight of a contribution made on 10 December 1998 by a former Treasury Minister, now the Minister for Small Business and E-Commerce. In the negotiations on the European budget, a measure that would have cost the UK £500 million had been successfully fought off. One of the tasks of scrutiny is to help parliamentarians and the wider public to become better acquainted with the workings of the European institutions. I am sure that other hon. Members found it as frustrating as I did, during the general election campaign, trying to show that national Parliaments had at least some ability to temper the activities of the Commission and the European Parliament. The extent to which that can be done should be the subject of another debate at another time. To help in the process of educating people on how Europe's institutions work, the more we know about what is happening, the better.

I shall now make some observations about the way in which European Standing Committee C operates to highlight some of the difficulties that right hon. and hon. Members who are not Ministers or members of the Select Committee on European Scrutiny, have in dealing with these matters, some of which are extremely sensitive, and which arouse deep passions in our constituents.

In the end of vehicle life directive, for example, there was a point of detail that could have affected the future prospects of the TVR car company, which manufactures sports cars and is adjacent to Fylde. As a result of probing that directive, two meetings were arranged between the Department of Trade and Industry and the company to develop further some of the points of detail that Ministers were going on to discuss. That cameo illustrates one of the problems. We lift the scrutiny reserve in the House when we have dealt with a particular matter, but it is often only the beginning of a very long process. Sometimes the House returns to the matter, but sometimes it does not. We must become more disciplined about reviewing how Ministers are getting on as a directive or regulation progresses.

We poor members of European Standing Committee C are usually given about 10 days' notice about business, if we are lucky. The Selection Committee informs us that we shall be dealing with that particular business 10 days hence. As a result of a huge amount of work by the parliamentary Clerk and the DTI, a vast file of papers appears. We then have a limited amount of time to wade through it and call for other information from the Library to try to get up to speed on the detail.

[Mr. Michael Jack]

Every Department needs to make a major improvement in its explanatory memorandums. Too often—I also plead guilty—Ministers who receive a draft explanatory memorandum from their Departments give it an occasional look, but it is usually only a cursory glance. It does not contain the detail that is required to enable Members of Parliament to have the equivalent of notes on clauses, so that we can really understand what the directive means. Many directives and documents from Europe are written in a language that I describe as Euro-speak, which is a formulation of words designed sometimes to be flexible and fuzzy at the edges to accommodate 15 different points of view. It is difficult for Members of Parliament to understand the difference that should be attached to the recitals at the beginning of a directive or a regulation, as opposed to the body of the text. To know what it really means—in our language, rather than the language in which it is written—requires a better quality of explanatory memorandum and, whenever possible, a better overview.

The best that we have is the Scrutiny Committee's report, but that report is the distillation of the work of a group of people working under pressure of time. They are able to pose various further questions to be asked of Ministers; but, as we heard, they do not have the power to ask for documents to be revised or to comment in more detail. Explanatory memorandums should be improved to help us better understand and cope with the technicalities of European legislation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham mentioned gold-plating. That takes us into a wider area, which is further investigation on how Parliament handles statutory instruments. We have an objective legislative system; by and large, Europe operates a purposive system. We need to give serious consideration to that difference in our analysis of how we implement European legislation. We should avoid overdoing it.

The House has little opportunity to scrutinise the implementation of European legislation. At the risk of imposing yet another burden on ourselves, once a piece of legislation has been agreed in Europe and before we implement it, we might consider giving guidance to officials before they cast it in concrete.

Time will not permit me to go into more detail about what happens in the European Parliament. However, just as I asked for a weekly bulletin on what is happening in Europe, so I ask for guidance about proceedings in the European Parliament. We need to be better informed about our links with it. It is time that we had a directory of the members of the European Parliament, with their telephone and fax numbers. We should be told how to keep in touch with them and how to obtain information from parliamentary officials. We also need to know how to obtain more information and data from within Europe other than through the internet.

The more transparency, the more knowledge and the more contacts that we legislators can develop, the better we shall be able to improve our scrutiny of what is going on in Europe. The House must continue to take the matter seriously, but Members need more help and better information. I hope that my suggestions find favour with both the Scrutiny Committee and the Minister.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on securing this debate. It is a most important subject.

This is my first speech in this Chamber, but I must point out that we would all have fitted into the familiar surroundings of Committee Room 14. That would have saved the British taxpayer £800,000. However, the move is in some ways symbolic, because in recent years we have seen a complete change in the way in which legislation is imposed on our afflicted citizenry.

Many people believe that all law is made by their Members of Parliament. They are sent to London from the counties; indeed, apart from the first two Parliaments, which were held in Shropshire itself, people have been sent from Shropshire since the 1240s. They came with good ideas for legislation, which was initiated in Parliament. In close collaboration with interested parties, they worked through legislation line by line, scrutinising it so that, when it was finally handed on to civil servants, it was workable and had the approval of those affected by it and those who had to pay for it.

Another huge merit of our traditional system of making law is that, if the legislators get it wrong, we have ways of amending or repealing it. Our system for dealing with European legislation is an extraordinary parody of the Westminster original. Legislation is cobbled together in secret by civil servants, it is rubber-stamped by exhausted peripatetic Ministers in a secretive Council and then sent here for a charade of a scrutiny process. The House is not involved in the initiation of that legislation. I wholeheartedly concur with my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), who pointed out that we are reactive and ought to be involved in the making of European legislation at a much earlier stage.

On paper, we have many safeguards. A resolution of the House is always printed in the minutes of the Scrutiny Committee. It clearly states:

"No Minister of the Crown should give agreement in the Council or in the European Council to any proposal for European Community legislation or for a common strategy, joint action or common position under Title V or a common position, framework decision, decision or convention under Title VI of the treaty on European Union—

(a) which is still subject to scrutiny . . . or . . . which is awaiting consideration by the House".

One might think that to be a clear safeguard but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham pointed out, we run immediately into a time problem. Protocol 3 of the treaty of Amsterdam states:

"A six-week period shall elapse between a legislative proposal or a proposal for a measure to be adopted under Title VI of the Treaty on European Union being made available in all languages to the European Parliament".

Protocol 1 states:

"All Commission consultation documents (green and white papers and communications) shall be promptly forwarded to national parliaments of the Member States."

That puts appalling pressure on the staff in London who receive those documents.

About 900 new European documents a year are deposited in Parliament—that is 2,750 documents since the previous Parliament was dissolved. On average, the Scrutiny Committee judges about 450 of those to be of legal or political importance, and makes a substantive report on them. In recent years, about 40 documents a year only have been recommended for debate, with a feeble 10 on average being debated on the Floor of the House. So far, in this Parliament, 83 documents have been debated, of which 15 have been taken on the Floor of the House.

Shortly after I was elected, I had the honour of being made a member of European Standing Committee A, but it has not yet met. It has not discussed any European documents since 16 June 1999. After the recess, I had the honour of being asked to serve on the Scrutiny Committee. I would have much preferred this debate to have happened a few months hence, when I would have had a little more experience of what goes on. However, my initial reactions have some value.

It is obvious that a huge responsibility and burden are placed on the Scrutiny Committee staff, because six weeks is an extraordinarily short time. It has only 16 full-time staff and one full-time Clerk. One Clerk is shared with the Deregulation Committee, and four Clerk advisers and two legal advisers are shared with that Committee and the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. Of the eight secretarial staff, two are shared with the Deregulation Committee.

My initial reaction to serving on the Scrutiny Committee was awe at the sheer volume of paperwork. It is clear that the staff are enormously stretched by that volume of work, and they are forced to make a hasty precis or summary of the documents that pass through the Committee.

The procedure sounds simple. The Council secretariat in Brussels sends a document to UKREP, the United Kingdom representation in the European Union. UKREP sends that document to the Foreign Office, which forwards it to the relevant Department, which then deposits it in Parliament. Documents should in theory be deposited within two days of receipt in London and, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde said, the appropriate Department should provide Parliament with an explanatory memorandum within 10 days thereafter.

The staff of the Scrutiny Committee immediately hit a problem. Should they pass on documents and memorandums as they stand? Documents are often faulty or unsatisfactory. As my right hon. Friend said, the memorandums are not always correct. The result is immediate haggling and delay. However, that process is relevant only for draft directives. Now that we have co-decision, many directives are amended at some length and in some detail by the European Parliament. As a result, the six-week delay allowed by the protocol of the treaty of Amsterdam can be easily eaten up. Regulations go straight through, because they are not amendable.

Already the effectiveness of the Scrutiny Committee is gravely limited. It is reactive only and reacts to only a limited proportion of the documents that it has to consider. Sitting on the Commitee is a strange experience. We meet every Wednesday and consider what is, in effect, a summary or a precis of the original documents that the staff have drafted in haste under tremendous pressure. They do a remarkable job in the circumstances.

Receiving the papers is a problem. Sometimes I have received them minutes before the sitting starts. Although the Clerks have taken trouble to remedy that problem, the best that I can hope for is to be sent a slug of documents, probably half an inch thick, by Monday evening, probably with a follow-up on Tuesday and, sometimes, another on Wednesday, because the staff are under terrible pressure to ensure that the discussion takes place within the six-week time frame. That pressure is also felt in the Committee.

The Chairman, the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood), is admirable in his effectiveness in getting the business through. However, without divulging too many secrets, last week I passed a comment to my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) and, in that moment, missed a couple of papers on which I wanted to comment. We are under pressure not to interrupt so that the documents are approved.

Last week, a document, which is now in the public domain—I do not think that I am breaching protocol—mentioned making the temporary ban on bovine somatotropin permanent. I represent the largest milk field in western Europe, so surely I should be involved in anything that affects my dairy farmers or makes them less competitive. BST has been used in Canada and America. I received the document only on Tuesday. I should have liked to have the time to contact the National Farmers Union and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty of Animals.

By chance, the next day I received a copy of an RSPCA document that made a good case against the use of BST and showed that it is not used in other countries. I have since contacted the NFU to find out its opinion. All that action was a complete waste of time; the horse had bolted. We had a three or four-minute discussion on BST, the document was agreed to, and I had lost my chance to have an input. The point is that we are reacting to proposals; we are not initiating them, nor are we applying our knowledge and having an input, as Members of Parliament have done through the centuries.

Mr. Steen: Does my hon. Friend agree that, even if we object, it does no good?

Mr. Paterson: That is right. We are involved in a charade of reactive scrutiny. At best, we may get Ministers to return to the Council, if there is still time, to put their point of view, but they are also under pressure, because of the great drive to ensure that the Council passes the legislation.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): Is not the problem the fact that Ministers are not obliged to return to the Council even if they have the time to do so and whatever the Scrutiny Committee says? Ministers are members of the Government, who have their own policy, and whatever the view of the Scrutiny Committee—whether or not it is dominated by members of the governing party—Minsters will follow the Government's agreed policy.

Mr. Paterson: That is true in many cases. Of course, the attitude of some of the members of the Committee does not help. At one of the first meetings that I attended, a Government Member referred to an intervention made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stone and said that it was not our business to make life difficult for Ministers when they negotiate on behalf of the United Kingdom in the Council, as though our role was to shut up and whiz the document through.

All parties are in favour of enlargement. We have a strategic and moral obligation to enlarge the European Union. Last week a report on the status of every applicant country was produced, but we received only a brief summary stating that the report existed. If any of us had had time, we could have picked up a copy of it from the Vote Office. After all, there is no point in going to the Vote Office to ask for a lengthy document that has already been agreed to and is a matter of only academic interest. The problem is worse than that because Departments are not performing as requested. They are not adhering to the 10-day limit; they are not sending documents to the staff in time, exactly as my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde said.

Annexe G of the Modernisation Committee's report on the scrutiny of European business, published on 9 June 1998, says:

"11 November, DfEE asks for three items to be taken urgently at the next day's meeting, because they will be considered at the Special Employment Council the next week. This has been known for some considerable time, but nothing has been said to the Committee."

That trick is intended to get measures through the Committee. Documents are held back in the Ministry, then released to the Committee just inside the six-week deadline.

Annexe G continues:

"17 November, Tessa Jowell writes about advertising of tobacco products, on which the Committee is due to take evidence on 19 November."

Her letter is addressed on the envelope to the Chairman by name, and is sent second class. It arrives on 20 November, the day after the evidence session. The annexe continues:

"26 November, Dawn Primarolo takes debate in European Standing Committee B on harmful tax competition; appears unaware of any difference between the Select Committee and the Standing Committee, quoting EMs that have been referred to 'the committee'... and assuring the Standing Committee that it will have a full opportunity to scrutinise future EMs.

28 November, John Battle's letter of 1 September on renewable sources of energy is faxed at our request. The original was addressed to the Chairman and never received. No Clerk's copy received. Existence of letter only discovered afer a subsequent letter referred to it."

Not only do we have an unhappy system of scrutiny, which is under terrible pressure, but the Government are not delivering documents to the relevant people on time as they are required to do under their own standards.

I shall refer to three measures that have dramatically damaged businesses and people in this country, the first of which barely touched Parliament—the introduction of the working time directive. The directive came into force on 1 October 1998. The then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, now Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, laid the regulations before Parliament on 30 July, but the House went into recess on 31 July. The House of Commons did not debate the regulations until 27 October and the House of Lords did not do so until 4 November. That shows total contempt for Parliament.

The working time regulations could be described as the most expensive legislative measure ever imposed on the British citizenry. The Government estimate that the regulations will cost £1.9 billion in the first year and £2.3 billion a year after November 1999. It is assumed that the enforcement of working time regulations could increase the work load of industrial tribunals and the number of tribunals could rise from 3,000 to 6,000 a year.

The measure has caused total consternation in business groups, to which the Government are supposedly so friendly. The Construction Federation believes that the measure would increase labour costs by 2 to 3 per cent. The Federation of Small Businesses argued that the measure would require burdensome record keeping. The Institute of Directors undertook a survey and found that only 3 per cent. said that the directive would help their business. Overall, the IOD said that the working time directive would harm British companies' competitiveness and ability to create jobs.

The Government's favourite business man, Lord Haskins, described the measure as "a dog's dinner", asserting that the Government had ignored the warning that the directive could result in a plethora of law suits. The problem is worse than that because the interpretation and implementation of the directives are entirely in the hands of civil servants. No mechanism for amendment or repeal exists.

The Federation of Small Businesses stated in its annual report:

"the major worry was that the final regulations were only published on 30th July 1999, just two months before they became law, which left many business owners unaware of the full provisions . . . Employers' understanding of the regulations was further affected due to the Department of Trade and Industry's original guide containing serious errors. The guide included the wrong formula for working out compliance with the 48-hour week and an arithmetical error in an example of night work calculation."

Ruth Lea, the head of the IOD's policy unit said that the measures

"impose costly new obligations and to make matters worse . . . business has only had two months to comply with the new regulations, some of which are far from clear."

That could not have happened under our traditional system, in which such slack drafting and faults in the original legislation would have been ironed out in our exhaustive system of Second and Third Readings and in Committee.

The working time directive shows how Parliament can be effectively excluded from serious participation in a measure that will have huge consequences for millions of people. The Pollution Prevention and Control Bill shows that, despite a Bill having been considered in both Houses of Parliament, all the effective discussion had taken place when drafting the directive, which reflects what my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde said. Parliament proved incapable of amending the Bill in any worthwhile way, because Ministers always fell back on the argument that the amendment in question was incompatible with the directive—directive 96/61, which gives enormous powers to the Environment Agency to introduce virtually any regulation that it wants and to change the nature of certain substantial industries. In the other place, Lord Peyton said:

"I do not believe that I have ever seen a Bill which shows more manifestly a deep and profound contempt for Parliament."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 15 February 1999; Vol. 597, c. 471.]

Back in the real world, I received a fax yesterday from a substantial poultry producer on the Welsh border. It was originally thought that the poultry industry would not be covered by the environmental legislation. However, the effect on him is catastrophic. He said:

"The expected cost to our business at current rates will be approximately £100,000 registration fee and £40,000 annually thereafter."

He also said:

"Nobody can tell me what is involved and what impact this will have on my business bearing in mind we are meeting all current environmental legislation."

He is worried about the "Cost of registration and ongoing fees being completely out of line with current agricultural cost."

I have received similar comments from the National Pig Association, which points out that integrated pollution controls were not conceived for agricultural industries, the pig and poultry industries being arbitrarily specified at the last minute. The National Farmers Union makes an even more telling comment in a memo to me on the integrated pollution prevention and control directive. It refers to which brings us back to the issue of gold-plating—

"the difficulty of interpreting European environmental directives"—

"which are phrased in very broad and imprecise terms with no statement of how they are intended to actually operate. This contrasts with UK legislation whch tends to be much more precise and detailed, and is backed by formal government guidance as to the intention of how the details should operate."

The memo ends by stating:

"A significant problem with European environmental legislation is that where unintended or unanticipated effects arise, changes can only be implemented where member states are unanimous. This means that for practical purposes, most mistakes or unintended consequences cannot be remedied. The Commission's zealous attitude towards compliance with the letter of the law means that the financial consequences of mistakes or unintended consequences from European environmental legislation tend to fully impact on the affected sectors. In combination with UK legislation requiring the costs of regulation to be fully recovered from industry, this means that in the agricultural sector farmers bear the full financial consequences of deficiencies in the drafting of European environmental legislation."

Two critical points should be made. First, there is no means of repeal or amendment; and, secondly, hon. Members have no say in the implementation of such hugely costly and vindictive measures for our constituents.

Even more bizarrely, the new system allows laws that all three parties oppose to be imposed on this country. As topical examples, I would cite droit de suite and the withholding tax, on which the Scrutiny Commitee has touched. There is no demand for the former in the art world—I should declare an interest, as my wife works for Sotheby's—and it could cost the art world £68 million in revenues. The auction trade will disappear to New York, because works of art are easily transported. The latter could have a catastrophic effect on the City of London and could change the nature of the south of England. Bizarrely, the Labour party, the Liberal Democrats and the Conservative party all oppose it. As I said at the beginning, we are reacting to legislation initiated in another place, and we have no role in the initiation procedure.

The Scrutiny Committee's report was taken up by the Modernisation Commiittee. Improvements have been made, the terms of reference have been expanded, and Ministers are now required to report before and after Council meetings, although we have had the pleasure of seeing only one Minister, who sits before us.

Select Committees should have a much stronger role to enable them to call Ministers before and after Council meetings. The big democratic hole is that Council meetings are held in secret. It was a pity that the proposal for five Standing Committees was reduced to three, but, having sat on one, I realise that they do not change anything. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde said, hon. Members can listen to a long debate, go to the Library and mug up after 10 days, but after the vote. The Minister returns to the Council and nothing is changed. It is shameful that the Government's business managers rejected the Scrutiny Committee's recommendation that measures proposed to be debated on the Floor of the House should be, and that a special motion should be necessary to enable them to be debated in Committee.

The real place for reform is Brussels, at the time of initiation. It is entirely positive that we have now established a parliamentary office in Brussels and that Members of Parliament should be involved at the very earliest stage, when legislation is being drafted. Once legislation has gone to the Council, it is almost invariably too late. MPs should work very closely with that new office—which is independent of UKREP—on the development of legislation from the beginning.

If a measure presented to the House were subject to a free vote, and 100 Members opposed it, that should constitute a veto, and the Minister should not be allowed to propose the measure in the Council. I cannot conceive of a stronger weapon than for the Minister to go to Brussels next week to discuss the withholding tax and say that 100 Members of the oldest continuously running Parliament in western civilization had voted in a free vote against it. That would concur with the Modernisation Committee's summary:

"We agree with the Government that any review of the Scrutiny system should strengthen the role of Parliament, improve democratic oversight, and increase transparency and Parliamentary awareness."

That should be debated at the IGC and built into the next treaty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I fear that the next speaker will be the last before the winding-up speeches, unless those who are winding up for the Liberal Democrats or for the official Opposition are prepared to donate some of their time.

11.57 am

Mr. William Cash (Stone): After 15 years on the Scrutiny Committee, this is the first opportunity that I have had to speak in such a debate, and I have three minutes, if I am lucky. Having said that, I am sure that hon. Members who have not yet spoken will be good enough to take account of the fact that I have accumulated a certain amount of experience and anxiety, as well as judgment, on the scrutiny of European legislation and its impact on our constituents.

The fundamental question is who governs us and how. The scrutiny of legislation is the result of the system that has evolved since we entered the European Community in 1972 and is at the heart of the future conduct of our parliamentary system. I am sure that we shall need another opportunity to consider the matter.

I speak as one who took a fairly active part in resisting encroachments on our national sovereignty under the previous Government, and who regards the matter as one of national interest rather than exclusively of party politics. I am woefully aware of the resistance on the part of Governments of all shapes, sizes and varieties to any attempt to scrutinise effectively and amend legislation that emanates from the system that has evolved since 1972 for the United Kingdom. I had to cross-examine the Leader of the House of the previous Parliament on resistance to holding important debates on the Floor of the House, and got absolutely nowhere. The same applies to this Government and the current Leader of the House.

There is a serious resistance to holding proper debates on European legislation, because the Government want to manipulate it. We wanted to debate fisheries in the previous Parliament, but we were refused. There was no doubt whatever in my mind that the delivery of the papers in relation to fisheries and matters concerned with monetary union was orchestrated so that the minimum amount of time would be available, and so that decisions would be taken in the Council of Ministers at a time that would preclude our being able to organise debates on the Floor of the House. The issue relates to the manner in which the Leader of the House organises business in conjunction with the Whips.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) mentioned the free vote, an issue that I raised in a previous debate. If we are to be governed in a democratic system in which the people of this country have confidence, it seems absolutely fundamental that they should not have laws imposed on them under section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972 without those laws being properly scrutinised after the Council of Ministers has considered them. There should also be a verifiable pre-Council system to give the people of this country confidence that, if enough Members of Parliament resist the Council's proposals, there will be an opportunity at the avant-projet stage to consider them on the Floor of the House, in the national interest and without regard to the whipping system.

I am being blunt about that. In the words of Lord Hailsham, we are faced with an elective dictatorship, and it is made much worse by the introduction of the European aspect. We have an elective dictatorship not only in terms of legislation that comes through the British Cabinet, in the name of the electorate and those elected in general elections who represent and are accountable to them, but in terms of the majority voting of other countries, which denies us any real means to put up some resistance or serious diversion of the proposals.

If we argue, as we did in Amsterdam on the declaration on national Parliaments, that those Parliaments have an important role to play, it is axiomatic that muscles should be provided to enable them to have a free vote. If that were laid down by Standing Orders, as it should be, the Whips would be in breach of parliamentary procedures and privilege if they put pressure on hon. Members to vote in a specific way.

That may seem radical, although perhaps only to the Whips Office. I suggest that the same rules should apply as normally apply to Select Committees. We are dealing with a cascade of legislation over which we have increasingly less control. If 100 or 150 Members of Parliament tabled a motion, a free vote should be allowed under Standing Orders. We would then have a proper and effective means of demonstrating that the veto must be used in such circumstances.

I propose a fundamental and radical solution. It is essential for us to remember that what was relevant in 1972 is not relevant now. We have had a vast engagement in European government since the Maastricht treaty, which was why I opposed it so vigorously. Now we have the Amsterdam treaty and a new IGC to come.

I do not buy the argument that we are not in European government yet. We are. We have to stand up for our constituents in the national Parliament, and we should devise procedures that will be effective in dealing with European government. We must not merely end up with a talking shop.

12.4 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on securing what is an apposite debate, coming shortly before the Helsinki meeting. It is also an appropriate time to reconsider the seventh report of the Scrutiny Committee, which has changed some of our procedures. Many of us think that it has not gone far enough.

I did not feel, however, that the hon. Gentleman developed the theme of the effect of scrutiny to any great extent. I am indebted to the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) and the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), who addressed the issue of how we effectively or otherwise scrutinise European business. The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) was not entirely generous to his colleagues in his use of time, but he amply demonstrated the difficulties that he has experienced in keeping pace with European scrutiny.

What do we want in a system for Parliament to do its job effectively? We need to be able to scrutinise the vast quantity of material that emerges from the European Union—I agree with the hon. Member for Hexham that there is far too much of it. We must deal with the legislation effectively before it becomes part of British law.

As the right hon. Member for Fylde mentioned, we should also consider effectively the pre-legislation material, such as the draft directives. We need to see what is coming down the track. If we do not do so at that stage, as a Parliament we have no means of influencing decisions taken or positions adopted on behalf of this country by the Government. We must also consider the foreign policy aspects and the diplomatic interface that we have with our European partners.

Effective scrutiny and information are required so that all hon. Members—not merely those involved in the relevant Committees—have access to information that they need to do their jobs on behalf of their constituents and to be aware of events. We must have intelligence as to what happens elsewhere. We need to know not only what is proposed by Ministers in this Parliament, but what other Parliaments say about legislation and what is likely to appear before us in future. Too often, we react to proposals far too late, rather than being proactive in taking positions of our own or influencing decisions at an early stage.

We need to know what Her Majesty's Government's intentions are in negotiating on our behalf. We must be able to judge their performance in meeting their intentions as stated before a Council meeting.

The mechanism to scrutinise foreign policy effectively is provided through the Foreign Affairs Committee, of which I was pleased to be a member for some time. Its position should be clarified, vis-a-vis other Committees. The consideration of the presidency's intentions and the proceedings of the European Council should clearly be matters for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and its Committee.

The new Scrutiny Committees are rightly constituted to consider the details of legislation but are far too general in scope. They are built on the architectural notion of Europe's three pillars, which I dislike and which is not what the Modernisation Committee first recommended. It suggested that the Scrutiny Committees be closely focused on specific subject matters. If that were so, they would do their job much more effectively. They are overwhelmed by a mass of material on which they cannot be expert. Can there be appropriate scrutiny of, for instance, the detailed agricultural measures proposed by the European Union in a Committee that has so many other responsibilities?

There is a danger of ghettoising European issues in establishing Scrutiny Committees to do the job. Many hon. Members do not have the privilege of serving on them, so they become something that merely involves someone else. That is not a satisfactory way in which to proceed. We need a much clearer mechanism than that to ensure that matters are discussed fully on the Floor of the House. When certain matters are of concern to a wide range of hon. Members, it should be for Parliament, not for Ministers, to decide whether they are debated by the House. There should be a better mechanism by which such decisions are taken.

One of the main problems concerning information is filtering the quantity of material so that we have in a digest form that which is relevant to our business as Members of Parliament. I agree with the right hon. Member for Fylde: something along the lines of the regular publication "The Week in Europe" would be of enormous help to us. The parliamentary office in Brussels must be one of the best kept secrets in the House. It is almost as though it had been considered to be exempt material under the Freedom of Information Bill. Few hon. Members know of the existence of that new office, and even fewer know how to access it. I know that it exists, but I do not have the slightest idea how to access information from it, or to relay information to it. It needs to be publicised much better than it has been and there must be a more transparent mechanism for getting in touch with it.

It is absolutely essential that, before Ministers attend Councils of Ministers, they give an account to Parliament about what they are to discuss and report back after those discussions have taken place. We must have the option of interrogation. I am no longer a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, but I remember when that Committee interrogated the Foreign Secretary. Such action has not become commonplace by the Scrutiny Committees. Our proceedings in Westminster Hall give us more scope in how to work out ways in which to present such matters to Parliament and will allow for a wider position to be taken.

If the subsidiarity protocols are to mean anything, the House must occasionally be able to affirm the principle of subsidiarity and say that a matter is one on which it wants to make a decision. If we do not have the mechanisms for property scrutiny, Parliament cannot do that and we will be less well served as a result.

Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on securing this debate and other right hon. and hon. Friends for their powerful contributions to it, some of which I shall refer to in my remarks. Important issues have been raised that affect all hon. Members because they concern the effectiveness of the House and our role in it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) said, it is a question of who governs us and how. It is also important to recognise that that issue is becoming more important as the volume of regulation and directives from the European Union increases.

In Amsterdam, the Government surrendered our veto in 16 areas and it is evident that they propose in the next treaty to surrender our veto in a further 19. As a result, as Mr. Prodi, the President of the Commission, said, qualified majority voting will become the norm. It was interesting that, in last week's European debate, the Foreign Secretary said that majority voting was already the rule in the European Union.

Given that many proposed directives are being cooked up in the Commission, the volume of regulations and directives from Brussels will increase, not diminish, in the next two years to a new high, so how we scrutinise, get ahead of, examine and discuss those new regulations and laws more openly with people throughout the country is fundamental. Let us remember that there is a substantial democratic deficit in that regard.

The Minister will no doubt have experienced on his bus trips the widespread disillusionment that is felt in the business community about the whole conduct of regulation from Brussels. Regulatory issues for small and large businesses, as I know from my experience, pose a bigger problem than any other matter that concerns the future of the European Union. A poll published in the Financial Times last week showed that 51 per cent. of the population would like to withdraw from the European Union—an opinion that we should take extremely seriously. A complete failure of the democratic process to scrutinise and examine European legislation is part of the reason for that disillusionment.

How Governments of both parties have implemented European legislation leaves much to be desired. My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) referred graphically to examples when this House failed the country because of its inability to examine in detail regulations and directives as they are proposed. Our standard of implementation is poor. We have a global reputation for gold-plating, which is nothing to be proud of; it has affected small businesses, jobs and individuals. The problem is not confined to Conservative Members. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) made an extremely insightful and thoughtful speech and I agree with much of what he said.

It is also true that Ministers have previously expressed concern about the matter. I wish to cite one example. Six months ago, in his Jean Monnet lecture, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry gave a commitment and stated specifically:

> "I want to see all new European regulation independently appraised for its impact on small businesses and certified as being small business friendly. I think this would make a real difference to small businesses here and in the whole of Europe."

Most of us—both Government and Opposition Members—would endorse this view. Given the fact that six months have now elapsed and that we have heard precious little since then, I hope that the Minister will tell us what progress has been made towards the establishment of that independent appraisal process.

Although our parliamentary process is often held up as a model of modern western democracy, in the area of European legislation, which now accounts for a large proportion of total new regulation in Britain, the record is poor and is arguably worse than in some other member states. For example, Denmark and Sweden have adopted the approach of ensuring that they are more proactive and that their Parliaments can get ahead of the regulation as opposed to reacting to it after it has been passed.

Serious questions have been raised in the debate by my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), as well as by my hon. Friends the Members for North Shropshire and for Stone about the workings of the Scrutiny Committee and Standing Committees and I hope that the Minister will deal with them specifically in his response. It is hard to avoid the impression that the whole process adds up to regulation by stealth and is tantamount to contempt for parliamentary practice. We have heard about the failure to debate important issues on the Floor of the House and to provide papers in advance of discussion and adequate briefings. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire said, the process is close to a charade and degenerates to a farce.

I trust that the Minister will address such matters seriously and that he will depart from the prepared text that is in front of him. Important questions have been asked, and to refresh his memory I shall summarise some of them. What steps will he take to strengthen the role and effectiveness of the House of Commons in the context of enlargement and the forthcoming increase in European regulations? Given the institutional changes in Europe, now is a good time to deal with that. What assurances can he give us that the inadequacies of the scrutiny process will be dealt with? How will he address the need for a better mechanism for getting issues on to the Floor of the House? What is being done to implement the commitment of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to hold a business-friendly audit of EU regulation?

Will the Minister deal with the serious proposals raised by my hon. Friends the Members for North Shropshire and for Stone for pre-discussion and proper scrutiny of our negotiating position prior to meetings of the Council of Ministers and provide us with a better opportunity to hold Ministers to account for their conduct at the Council of Ministers? What will he do to encourage more openness in the conduct of the Council of Ministers and in the publication of voting records, agendas and so forth? Will he demonstrate a greater appetite to address seriously such issues than he has been able to do in the past few weeks? We appreciate that he has been on a bus trip around Europe and we much enjoyed the ribald remarks that he made in previous debates about that, about European issues and about my business career, but the time has come for him to deal specifically with the issues that we have raised. They are fundamental and I hope that he will respond to them.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Keith Vaz): As this is my first appearance in this new Chamber, I welcome you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to the Chair and congratulate you on your appointment.

The debate has been good, and I do not usually attract the amount of support that is present today when I make winding-up speeches. I congratulate the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on his good fortune in securing the debate. As with all European debates, the Eurostars—or perhaps I should call them the anti-Eurostars—are present, including the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash). For him, Europe and the world are not enough, and he often comes to debates such as this one to remind us of his experience. The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Sir R. Body) is also present. I am sorry that he was unable to participate in the debate, as I had looked forward to hearing his remarks. We also heard a contribution from another noted participant in debates such as this, the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), who has unfortunately had to leave.

I shall come to other hon. Members' comments in a moment. I should restate at the outset the Government's position on Europe and the scrutiny of European legislation. I think that we all accept that Britain's position in Europe is hugely important and that decisions made at EU level have an impact on us all. That is why parliamentary scrutiny of EU legislation is so important, and why I welcome this debate. Parliament must be promptly and fully informed about European legislation and about the Government's approach to the imminent negotiations—I shall speak about Helsinki at the end of my remarks. That is why the Government conducted an overhaul of our domestic scrutiny processes. We want European decision making to be brought closer to the people whom it affects, and transparency and democratic oversight of new legislation are vital to the process.

The United Kingdom is acknowledged to have one of the most highly developed systems for scrutiny of EU business. That is why I was disappointed to hear so much criticism from members of the Scrutiny Committee. The hon. Member for Stone may find this surprising, but I pay tribute to people such as him for their work on the Committee. When I was in Brussels recently, members of the Commission were disappointed that he was not part of the team that went to meet them, because they had heard so much about him. I do not know whether his criticism of Europe extends to a refusal to visit it, but Commission members were disappointed not to meet him. All hon. Members who serve on the Scrutiny Committee play a valuable and important part in the scrutiny process.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Vaz: No. I am left with seven minutes, and, although I am happy to respond to hon. Members' concerns, I want to respond to at least some of the points that have already been made.

As hon. Members will know, arrangements for parliamentary oversight of European legislation have been in place since 1973. The Government built on those arrangements in our White Paper of November 1998, which was endorsed by the House on 17 November 1998. The new scrutiny arrangements, which have now been in place for almost a year, allow the House to consider new European legislation arising across the three pillars of EU activity. The commitment made by Ministers not to agree legislation that is still under scrutiny has been extended to the second and third pillars.

We have also introduced a new system of pre and post-Council scrutiny, which is enabling the Scrutiny Committee to keep abreast of developments in the Council of Ministers. The hon. Member for Stone will remember that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary was able to speak to the Committee last week, before the Helsinki summit. We had a six-hour debate on the very issues that are to be discussed in Helsinki. No hon. Member can say that he or she is suffering from a lack of scrutiny of European legislation. I have spent the past two weeks heavily engaged in these matters, as have other hon. Members. The initiative undertaken by the House to establish a national parliamentary office in Brussels will also enhance Westminster's awareness of EU issues. The Government welcome the strengthening of the role of the United Kingdom Parliament in the European Union.

The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), a distinguished former Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, made several points. As a recently appointed Minister for Europe, I share some of the concerns he expressed, having had to get to grips with everything that is happening there. I found, however, that I was extremely well served by the civil servants at UKREP. During the past eight weeks, we have been served by an effective machine made up of the best civil servants dealing with European legislation of any country in the European Union. I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman does not share my view. I know that civil servants served him well and that he was able to do an effective job. I am glad to see that he joins me in paying tribute to them, as they provide an effective means of ensuring not only that Ministers are informed but that we receive and pass on documents released through Brussels mechanisms as quickly as possible. The right hon. Gentleman also asked about MEPs. I, too, would like to make better use of Members of the European Parliament. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that they regularly come to Westminster when their advice is sought and to give evidence to Select Committees.

The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) has had an unfortunate first six weeks as a member of the Committee. I hope that things can only get better for him. My civil servants make every effort that is humanly possible to ensure that Clerks receive information about European legislation as quickly as possible. I shall look into the hon. Gentleman's points about mislaid letters. As a Member of Parliament, I believe that if hon. Members are considering important legislation, relevant letters and documents should not be lost. We shall examine the system to see how it can be improved, but I do not think that it can be. The hon. Gentleman has to read the papers in question, so he knows that we have to deal with thousands of documents every year. It is very regrettable if one or two go missing, but we shall look into the reasons and try to ensure that it does not happen again.

We shall do our best, as the Clerk of the Committee tries his or her best, to ensure that improvements are made. I have discussed the possibility of telephoning Clerks to say that documents are on their way, but we could be in permanent conversation as there are so many such documents. We shall consider presentational aspects and reflect on comments about making the language of the documents even more effective.

Points were also made about procedure and about the way in which draft directives are deposited. As only two minutes remain, I shall write to all the hon. Members who expressed concerns—I am sorry to place a greater burden on those assisting me—but to whom I have not had the opportunity to reply because of the fruitful discussion that we have had.

I am looking forward to going to Helsinki and to attending tomorrow's historic European Council meeting. Hon. Members are right to say enlargement will affect the way in which the Commission is run. The Government are at the forefront of ensuring that the Commission is run as efficiently and as accountably as possible. We will ensure that such transparency is at the forefront of our campaign to improve Commission institutions.

It is sad that the message sent out by Opposition spokesmen to Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia is so negative. Last night, I met European ambassadors from central and eastern European countries. They think that the Conservative party does not want them in Europe, because of the language that it uses. The hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) should carefully consider his comments and those of other Opposition Members. The message that they are sending out to the rest of Europe is negative, and I hope that they will retract some of their remarks.

Grammar Schools (Lincolnshire)

12.30 pm

Sir Richard Body (Boston and Skegness): I am grateful for this opportunity to express a concern that is felt by many thousands of people in Lincolnshire and shared by many people in other counties that still have the grammar school system. I also want to apologise to the Minister for School Standards for having caused her some inconvenience the other evening. As so often, on such occasions, the fault rests with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, where I was waiting for a summons to come to the House, but it was not delivered.

I do not know whether the Minister is new Labour or old Labour, but it may not matter much because, whichever she is, one suspects that there is a natural antipathy to the independent sector—a feeling that those who can afford to give their children a private education should not do so. If that is the case, surely the answer is to raise the standards of the state sector so high that parents no longer need to send their children to independent schools and spend tens of thousands of pounds in so doing. That is exactly the position in Lincolnshire.

Lincolnshire is one of our largest counties. Its population includes many thousands of parents who could afford to send their children to be educated privately in one of our famous schools. However, one of the county's distinctive features is that it has no independent schools at secondary level, with the possible exception of Stamford, which is tucked away in the south-west corner of the county and attracts most of its pupils from ouside the county. Therefore, within the county itself, tens of thousands of parents who could afford to send their children to independent schools do not do so because they know that the standards in Lincolnshire are so high that it is unnecessary. Surely, that is the paradigm at which the Government should aim—a state sector so good that parents do not need to use the private sector and sacrifice much of their income to do so.

In Lincolnshire there are many grammar schools, which are open to pupils from whatever background and contain the widest possible social mix. In my constituency, there are many pupils whose parents are out of work and receiving state benefits. Sitting beside those children in the classrooms are children from affluent families. I would have thought that the Minister would approve of that desirable social mix.

Skegness grammar school was the first to apply for, and to receive, grant-maintained status. Having done so, it began to admit boarders. It now has 69 boarders, many of whom come from areas where the comprehensive system operates and is failing pupils. Parents feel that their children would be disadvantaged were they to send them to those schools, so they make the journey to Skegness, where they have found a school of the highest standards. Furthermore—I ask the Minister to bear this in mind—it is not only parents in the United Kingdom who send children to Skegness grammar school. Remarkably, there is now a waiting list of parents from outside the United Kingdom who want to send their children to the school. They come from as far afield as the far east—Hong Kong, for example. The school already has some pupils from the far east and from Germany. I do not know whether the Minister can think of any comprehensive school that attracts pupils from abroad because their parents believe that its standards are so outstandingly high that they wish to send their children across the seas to be educated there, but parents are sending their children to Skegness grammar school from abroad.

I have had the honour to represent the Skegness area for only the past two years. It is a smallish town of about 14,000 people. It is a holiday resort, the air is bracing and it is an excellent place in many ways, but it is not a town that would be instantly known to many people abroad. Despite that, parents are willing to make the journey from Germany and other countries to take advantage of the high-quality education offered there. I put it to the Minister that that is a remarkable fact. Skegness grammar school must be one of the only state sector schools that attracts pupils from outside the country, and has a waiting list of such pupils. Its headmaster has to turn people away and say, "I am sorry, but I cannot take any more pupils from abroad."

In case the Minister suggests that there is any form of elitism there, I emphasise that there is a very good social mix at Skegness grammar school, to which I have already alluded. Children whose parents are on social security are educated alongside children whose parents are extremely well off.

There are two other grammar schools, or the equivalent, in my constituency: Boston grammar school and Boston high school, both of which have extremely high standards. For many years, Miss Webb was the headmistress of Boston high school, and she attracted staff from the private sector who wanted to teach in her school. I am glad to say that the present headmaster is maintaining that high standard and is attracting staff from other countries to teach there. That also is remarkable.

The staff at those three schools—I suspect that the same applies to other grammar schools in the county—are apprehensive about the future. They have come to Lincolnshire to teach in those schools because they offer an intellectual challenge, and the staff appreciate the ambience—to use a somewhat overused word—to be found there. There might be an emphasis on academic work in those schools, but that encourages staff to apply for jobs there, and they would be reluctant to apply if the schools were part of the comprehensive system. Indeed, many of those staff have come from the comprehensive system, albeit the more academic streams of that system. I say to the Minister—I hope that she will bear this in mind—that many of those staff are worried about what the future holds and wonder whether they would be wise to start looking for posts in the private sector. We all know that morale among teaching staff is not high in the state sector at the moment. They believe that there is bureaucracy and that they have too little control over the decisions that are taken in their schools. That is not the case in the private sector, where staff morale is high. Too many teachers in Lincolnshire's grammar schools will look for new posts if they believe that the decision has been taken to merge their schools with secondary moderns. That would be a tragedy. The high standard in Lincolnshire's schools is due to high-quality staff. The danger is that if that quality is lowered, the schools will suffer.

The Minister could mention the ballot to allow the public to decide, but she knows, as I do—I shall not rehearse the arguments—that that will be loaded against the grammar schools. She might be interested to know that Lincolnshire county council has not always been Conservative. For four years, until two years ago, we had a Labour-Liberal coalition that was a little ambivalent about grammar schools, but it is mute now because it would be politically unpopular to raise the subject.

We have debated the issue in Lincolnshire. The debate began when Shirley Williams, as Secretary of State for Education, threatened the closure of our grammar schools. We fought and won a great battle, and I can detect no substantial feeling in the country against grammar schools, which are seen as a wonderful opportunity for boys and girls—however poor and disadvantaged they may be—to receive a first-class education that is as good as any in the private sector. Many have gone on to Oxford and Cambridge and, from there, to distinguished careers in the professions and elsewhere.

It would be a total tragedy to lose the remarkable blend of excellence without elitism. Elitism plays no part in education in Lincolnshire. I hope that the Minister will have kind words for our education system and assure both parents and staff that it will not be threatened. The issue has been debated over the years. Even the Liberal Democrats and the Labour party are quiet on the subject. We want to retain grammar schools without the threat of their closure. If the Minister is in doubt, she should visit the schools in Lincolnshire, which would impress her greatly.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I support the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Boston and Skegness (Sir R. Body). Grammar schools are beacons of excellence in our education system. It is high time that their opponents learned the fundamental lesson that we shall never improve the rest of our schools by destroying some of the best of our schools.

The simple truth is that the ballot procedure is weighted against the grammar schools. I know that the Minister has strong views on this matter, but it would be unconscionable, under a Government who spout the mantra of support for the many, not the few, if we were, as we approach the next millennium, to replace selection according to ability to achieve with selection according to ability to pay. That would be a disgrace and a scandal, and the Conservative party would have nothing to do with it. We shall fight as the only national political party unequivocally committed to the retention of the outstanding grammar schools, some of which are in the county of Lincolnshire and one of which is in the constituency so admirably represented by my hon. Friend.

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): I congratulate you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on your appointment to chair these trial Adjournment debates. I also congratulate the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Sir R. Body) on securing the debate and thank him for his apology for failing to turn up the last time that we discussed a similar matter.

I accept the sincerity of the hon. Gentleman's words and what he says about the quality of education in the schools in his constituency. I join him in congratulating all nursery, primary and secondary school teachers in Boston and Skegness, and throughout Lincolnshire, on their work. It was interesting that we heard little about the schools in Boston and Skegness that are not grammar schools. We know, by definition of the system, that where there are grammar schools, there are secondary modern schools, which I think are called high schools in Boston and Skegness. I also want to record, as the hon. Gentleman did not, that in the non-grammar schools in his constituency there are strong teacher commitment, good teacher skills and a lot of student progress. We should appreciate all that teachers do in his constituency.

The Government have no antipathy to the independent sector. We have made more efforts to forge links and join partnerships with the independent sector than the Conservatives did. The sector has welcomed the independent-state school partnership funding that we have made available. However, I agree that it would be intolerable if parents believed that the only way to get a good education was to go to the independent sector. I defend a parent's right to buy an education for their child. Our responsibility is to ensure that parents are not forced to make that choice because there are no good schools elsewhere.

Where I differ from the hon. Gentleman is that I do not believe that the only way to assure parents that they need not buy education is to offer them a selective school system. Throughout the country, non-selective local authority comprehensive schools are getting good results even though they teach children across the ability range. The hon. Gentleman asked whether parents who live abroad are queueing up to send their children to comprehensive schools. Funnily enough, on a radio interview about primary performance tables this morning, which I did not know about before 7 am, I was asked what I thought about a small maintained non-selective school in Oxfordshire which parents from America were queueing up to send their children to because of its good literacy and numeracy results.

Let us not fall into the trap of thinking that the only good schools are those in the selective system. If we take the view that the only way to get high standards is to have grammar schools, we must admit that we cannot meet the challenge of raising standards for every child. The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), who seems to be the Opposition spokesman on grammar schools, is vociferous on this issue. He pledged that his Government, if there ever is one, would be committed to keeping grammar schools. That is the Conservatives' problem. This Government are committed to raising standards in 24,000 schools, not to keeping good standards in only 164 schools. That is the challenge. I accept that there are good standards in grammar schools, but the crusade for our school service is greater than that; it is about how we meet the needs of the country so that we have a work force, a population and a learning community in which standards rise for everyone.

There is a debate about whether the best way to raise standards and achieve excellence for everyone is to have selective education, but that is the wrong question. We have successfully announced and published performance tables for literacy and numeracy at primary school level. They show that, with good teaching and good strategies, and working from best practice with properly funded schools, training and support for teachers and, above all, clear, high expectations of everyone in the education service, we can raise standards in every school. Today's literacy and numeracy results show that, whether in urban or rural areas, poor or affluent areas, areas where they thought they could not do it or areas where they have always been sure that they could, with the right mixture of good teaching and proper leadership we can raise standards across the board. We must achieve that for the whole system.

I mention that because it proves that our task is doable. I am not content to leave this country's future—or its children's future—to the risk of whether children can get into a grammar school. If the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness had said that his constituency had a system of grammar schools and secondary modern schools all of which raised standards for all children, we might have had a different debate.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Ms Morris: I will give way shortly, because I promised, but I remind the hon. Member for Buckingham that in his note he said that he would not make a speech—and he has had the opportunity to do so.

If the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness had made the argument that I described, the debate might have been different. However, clearly that our challenge is not to defend the future admission arrangements of 164 schools, but to ensure that we raise standards in 24,000 schools. We must do that. Grammar schools were set up when this country needed only a few children to achieve the highest levels, and they delivered that, but the debate has moved on and the task now is to construct a system that raises standards for everyone.

I want to make one more point; then I shall give way to the hon. Member for Buckingham. I assure the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness that he should not feel downhearted. I appreciate that his experience as a Member of Parliament representing an area with selective education; on the whole, that is not my experience, though there are a small number of selective schools in my constituency. My teaching experience took place in an authority that was highly comprehensive. Across a range of local authorities and schools, the highest-achieving 24 per cent. in comprehensive schools achieve at the same level as those in grammar schools—the figure is about 24 per cent. in most local authorities. Therefore the bright children who are educated in local education authorities with no selection achieve at the level of those who are taught in selective schools. The evidence shows that children who achieve at high levels can do so whether they go to a selective or comprehensive school.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. I feel compelled to point out that this is not a general debate. It is a 30-minute Adjournment debate which, under the conventions of the House, is an opportunity for individual hon. Members to speak directly with and gain responses from Ministers; it should not be an opportunity for Front-Bench Opposition spokesmen to intervene. On this occasion, as the Minister has allowed it, it may happen, but it is extraordinary and it will not create a precedent.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful for that guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall take note of it. I am also grateful to the Minister for her generosity in giving way. Will she accept that she cannot get away with painting the Conservative party as the supporter of only grammar schools? I myself attended a comprehensive school and I accept the importance of supporting good schools of whatever structure. The Minister said that it was standards, not structure, that mattered.

I think that it is clear that the Minister is hostile to selection, but will she now answer a question that she has previously always ducked? If she had a vote in a grammar school ballot, would she answer the ballot question yes or no?

Ms Morris: The hon. Gentleman has put on the record his views about what the Conservative party defends. I am happy for people to read the record and compare his intervention with what he said earlier.

I turn to the current arrangements for grammar school ballots. We have set up a mechanism whereby local people can decide what a school's future admission arrangements should be. The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness rightly said that this has always been an issue. As far back as I can remember, the presence or absence of selective admission arrangements has been a political and an educational issue that has never gone away. It was an issue for Mrs. Thatcher when she was Secretary of State for Education—that is why she changed the admission arrangements in more grammar schools than anyone else—it was an issue for the Labour party when it was last in government and it is an issue now.

Given that the issue will not go away, there are three ways of deciding whether to change admission arrangments. We can decide on it as a Government; we can let the local authority decide; or we can give the power to decide to parents. We have said that we shall give that power to parents. It is not an option to decree that there should be no more debate on the future admission arrangements of grammar schools; that will just not happen. I shall explain why I think that we have done the right thing, and I shall also answer the question asked by the hon. Member for Buckingham.

We have made our decision because, as a Government who are committed to education in a way that no previous Government have been committed to it, we shall succeed or fail by what we do for the school system, not what we do about the admission arrangements in 164 schools. If we take our eye off the ball to join that hugely contentious debate, we risk wasting our resources, energy and time. I am glad that I have spent the past year supporting schools in their introduction of the literacy and numeracy strategies, which the hon. Member for Buckingham would not make schools maintain. I am also glad that I will—if it is what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister wants me to do—spend the next year raising standards through "Excellence in Cities", and education action zones rather than arguing about grammar school ballots, which is what would have happened. We have taken the pragmatic view that our time is better spent on other matters.

One can argue that we should not have given parents the right to determine admission arrangements, but one cannot say that we should not have the debate and there should be no mechanism for changing those arrangements. The issue is contentious, but we cannot deny parents who want to change admission arrangements the right to do so. We must give someone somewhere the authority and the mechanism to allow that change to be made if that is what people want.

Nothing is set in stone. Politics must always allow for a mechanism for change. I am happy to defend our decision to put the potential for change in the hands of parents. It would be silly if, having spent considerable legislative time on that and having been determined not to get personally embroiled in the argument about selective schools, I fell into the trap of the hon. Member for Buckingham by answering his question directly. He knows—because we say it—that the Government do not want more selection and we do not think that more selection is the key to raising standards across the board. We are, however, happy to do our best with the school system that we have to raise standards for every child. I am not a parent, so I will not answer the hon. Gentleman's question—although it is difficult not to, because I keep being asked it.

I shall finish by paraphrasing what the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness said, because I strongly agree with him. Reflecting on the good schools in his constituency, he said that they were good because they had good teachers. He is dead right. Those schools are good because they have good teachers, not because of their admission arrangements. If a school has to rely on its admission arrangements to achieve good results, I would question its quality of teaching, learning and management as well as its focus and curriculum. I pay tribute to the schools about which the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness talked and I am confident that if their teachers were to teach in schools without selective admission arrangements, their skills and professionalism would serve any child well. I leave the future of the admission arrangements of the schools in the hon. Gentleman's consituency exactly where they should be: in the hands of the parents whose children will be most affected.

Fireworks

1 pm

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Older and wiser parliamentary heads advise me that the crafty Member begins his Adjournment debate by praising the Minister for all that the Department has achieved. The effect of such a eulogy is doubly beneficial: it sets the Minister off feeling well disposed towards that hon. Member and therefore less likely to savage his arguments and, more importantly, it makes any self-respecting Minister self-conscious about repeating what one has said about her Department's achievements. Such repetition normally comprises at least one third of the speech that civil servants have prepared and so the eulogy liberates a good five minutes in which the Minister will feel obliged to answer the Member's questions.

That is the theory; we must see how it works in practice. I begin with fulsome praise for the Government's Fireworks (Safety) Regulations 1997, set out in SI 2294. All fireworks sold to the general public must comply with the regulations, which stipulate that all fireworks on sale to the public must comply with British standard 7114 and that the minimum age for purchasing fireworks is 18—previously, it was 16. Sixteen-year-olds can now buy only party poppers, caps and cracker snaps. Perhaps most significantly, the regulations have banned the public supply of aerial shells, aerial maroons, shells-in-mortar, maroons-in-mortar, bangers, mini-rockets and fireworks of erratic flight, such as helicopters, squibs and jumping jacks. In addition, some large and powerful fireworks have been banned from sale except to exempted professional pyrotechnic display organisers.

The regulations were passed speedily by the new Labour Government and are most welcome additional controls on what was becoming a fireworks free-for-all. I have only praise for the Minister and her Department in that respect and I do not doubt that, in her speech, she will tell us that, following the introduction of the regulations, the number of serious injuries requiring treatment at hospital casualty departments fell from 1,233 in 1996 to just 908 in 1997—a drop of more than 26 per cent.—with a further drop of 10 per cent. in the following year. Or rather, I do not doubt that she would have told us that had I not already done so.

I suggest a more helpful line for the Minister to take. Instead of repeating the list of regulations, she could tell us about their enforcement, an obligation placed on local authority trading standards officers. Suppliers who breach the regulations can be prosecuted in a magistrates court and fined up to £5,000, imprisoned for up to six months, or both fined and imprisoned. Will the Minister advise us not of the regulations but of how well and how thoroughly they are being enforced? Will she tell us how many prosecutions have been initiated against suppliers of fireworks in each of the past three years? How many of those prosecutions have led to a conviction and how many convictions have led to the imposition of either the maximum fine or a custodial sentence?

When I requested such information from my local trading standards office—the office for Brent and Harrow—I discovered that in 1998–99, in an area with a population of more than 500,000, there were only eight prosecutions, all for sales to minors. The largest fine was for £500, there were two fines for just £100, and there was one conditional discharge. During the previous year, there were only three prosecutions. Hon. Members should remember that the figures were for an area of 500,000 people. Of the three prosecutions, two were for sales to minors with fines of £250 and one for selling on the streets with a fine of £300.

The local trading standards officer was keen to note that shops needed no licence—they simply had to pay £11.70 to register as vendors of fireworks. He said that that fee did not even cover the administration cost and that, what is worse, there was no power to refuse or to evoke someone's registration. Overall, he continued, the office's role was reactive rather than proactive because it was understaffed.

The simple point is that the best regulations in the world are only as good as the enforcement officers. Enforcement is at best patchy, and at worst inadequate, to put it politely. The supply of fireworks is a commercial enterprise in which the rewards are so great that the risk of a £5,000 fine may be deemed an acceptable business cost. Does the Minister consider present levels of enforcement to be acceptable? If not, what will her Department do about them?

Enforcement problems are compounded because the United Kingdom has no register of firework delivery. Unlike many of our European counterparts, the United Kingdom allows hundreds of tonnes of explosives to be delivered to a shop or warehouse with no obligation to notify the local authority or even the fire brigade. How are local trading standards officers supposed to do their job—to check compliance with British standard 7114 and to check that no prohibited fireworks are being sold—when they do not even know where the fireworks are?

At a fireworks industry conference in September, one trading standards officer from Essex reported that four tonnes of fireworks had been delivered to a private householder. When contacted, the firework company that had made the delivery retorted that, as far as they were concerned, the purchaser could have had 20 tonnes had he so wanted. Sadly, the law would allow that. Private individuals may take delivery of vast quantities of explosives and store them for up to 14 days, without having to notify a competent authority and without an official record being required.

Does the Minister not consider protection of the public to require the establishment of a fireworks register? Trading standards officers and fire brigades throughout the country could then track the whereabouts of large volumes of fireworks in the community.

I return to the case of the Essex householder. What qualifications did he have to prove and what training did he have to show to persuade the firework company that he was competent to handle safely four tonnes of fireworks? The answer is none. Were the Minister to find herself living next door to such a gentleman, would she not expect him to have had training and some qualification before he was given custody of four tonnes of explosives?

I pay tribute to the work of my hon. Friends the Members for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy), for Motherwell and Wishaw (Mr. Roy) and for Lincoln (Gillian Merron), who have actively campaigned on the issue. The private Member's Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton proposed such a national training scheme for those operating fireworks displays. Sadly and disgracefully, her Bill was talked out by two Conservative Members, despite receiving all-party support and Government assistance. Given that the Government supported such a scheme under that Bill, why do they not implement one? Will the Minister consider establishing powers whereby local authorities could regulate public fireworks displays to ensure safety?

I turn now to the most pressing and depressing part of the matter. I am not the only constituency MP to receive an annual flood of complaints from residents about disturbance from fireworks. My local authority, Brent council, informs me that its environment department received more than 400 complaints last year. Constituents cannot understand why the law does not empower someone—they do not care whether that is the council or the police—to stop the constant nightly bombardment that they experience.

One of my constituents described the situation in this way:

"Dear Mr. Gardiner, as I write this letter at 11 pm, it sounds like World War III has been going on outside since 5.30 pm and that it will go on to midnight.

It started last Thursday 15 October and how long it goes on for I don't know. My neighbour tells me all through November."

The lady continues:

"Neither I nor my four cats have ever experienced anthing like this. I had a severe migraine over the weekend and my cats are terrified and distressed."

This year, I lodged an appeal in my local newspaper, the Wembley Observer urging residents to be more considerate of their neighbours and to finish their firework parties by 11 pm, to give some respite to the elderly, to babies, to pets and to ordinary people who just want to go to sleep in their own homes so that they can get up for their job of work the next morning without feeling that they have spent the night as film extras in the movie "Saving Private Ryan". I believe that my appeal had some success, but unfortunately the bombardments continued.

I am aware that the regulation-making powers under the Consumer Protection Act 1987 do not allow the Minister to restrict the periods during which fireworks can be legally sold or let off, but that is precisely why further legislation is needed. The public simply do not accept that legislation can go into immense detail about noisy machinery, amplified music and even, under the Noise and Statutory Nuisance Act 1993, specify that a car with a faulty vehicle alarm can be towed away and impounded, yet nothing can be done to relieve the nightly misery for thousands of residents throughout the country from firework parties that produce enormous noise, cause huge distress and disrupt people's lives.

The Minister will, no doubt, have been advised that noise from fireworks could be deemed a statutory nuisance under part III of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. Sadly, the reality is as described to me by my local director of environmental health. I quote from his letter:

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

"While the Environmental Protection Act 1990 is particularly effective at dealing with noise from loud amplified music, noisy machinery or plant and intruder alarms, it is not effective or appropriate to deal with noise from fireworks."

In those remarks, the director of environmental health was supported by the Metropolitan police service, which wrote to me as follows:

"Thank you for your letter dated 20 October in which you bring to my attention the inconvenience caused to your constituents by noisy fireworks. Unfortunately, police have very limited powers to deal with such incidents, especially when they occur on private premises. The local authority Noise Abatement Section of the Environmental Health Department also has very specific and limited powers which do not enable them to deal effectively with these problems."

I urge the Minister to put in place an effective means of dealing with these problems.

This year, the fireworks industry has rejected the Department of Trade and Industry's call for a ban on firework sales until three days before the new year celebrations for the millennium. What that means is that in 23 days' time one family in this country will face the next millennium with a family member, possibly a child, having been injured, maimed or perhaps killed by the use of an unsafe firework, or by the use of fireworks at a display that was unsafely operated. The Department of Trade and Industry calculates that the cost of each injury to the national health service is £6,000, but the cost to the family involved will be considerably more.

The Minister for Small Business and E-Commerce (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) on his success in securing the debate on an important subject that is of concern to many members of the public, especially parents, at this time of the year. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the courtesies with which he began his speech and for his praise for the officials in my Department who are responsible for considerably strengthening the regulations on the subject. My hon. Friend successfully did as he intended and pre-empted many of my briefing notes, prepared by the same helpful officials for the debate. I congratulate him on his research before opening the debate.

I reinforce the point that my hon. Friend acknowledged that we have taken steps to strengthen the regulation of fireworks. There is no doubt that the new regulations that we introduced in 1997, which came into effect on 1 January 1998, have significantly reduced the number of firework injuries—certainly those that were treated in hospital accident and emergency departments. We can measure that by the reports from hospitals in the four-week period around the 5 November firework season last year. We do not yet have the figures for this year's season. They will be available early next year and will be published in the usual way at the time. I hope that the figures for this year will continue to show a fall in the number of accidents resulting from inappropriate or dangerous use of fireworks.

It is important, too, to remember that every year, millions of people safely buy and enjoy fireworks for their own entertainment in their back gardens and those of their friends, or as part of public displays. I am glad that several authorities, including my local authority, Leicester city council, have put on highly successful public displays of fireworks, to encourage more families and members of the public to enjoy firework displays without running the risks often associated with the private use of fireworks in people's back gardens. However, I do not think that the Government should prevent the safe and thoroughly enjoyable use of fireworks in people's private property and at public displays.

The difficulties, which my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North described extremely vividly, arise from people who are either careless or positively dangerous in misusing fireworks intended for their own enjoyment, which tragically injure, maim or occasionally kill one of their own family members.

The other problems to which my hon. Friend referred, and from which his constituent suffered so seriously, arise from thoughtless youngsters, hooligans and vandals using fireworks of various kinds to make other people's lives a misery. That is a real problem, but it is only a small part of the overall picture of the use of fireworks.

There are people—my hon. Friend made it clear that he was not one of them—who are really calling on us to ban the sale and purchase of fireworks for private use. I do not believe that that is a sensible way forward, and I am glad that my hon. Friend shares that opinion. As he said, my Department undertook a review of firework sales in 1996 and rejected the option of a total ban, not least because of fears that a total ban on the sale of fireworks for private use might lead to the development of a black market for fireworks and also to the possibility of people obtaining the ingredients and making their own devices. Neither of those situations would impove public safety; indeed, both would severely jeopardise it and would not be acceptable.

We decided instead to act in the way that my hon. Friend accurately described through the introduction and implementation of the Fireworks (Safety) Regulations in 1997. My hon. Friend referred to the registration of shops selling fireworks. The Health and Safety Executive is reviewing the Explosives Act 1875, which dates back more than 100 years, to see whether we need to strengthen the powers to refuse or to revoke registration to a retailer selling fireworks.

An important issue arises there. A voluntary code of practice with the fireworks industry deals with the period during which fireworks may be sold. Under the code, the fireworks industry has agreed that they should be sold only for three weeks before 5 November and for a couple of days thereafter. The industry reinforces that message to retailers at the beginning of every season. As my hon. Friend said, the agreement this year, with the millennium weekend coming up, was that fireworks would be displayed for sale only from 27 December. Like my hon. Friend, I am disappointed that some newsagents and other shops have continued to sell fireworks right through since the 5 November season in anticipation of the millennium weekend. Looking ahead to that weekend, preliminary indications that I have had are that, compared with the normal pre-new year period, sales are less than 20 per cent. higher than usual for the time of year. Most additional sales are accounted for by high-value firework purchases, obviously made by people who plan large public displays. These are in a different category from private purchasers.

[Ms Patricia Hewitt]

The Government do not have powers under the Consumer Protection Act 1987 to control anything other than the intrinsic safety of the goods themselves and we use those powers. The period of sale of fireworks is an issue for the voluntary code of practice. We have discussed this problem with the British Pyrotechnics Association. I hope that it will take further action with its members to try to reduce the number of retail outlets that defy the code by trying to sell fireworks in the weeks before Christmas and before 27 December when, under the code, firework sales would be expected to begin again.

My hon. Friend also raised the controls on the storage of fireworks by private individuals. This, too, is a matter for the Health and Safety Executive under the Control of Explosives Regulations 1991. The regulations allow up to 5 kg of fireworks for private use to be kept on individual premises. The case that my hon. Friend mentioned clearly falls well outside the scope of the regulations. If he will let me have further details of the report that he has procured, I shall be happy to ensure that the matter is properly investigated.

The regulations also permit unlimited quantities of fireworks to be stored for up to 14 days. This may be the source of the problem to which my hon. Friend referred, although the regulations stipulate that fireworks must be kept in a safe and suitable place and all due precautions taken for public safety. A back garden shed or garage may not fit the regulation's requirements.

As I said, the Health and Safety Executive is reviewing existing explosives legislation and the review may result in changes to existing conditions for the keeping of fireworks for private use. I shall ensure that my hon. Friend is kept up to date as the review progresses.

My hon. Friend quoted from a letter from a constituent who had suffered badly around 5 November. All hon. Members know that trouble with noisy neighbours and local vandals—and worse, positively criminal neighbours—is one of the most intractable problems that we face in our advice surgeries. There will always be limits to the powers of the police and local authorities and to their resources for dealing with the problem.

The Fireworks Bill—a private Member's Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy)—would have introduced many sensible additions to the regulatory package now in place for the control of fireworks. The Government supported her Bill, and I greatly regret that two Conservative Members chose to talk it out. It would have given the necessary powers to provide for mandatory training of people who operate large public displays. It would have dealt with the times during which fireworks could be sold—now purely a matter for the industry's voluntary code of practice—and provided powers to limit the letting off of fireworks except at specified times. These problems cannot be tackled under the current powers available to us, be they in the Fireworks Bill or the Consumer Protection Act 1987. It is a pity that that private Member's Bill failed. I hope that in a future private Members' ballot, any hon. Member who has an interest in this issue will succeed in reviving the Bill.

As my hon. Friend knows, the pressures on legislative time are enormous. When I became a Minister last year, I assumed that the biggest difficulty that the Government would face would be finding sufficient money to do all the things that we need to do. That is always a challenge, although one that is brilliantly discharged by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. The big difficulty is finding time. I am afraid that I cannot give my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North the comfort that he seeks. There is no immediate or medium-term prospect of the Government introducing fireworks legislation. The legislative priorities to fulfil our manifesto commitments are such that, as he is aware, Bills with an even higher priority than one on this subject are already fighting for parliamentary time.

None the less, possibilities are available under secondary legislation. I have already mentioned the review being undertaken by the Health and Safety Executive. I can also reassure my hon. Friend that officials from various Departments and agencies work closely on this subject. My Department, the Health and Safety Executive, the Home Office and the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions work closely together, as we did when drawing up the 1987 regulations and will do again when we consider the recommendations that follow the Health and Safety Executive's review.

Finally, my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North questioned whether trading standards officers and the police were successful in enforcing the current regulations and statutory provisions, and suggested, no doubt on the basis of his constituency experience, that perhaps they were not. I do not have to hand figures for prosecutions and convictions, but I shall try to obtain those from the co-ordinating body for trading standards officers and send it to my hon. Friend. However, it must be a matter for local authorities, within their resources, which we are increasing every year, to determine local priorities. There are a large number of regulations—many people would say too many—and we have constantly to review regulatory burdens. With many regulations we look to trading standards officers for effective enforcement. Local authorities must decide on the most effective use of resources and determine priorities.

I can reassure my hon. Friend that we shall work closely with the industry and with local authorities to reinforce the message about safe use and enjoyment of fireworks. For the millennium weekend, we shall carry forward the "alcohol and fireworks do not mix" message that we successfully introduced for this year's 5 November weekend. I end by congratulating my hon. Friend on securing this important debate and on participating in the steps that we are taking to ensure that fireworks are enjoyed safely.

Housing Benefit

1.30 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): Outside our Chamber, carols are being played and the spirit of Christmas is in the air, but I am not going to be able to tell such a cheerful tale here.

I received this morning a policy research briefing from the National Housing Federation entitled "Housing benefit system in crisis". It certainly is in a crisis, which is entirely unacceptable. Many of the poorest and least advantaged people in Britain—though our debate deals with England—are suffering, while many local councils incompetently handle housing benefit and while the Government, despite promises and fine words, incompetently fail to make them do any better. In some parts of the country, the system is a shambles and in other parts it is a disgrace. In my borough of Southwark—I know that you live there too, Mr. Deputy Speaker—housing benefit administration is both a shambles and a disgrace.

I hope that this debate will encourage the Government to answer some questions. Instead of merely promises of reviews, monitoring, assessments and injunctions on local authorities to do better, we want action and answers, so that our constituents do not have to contend with such a consistently awful service. We are sick of people passing the buck; sick of councils engaging contractors who then are passed the blame; sick of contractors working on the basis of contracts that can never be produced; and sick of constituents being passed around from pillar to post, day after day, week after week, month after month.

I was in my constituency office this morning when I received a phone call from a lady who is entitled to £88 housing benefit a fortnight, but she has not been paid since 26 July and we are now in December. She has had to pay £58.50 to the council out of her pension while she waits for the arrears.

Every day, more people in north Southwark and Bermondsey complain about housing benefit—people such as an old lady of 81 living alone in west Walworth, with no immediate family, dependent on state pension and related benefits. She wrote to me in April this year. She moved to a new property, after which her housing benefit stopped, and she received demands for payments of £253.56. She has written to me seven times altogether, since first contacting me in April. In September, she wrote:

"I am out of my mind with worry . . . I hate being in debt."

In October, she wrote that the housing officer

"has received all the proof he needs yet he still insists I have to pay full rent of more than £63.00 per week plus council taxes. Just how does he expect me to do this out of my pension? He should try doing it. I am really suicidal, Mr. Hughes, over this lot. I have always paid my debts,—more so the rent".

On November 25, she wrote again:

"I cannot understand why I am having all this trouble, both from" the neighbourhood housing office

"and now the council tax department. I had a letter threatening me unless I pay what they say I owe they will take action. I am worried sick, it is making me confused . . . How am I able to pay full rent, heating and water charges and council taxes out of my total income of £82.25?"

She has yet to hear about her renewal claim, and she is not assuaged by the answer that it is all the fault of the new verification process.

A private tenant—the previous lady was a council tenant—applied to renew his claim for housing benefit on 21 September this year. It was due to expire on 28 November, giving the authorities two months to deal with it. Due to continual errors, he has yet to receive confirmation of renewal by the beginning of December. His last payment was on 16 November.

For a final example, I take two constituents who are private landlords, a couple who own two neighbouring houses. They wrote to me when they were owed £8,000 from their two properties. It took 11 weeks to process one renewal claim because of inaccuracy and delay. They still await the other claim being processed.

That is just not acceptable. The figures that I am about to give will shock even some of the least shockable Members of Parliament. There are rules that set out what councils should do, according to which local authorities should seek to promote the well-being of the local community and help those that they can into employment. According to the framework rules for the administration of housing benefit and council tax benefit, councils should "operate an efficient system", provide an "efficient service", provide "best value" to taxpayers and claimants, provide an effective service in terms of quickly and accurately determining and paying genuine claims, provide a "customer-focused service" to communicate clearly and effectively with clients, provide advice and information, treat people with courtesy and respect their dignity and privacy. The experience of my 81-year-old constituent is hardly an example of that.

The rules are clear. There are also regulations, the most important of which are that determinations should be made within 14 days of supplying the relevant information and the first payment should be made 14 days after receipt of the claim. There are other dates and timetables, but those are the two crucial dates.

I interject that a further problem arises from the existence of different systems for applying for housing benefit and for council tax benefit and income support. People may not provide the right information the first time and may be confused as to what information they should supply. We should consider establishing a common form of application so that those who are entitled to income support as well as housing benefit and would normally have to go to the Department of Social Security as well as the council office could have their claims examined at the same time. It would be better to streamline procedures as much as possible.

Let me deal with Southwark first and then widen the context. Southwark has a Labour council hanging on by its fingertips. Control is through the casting vote of the mayor, as in Islington, which we hope will cease to be Labour-controlled this month with Southwark falling not long afterwards. My party is currently in opposition in both boroughs. In 1996–97, Southwark's system was run in-house by the internal contractors and 97 per cent. of claims were processed within two weeks. Charter marks and awards were conferred. What happened the following year is a reflection of the result of the pressure put on councils by the previous and the present Government to do less themselves and contract out more. As soon as the contract went out, payment within 14 days went down to 60 per cent., and last year it was down to 22.4 per cent.

I raised that matter across the Floor of the Chamber last year with the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle). She answered:

"I am aware of the problems being experienced in Southwark. My officials have received a detailed report"— and I would be grateful if it were published—

"which confirms that there are delays. An action plan has been drawn up to clear the arrears of work that have been implemented. I have asked to receive reports from the authority so that progress on the action plan can be monitored"— and I would grateful if they could be published too.

"Southwark and the private contractors are . . . working together . . . I am told that the arrears of work have been reduced considerably and that the authority expects to make further progress on the workload until the situation returns to normal in November."—[Official Report, 19 October 1998; Vol. 317, c. 948.]

My colleagues on the council—including Councillors Derek Partridge and Nick Stanton and our housing spokesman, Councillor Niko Baar— have pursued this matter persistently in other committees, as the council records show. We forced an additional meeting of Southwark council last November with requisitioned business in order to deal with those matters and there are perpetual promises of further reports and further investigation.

I would like to tell hon. Members the result of the "return to normal". The council decided that it could set a target for this year of 102 per cent. of its rent due to be collected—that means some of the arrears plus 100 per cent. of this year's rent. So far, according to the report presented to last night's meeting of Southwark housing committee, it has collected 93.63 per cent. The rent collected in Southwark is about £150 million a year. Rent arrears were targeted to be under £20 million, but are already running at £26 million. The target percentage for the assessment of new claims within 14 days is 100 per cent., yet only 5.4 per cent. of new claims are being assessed within 14 days.

Last night, the majority group on the council tabled a motion asking for a further report to be brought to the council in March 2000 saying what would be done and how performance targets would be met. My Liberal Democrat colleagues tabled an amendment that was accepted, saying that if the targets were not met by 31 January, appropriate action should be taken in liquidated damages against CSL, the contractors, and a report should be submitted to the committee in March 2000 on the possibility of terminating the contract. Had it not been for my colleagues, we would simply have been given the same complacent answer that we have received for over a year. If returning to normal means that 5 per cent. of the claims are processed in time, Southwark residents do not think much of normality.

In a letter in October concerning a specific inquiry about the private sector tenants and their landlords who were owed £8,000, the chief executive of Southwark wrote:

"I can confirm that Southwark Legal Services will not commence possession proceedings until a document known as 'HP pre-court pro forma' has been obtained. This document confirms that the tenant named is not awaiting the outcome of any application for Housing Benefit."

The figures he then gave me showed that 6,600 claims were outstanding on 1 October compared with 3,500 in June. A paper before last night's meeting of the housing committee confirmed that at Lambeth county court, 35.3 per cent. of the 168 cases listed by Southwark for possession between 13 and 27 October this year were adjourned specifically because the housing benefit had not been processed. The judge said that the court was appalled by the large number of cases being adjourned, particularly those adjourned more than once for the same reason. The court told the council that, if the position was not remedied quickly, it would consider simply dismissing any case brought back to it that had originally been adjourned because of housing benefit and in which the issues had still not been resolved.

Every sum not collected and every instalment of rent not paid because the housing benefit is not paid means that repairs and maintenance are not carried out. Not only are my 81-year-old constituent and thousands like her identically nearly driven to suicide, but much less maintenance and for fewer repairs are done. Southwark refuses to show its contract with CSL even to members of the council who have a right to know. I ask the Minister to direct the council or to take other powers to ensure that the contract, even if not its financial terms, is published so that the reason why Southwark will not take action against CSL to terminate the contract can be out in the open for all to see.

The contract was apparently so badly drafted that anything that could be defined in court as outside the responsibility of the council would allow CSL not to be liable. Therefore the verification procedure introduced this April, which is a checking procedure to avoid housing benefit fraud, might prevent CSL from being liable. Blame just gets passed to and fro. CSL remains in place. In contrast to the in-house contractors who did the job excellently, we now have an outside firm which is doing appallingly in Southwark and elsewhere in the country, yet no one is willing to take action. A report is brought back regularly to the council, yet the council does not respond. That happens not just in Southwark, but elsewhere. Yesterday, the Freedom of Information Bill received its Second Reading. Freedom of information should mean that contracts like this are not secret but are out in the open. If we can have more openness in local government for these matters, we might have a more satisfactory conclusion.

In its letter of 6 December, the National Housing Federation says that, according to the survey that it has just completed, the average claim time for its housing association properties around the country is 7.3 weeks. The league table for local authorities around the country shows that Southwark is bad, but it is not the only one in that position. Lambeth, which is next door, is worse. That is another Labour-controlled council. It has the poorest performance indicators in inner London, and over the last financial year it processed only 29 per cent. of claims within 14 days. Colleagues in Lambeth have told me about an 85-year-old woman living in sheltered accommodation and in remission from cancer whose renewal form was lost and who was therefore sent a £500 demand for arrears.

The league table for last year shows that Lambeth processes 29 per cent. of applications within 14 days, Islington processes 49 per cent. and Southwark 60 per cent. The national average is 84 per cent. Other councils in the west country which also have CSL as their service provider have criticised its performance. My hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard) drew attention to the practice in Taunton Deane council. Kingston upon Thames has returned its housing benefit administration to its in-house team and has terminated its contract with CSL. If more people terminated their contracts with CSL and took it to court for liquidated damages, we might get somewhere.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Hugh Bayley): In preparing for the debate, I looked at the question that the hon. Gentleman is addressing. Kingston has not terminated the contract but has given the contractor notice of its dissatisfaction. In fact, just one Labour council has terminated its contract with this supplier.

Mr. Hughes: I stand corrected. My information was that it had. I was aware that it was considering it and I was told that it had. The Minister's information may be more up to date.

Newham, because of the backlog, now answers only emergency phone calls. In Norwich last year, 58 per cent. of housing benefit overpayments were misclassified as fraud. The picture is clear. Although I obviously have a constituency interest, which is where the issue began, my inquiries reveal that similar problems around the country are not uncommon. Another test is the number of complaints to the ombudsman. Last year, for this one element of council activity, there were 74 complaints in Brent, 43 in Islington, 53 in Wandsworth, 123 in Southwark and 296 in Lambeth.

I saw the report of the speech given by the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Wallasey, to a conference in Bournemouth in October where she said that local authorities were vital to the success of welfare reform and that they should take more responsibility for improving customer service, reducing errors and cutting fraud in benefit claims. She said:

"Some local authorities provide a very high quality service. But the picture is inconsistent. In far too many cases people claiming benefits receive a slow and inefficient service."

We know that, but who will do anything about it is now the question.

There are a couple of ways forward. First, the Government must address the question, which they have not yet addressed, of the supply and price of rented accommodation. I served on the Committee debating the Bill that became the Housing Act back in 1988. The Conservative party was in power and it was clear that we would eventually reach a stage where property prices would rise but housing benefit would not keep pace. That has now come to pass. Chancellors do not write cheques to fill the gap when a private landlord raises the price. We need to answer that question.

Second, the Government must do something about the national housing benefit system. There were promises of a great reform, but I read in Sunday's newspapers that there will now be no great reform. The Government have decided that they cannot now do anything and that it is all too complicated and difficult, so the issue will be put on the back burner. I hope that that is not the case. I therefore have the following list of further questions.

First, will the Minister please ensure that his officials contact the local authorities that I named—in particular, Southwark—to ensure that the contracts are published and that all the information comes out into the open? Will he publish all the correspondence between Southwark and the Department since last October, when I raised the matter in Parliament. We shall then be able to see exactly who said what to whom and who did or did not do anything.

Secondly, will the Government please back off from insisting—this would be odd from a Labour Government, but new Labour Governments never surprise me in this respect—that everything that is efficient must be done outside the public sector and that everything that is inefficient is inefficient because of the public sector? When Southwark ran these matters itself, it did so very well; when these matters were contracted out, they were handled badly. There is a moral there somewhere, which might be that we should sometimes let councils get on with the job themselves and not force them always to contract out. I am aware of the change from compulsory competitive tendering to best value. That is progress, which I welcome. None the less, can we please take the pressure off and allow local authorities to make the choices that they think are best, rather than forcing them to contract everything out into the private sector because of a dogmatic view in central Government?

Thirdly, will Ministers ask Southwark council to apologise to Southwark residents?

Fourthly, will Ministers review the procedures and the timetable, not to make them longer, but to ensure that determinations and payments are made on time? Will Ministers ensure that the timetable works and the penalties are stronger?

Fifthly, will Ministers examine the remedies for delay? If our trains are late nowadays, we can get damages. If I do not pay my tax on time, I must pay a penalty every day that goes by. Why does no increasing penalty have to be paid if a case is not processed in 14 days? At the moment, if the 14-day deadline is missed, it gets put on one side and no one takes much notice.

Next, will Ministers please re-evaluate the verification process? Of course we want to eliminate housing benefit fraud. However, if we introduce provisions that suddenly put the whole national system into crisis, something is wrong with the planning and practice of the implementation.

Lastly, will Ministers please note that I shall respond to inquiries in a simple way from now on, as other colleagues probably will? I shall suggest that people with a complaint seek payment from the ombudsman of the fullest possible remedies—£100 if they get a notice seeking possession, £250 if the case goes to court and £50 if they get a warning letter. The cost to the public purse will increase more and more because of an incompetent system.

Sometimes people ask why some of us are anti-Labour. Some of us are anti-Labour because our experience of Labour local and central Government and that of many of our constituents is so appalling. This is a disgrace and must not be allowed to continue. I hope that any remedy takes effect sooner than the promised remedy of a year ago. Since that promise, things have got worse, not better. I shall return to the issue until we get adequate answers.

1.54 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Hugh Bayley): The hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Simon Hughes) knows the procedures of the House well, and it is unfortunate that I am left with six minutes in which to answer 24 minutes of charges. Obviously, I cannot do as much justice to the hon. Gentleman's serious questions as I would have done if he had left longer for my reply.

In an attempt to be helpful, I should say that I welcome the fact that the hon. Gentleman raised such an important issue. At the start of his speech, he described some extremely worrying individual cases and raised issues with which all of us in the House would want to deal. He made some trenchant criticisms of everyone, including his local authority, the Government and contractors. In fact, he said that he was sick of the council, the Government and the contractors. However, with great respect to him, making charges against others and spotting the errors is the easy part. The Government want to find the solution, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman does, too.

The hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that it would have been a good idea to return the Southwark housing benefit system to the previous contractor. I do not think that he is suggesting that it would be a good idea to return it to an in-house bid, although he raised the possibility later in his speech.

We need to address ourselves to what the Government are doing and to examine the extent to which our programme to tighten up and to squeeze fraud out of the housing benefit system will solve the problems that the hon. Gentleman raised. We must work in partnership with local authorities on housing benefit to achieve our aim of a modern and effective welfare state that is secure against fraud and abuse. Of course, housing benefit must be fitted within the Government's wider policy objectives and our wider housing policy of providing a decent, affordable home for everyone. I agree with the hon. Gentleman on that.

We are already putting in place policies to increase the administrative efficiency of housing benefit, to combat fraud and to improve work incentives for people who are out of work and who therefore claim housing benefit. We shall introduce further proposals as part of our housing Green Paper, which will be published in due course.

In the couple of minutes that I have left, I want to talk about some of the things that we are doing. We have introduced remote access terminals or RATs—that is the only acronym that I quite like—in local authorities to give them controlled but direct access to information that is held on Department of Social Security computer systems. Some 400 local authorities, including the London boroughs of Southwark and Lambeth, have the terminals. If they make adequate use of those that they have and want additional ones, those will be made available. We are considering providing more information than we currently provide through those terminals.

We are taking action to cut down on the paper chase. Millions of bits of paper flow between housing benefit administrations and the Benefits Agency. The large volume of paper transactions contributes to delay and errors. We have carried out tests, which show that we can achieve significant improvements in housing benefit clearance times by transferring information electronically. We are currently piloting the scheme in 20 local authorities and intend to roll it out in the new year for local authorities as a whole.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned best value. From April next year, we are introducing a duty on councils to obtain best value. That is a key part of our drive to modernise local government in ways that allow local authorities to measure their achievements. Best value will replace the discredited system of compulsory competitive tendering.

The hon. Gentleman asks me to take specific actions, including requiring the local authority to publish certain documents. That is a matter for the local authority, although the hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Government have sent the benefit fraud inspectorate to inspect Southwark. I shall ensure that the inspectorate gets the Hansard report of this debate so that all the hon. Gentleman's representations to me will be made to the inspectorate. If he wants to make further representations to it, he is perfectly at liberty to write to me—

It being Two o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the sitting, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 9 December 1999

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Modernising Government White Paper

[Relevant document: The evidence taken by the Select Committee on Public Administration from the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 23 November (HC 40-i).]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Dowd.]

2.30 pm

The Minister of State, Cabinet Office (Mr. Ian McCartney): This is the first occasion on which the Government have opened a debate in this Chamber. Ministers have come here to answer questions on other aspects of business, but it is the first time that the Cabinet Office has initiated a debate here.

I hope that we shall have an interesting debate on the modernisation of government, especially here in this new, modern setting. We shall have to wait and see whether this setting will work, after receiving feedback from our colleagues. It seems rather strange, and somewhat European. I said that to see what Conservative Members would do when I mentioned the word "European". It might wake them up.

I hope that we shall have a lively debate on the Government's proposals for modernisation. I shall go through the programme, putting flesh on the bones of the concepts and principles, and explaining specifically how we intend to roll out that programme and achieve our objectives. We are pledged to simplify government, and to bring it closer to the people whom we serve. This debate will give Members on all sides of the Chamber the opportunity to express their views on the modernisation of government. I hope that they will also give us ideas from their perspective as Members of Parliament in their own communities, about how modernisation is working on the ground to bring together local government, national Government, and the public, private and voluntary sectors in the delivery of services in our communities.

When we published the White Paper in the spring, it was a serious attempt at radical reform. The vision that it set out contained four key elements. The first is better policy making: the importance of working across Government with each other and with stakeholders to provide opportunities to develop medium and long-term policies and to deal with policy issues in the short term.

The second element is improved quality and responsiveness of public services—an important factor in a society in which people increasingly want services provided 24 hours a day, seven days a week. The third element is the harnessing of information technology for the public good, to provide access to a range of new services through the development of IT. The fourth is the valuing of public services, by investing in the skills and aspirations of public servants and in how those services are designed to be delivered.

This Government have a different perspective from the previous Government, who did not value public servants or the principle of lively, modern public services. There has been a sea change in the approach to the modernisation of government. We are excited at the prospect of introducing these changes with colleagues across central and local government. The programme will make a real difference to people's lives. It is a long-term programme, but we have made a good start. I shall give some examples of what we are already doing.

We have set out a number of key commitments in the White Paper and in the action plan that we subsequently produced. We are delivering on all of those. I shall risk repeating myself: this is an ambitious, long-term programme. We need, therefore, a strategic approach to ensure that the programme is rolled out across the board and have identified six catalysts for action over the next 12 months or so. They are the roll-out of a complete framework for good policy making and an independent review of its implementation; the establishment of effective business planning throughout the public sector, building on the 2000 public spending round and the ensuing public service agreements; a review of the way in which all public services are delivered to bring about continuous improvement in quality and service standards and ensure that services are responsive to the needs of the citizen; the development of a corporate IT strategy, which aims to achieve robust targets for the availability of, use of and satisfaction with electronic services; and a programme to modernise the civil service. There is also a major programme for modernising management across other parts of the public sector.

Some may say that policy making is sometimes a bit dull, but I rather enjoy it—especially when I get my own way. The Conservatives are certainly not having a dull time working out their ever more extreme policies. No doubt we shall hear more about those later. We are turning our pledges into reality. We are helping people into work and tackling poverty. We are attacking the poverty that the Conservatives created. We are improving the education of our children and the health of our nation. We are reducing crime. We are creating a stable economic environment for people to invest in and so create employment opportunities. We are making a difference to people's lives through the provision of new services in the national health service and other parts of the public sector. We have harnessed the Government machine to deliver those pledges and have promised to improve effectiveness in delivering the results that make a practical and quantifiable difference to people's lives.

In June this year, we established a centre of excellence in policy making—the Centre for Management and Policy Studies—which is leading a drive to identify and spread good policy-making practice. That involves developing the civil service into an organisation that learns new ways of doing things and introducing reviews of how individual Departments make policy so that we can see how we are doing. Such major changes take time. However, the centre has already run innovative programmes—for example, a unique interchange programme for senior European public and private sector figures to share ways of doing things, an induction programme for new Ministers, the first ever departmental peer reviews in respect of the Cabinet Office and the Inland Revenue, and a Treasury review of public service agreements. Such programmes will provide an innovative means for the civil service to learn about better ways of doing things. We are also open to learning new ways of doing things as we drive forward policies to improve people's lives.

Our key policy priorties have concerned education. We are taking steps to improve educational policy through the literacy and numeracy strategies, tackling failing schools, promoting success in delivering lifelong learning—for example, the introduction of the university for industry and individual learning accounts.

Our economic policies have brought about lower interest rates, lower business taxes and an end to boom and bust economics.

We are supporting families by making work pay through the introduction of the national minimum wage and the working families tax credit. Hon. Members opposite are opposed to those two measures. They have made a commitment to abolish the national minimum wage, which would lead to a wage cut for more than 2 million workers, and to abolish the working families tax credit, which would mean a tax rise for more than 2 million families. The party opposite is in the business of trying to undermine our strategic approaches—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but in the spirit of the new arrangements in Westminster Hall, hon. Members whom he might assume to be opposite him may not in fact be opposite—they may even be behind him.

Mr. McCartney: In new Labour we are sometimes surrounded by all kinds of party. I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall get used to this new environment eventually, and perhaps even get friendly with the hon. Member opposite.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): You owe me a drink, McCartney.

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Gentleman is trying to put me off my stride.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): In the spirit of Westminster Hall debate, the Minister will recall that he and I were members of the Standing Committee that considered the National Minimum Wage Bill. I do not recall the point during the passage of that Bill at which I stated that the Conservative party was pledged to abolish the minimum wage, yet the Minister stated that as a matter of fact. Would he care to give me the relevant reference?

Mr. McCartney: I was referring to the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who has repeatedly made it clear that the Conservative party is opposed and would abolish the minimum wage. That is on the record in Hansard. Can you confirm that you have reversed that policy, and thereby lay to rest the fear among workers who claim the minimum wage, that if the Conservative party were ever to return to power it would give them a wage cut by abolishing the minimum wage?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Although we are in a new, informal setting, the rule about referring to hon. Members in the third person still applies. If the Minister says "you", he is referring to me and I have had nothing to do with the White Paper.

Mr. McCartney: If you do not mind my saying so, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that is a typical politician's answer—nothing to do with me, guv.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the Minister and I would not dream of trying to delay him when he is talking about important matters in the White Paper. My right hon. Friend and I were opposed to the introduction of the minimum wage, but we have not taken forward the question of what we propose to do after the next election, which is a different matter. Although the Minister referred to the creation of policy, he will note that the common-sense revolution has not yet addressed the issue.

Mr. McCartney: To assist the hon. Gentleman, I shall quote from Hansard when the right hon. Member for Wokingham said:

"I have endlessly stated a very clear position. We oppose the national minimum wage."—[Official Report, 29 April 1999; Vol. 330, c. 541.]

Angela Smith (Basildon): The Minister may recall that he, I and the hon. Gentleman spent many hours together, including a couple of nights, discussing the matter in the House. We can be forgiven for thinking that the Conservatives oppose the national minimum wage because they fought tooth and nail against it, opposed it every step of the way and even argued that disabled people and pensioners should not receive a minimum wage.

Mr. McCartney: I remember well those nocturnal events in the Chamber. We were proud to set a record for keeping the House up for a continuous period in Committee to ensure that the minimum wage was delivered on time. My hon. Friend is right to say that the Conservatives fought tooth and nail to prevent it from being introduced. They said that it would cost a million jobs, but 700,000 new jobs have been created since the National Minimum Wage Bill was introduced in the House. More than 90 per cent. of employers believe in the principle of a national minimum wage. Conservative policy has again been shown to be at the extreme end of British politics with no one supporting it.

Mr. Lansley: The spirit of modernisation in this context surely means not fighting the battles of a previous Standing Committee, but understanding the implications of what has occurred since the introduction of the national minimum wage. I wonder whether the Minister is aware of the statement by the chairman of the National Care Homes Association, who spoke recently on the impact of the national minimum wage and the working time regulations. He said:

"Government must be aware of the precarious state of the sector"—

the care home sector—

and the threat that is posed to the elderly people we care for by home closures".

Does the Minister at least recognise that we should debate the impact of the national minimum wage rather than ideology, which he is still debating?

Mr. McCartney: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman referred to the care home sector. Since the Government came to power, huge and significant new resources have been pumped into community care, including care for the elderly in both public and private sector care homes. The Government have acted to improve the quality of care for those in care homes and the standard of care from employers to their employees. It is unacceptable to pay people £1.20 an hour in a care home and expect them to pay for their own training, and then to expect a first-class service for the most vulnerable in the community. I am pleased that the majority of care home owners have responded positively to the introduction of the minimum wage and paid holidays for staff. Those are basic minimum standards.

I remember that when I was a member of the Opposition Front-Bench team on health I was invited to conference after conference to discuss the parlous state of the care home sector because of the way in which the previous Conservative Government had hiked up interest rates. When people borrowed money to open new homes, they were left financially ruined because the Conservative Government, for ideological reasons, withdrew resources from local authorities for care home support. The previous Government's record on the private care sector was nothing short of shambolic. The present Government have improved standards, invested in education and training, and invested in skills to ensure that those who need care because they are vulnerable are protected by good standards. The Government are working with local authorities and the private sector to drive up standards by providing decent pay and conditions.

Mr. Lansley: It is a pity to stop the Minister when he is in the middle of speech No. 17B, which I have heard before. With regard to care homes, will he acknowledge that, in the context of this debate, the much-vaunted phrase "joined-up government" ought to apply? If the Government want a given wage level or a restriction on working time, that will have an impact on costs. Why has the Department of Social Security increased rates for residential care for 2000–01 by 1.4 per cent., and rates for elderly residential care by just 1.5 per cent? That increase does not recognise the costs incurred in meeting the Government's policy. If the Government will the end, they must also, through the DSS, will the means.

Mr. McCartney: I thank the hon. Gentleman for speech No. 22C, which I have heard before, but which does not get any better. I would have expected him to tweak it by showing some concern for the needs of those in the care sector. The Conservative party is prepared to put at risk the standards that we have set with regard to employers' duty towards employees and the independent assessment of care provision. Clearly, Conservatives oppose all modern methods of management in this sector.

We promised that services would be organised around the needs of the people who use them. We promised high-quality services that would be available 24 hours a day, seven days a week, where there was the demand. We promised that, by the end of 2000, everyone in the country would be able to telephone NHS Direct, 24 hours a day, for health care advice from experienced, qualified nurses. By 2001, jobseekers should be able to look for and apply for jobs through the Employment Service anywhere in England, Scotland and Wales, by telephone or internet, even during evenings and at weekends. In at least half of local authorities, older people should benefit from joined-up services and integrated planning by the end of 2000.

We are also transforming old methods to give Government a modern, helpful and friendly face. We have launched pilot schemes to provide a single point of contact with the benefits system, which combine in a single place the services of the Benefits Agency, the Employment Service and local authorities' benefit departments. We have created NHS Direct, which provides health advice and information over the telephone and, from 7 December, direct into people's living rooms. During its first 24 hours, the new internet service received 1.5 million hits from people looking for help and advice from NHS Direct.

We are listening to the needs of people in respect of public services. For example, we launched a nationwide programme of "listening to older people" events, and a series of "listening to women" events, on which a report was published in October. We have introduced new service standards for waiting times and the time taken to answer telephone calls, and for the introduction of e-mail inquiry points.

Unnecessary bureaucracy deters innovation and stops staff delivering a better service to the public. We are piloting learning labs in the Benefits Agency, Customs and Excise and the Prison Service, where certain non-statutory rules will be waived so that staff can try new working methods. In September, we joined forces with TNT to launch an award for high standards of service through use of the excellence model in a partnership environment.

We have created service action teams. In October, I launched the service teams action plan, which set out how we provide co-ordinated public services quickly on matters such as changes of address, long-term care in the home, retirement, bereavement and access to information on services. The action plan is not the end of the matter, but the beginning. We are developing responses to the problems that our "mystery shoppers" identified as the most pressing. For example, in October, access pages were launched on the internet, containing contact details on a range of central Government helplines, including telephone numbers, service hours and direct links to websites.

The public wants services to be available for longer—on occasion, up to 24 hours a day and for seven days a week. In March, we shall announce the results of the research of the people's panel, which will cover five services for which there is the greatest demand from the public for extended opening hours. We shall try to meet that demand by the end of 2001.

Today, my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office launched a Cabinet Office website, which contains a new directory of information about the main Government help lines. It contains details about opening hours, phone numbers and e-mail addresses. It is easy to understand—for example, it refers to tax rather than to Inland Revenue.

Now that I appear in public life, I put much effort into using plain language. There are many ways to use language, but most of them make it more complicated. We are working with the Plain English Campaign and with ethnic minority communities to improve the worst examples, such as the application form for a driving licence for a minicab driver that includes a photograph. We are also training people to draft documents in plain language. In February, we shall publish best practice guides about using plain language, and we shall work with ethnic minority language services to help those seeking advice about Government services to have access to minority language services.

Our proposals about changing address will make a significant difference to the lives of many people—for example, a gentleman who is disabled by multiple sclerosis and who changes his address in a move that is arranged by his local authority so that he can be nearer his family. Which bodies does he need to notify of the new address in order to keep his benefits? First, he has to notify his previous Benefits Agency office of his new address either in writing by using the appropriate form or by writing a letter. In most cases, that information will be made available to all Department of Social Security agencies. If the Benefits Agency knows that he is claiming housing benefit, it will pass on that information to the relevant body. His disability benefits are likely to remain in payment and his income support may remain in payment, but his housing benefit will cease. That is the first notification.

That person must also notify his old local authority of the fact that he has moved and he must tell the new authority of his new address. He may also have to send a separate notification to the housing and council tax benefit section, which deals with liability for council tax, and the local social services department. Those steps involve a further five notifications.

The person will have to make a fresh application to claim income support at his new local office, although his circumstances may not have changed materially. He will be able to reclaim housing benefit from his new local authority at the same time, but if he does not do so he will have to put in a separate claim that contains details about his income to the Benefits Agency, although it already holds those details.

If the person is able to drive, he must notify the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency of his new address, which involves returning his driving licence. He must also notify the UK Passport Agency, the Inland Revenue and TV Licensing, which he might be lucky enough to be able to access through the internet.

The person might have to make a further four notifications. He might have to apply to the local authority's social services department for adaptations to be made to his new home, and he must provide evidence from his doctor that those changes are medically necessary. Social services officials will assess those needs and take down details of his income—the same details that the Benefits Agency already holds—and that help will be means-tested.

Merely in order to move house, that person might have to make 10 separate notifications of his change of address to public sector organisations. In addition, he will have many forms to fill in throughout the process.

That situation is unacceptable; there is no defence for it. The introduction of a one-stop facility to notify a change of address would be a significant step forward. We should also work with various bodies to increase the number of places at which one could make such a notification.

Our plans involve giving people a better service and better access to public services. We promised that information and communications technology will be used to provide better services to the public and that we shall not trail behind technological developments. We have set ourselves firm and measurable targets. We want 25 per cent. of Government services to be available electronically by 2002, 50 per cent. to be available by 2005 and 100 per cent. to be available by 2008.

We are already improving services to the public by using modern technology. From April this year, the Employment Service placed job vacancies on the internet. Government websites will be more informative and user-friendly under new guidelines issued by my Department's central IT unit. Our invest to save budget, which is providing £230 million over the next three years, is pump-priming modernising government projects.

The first round of the invest to save budget funded several innovative projects, including an electronic one-stop shop for land and property information, which will help to reduce house-buying delays, a pilot scheme to enable people to make applications for vehicle tax discs over the internet, and an electronic catalogue to enable public bodies to order goods more cheaply and efficiently.

In round two, 500 expressions of interest were sifted down to 175 full bids, which are now being considered. The winners are likely to include: projects that increase electronic access to services for individuals and businesses; new websites that give the public increased access to information; and projects that facilitate electronic data exchange between public bodies. Those are all important new advances.

There is no simple formula for ensuring that IT projects are a success, but we are examining experiences in the public and private sector, both here and abroad, to find out what are the key factors behind the successful delivery of projects. Early work shows that those factors include full assessment of the risks involved in a project and clear plans for managing those risks; strong contingency plans; keeping a project to a manageable scale; ensuring that both the supplier and purchaser clearly understand the aims of the project and their respective responsibilities; and building in the capacity for learning lessons from previous projects, both good and bad.

Our aim is that, within the next three years, people will be able electronically to look for work and be matched to jobs, to obtain information and advice about benefits, to apply for training loans and student support, to submit tax and VAT returns, to book driving and theory tests, to apply for regional business support grants, to be paid by Government for goods and services and to notify different parts of Government of details, such as change of address, through a single transaction. The challenge for this Government—we believe in the value of public service and in investing in that service—is to ensure that the benefits of new technology are shared by the many, not just by the few.

I shall conclude by dealing with the issues relating to public servants. We said that we would value public services, and that includes public servants. The public service needs to be an agent of change. To do that, it needs to be innovative. Public servants must be advocates for the citizen, as well as ambassadors for the enterprise in which they work. We want more open public services—services that value people and develop their full potential. We want a civil service that values the differences that people bring to it and it must be strengthened by diversity in recruitment policies. We shall set targets for Departments to increase their numbers of disabled staff, initially in the senior civil service and, subsequently, at all levels.

We want managers to work in partnership with staff, to recogise and value the central role of their staff, and to develop a common understanding of the goals of their organisation. They should develop an agreed work culture and a shared commitment to training every individual. They should encourage and support staff to identify and enhance their skills, and promote an inclusive relationship between staff and their elected representatives. We have promised a better deal for staff and we will deliver it. We are working in partnership with the civil service unions to achieve those shared goals.

Much has been done, but much more remains to be done. I hope that today's debate will give hon. Members an opportunity to express their views about the Government's strategic approach to these matters, and I hope that I have given the Chamber sufficient detail to show that the Government do not just have a set of values that they will let lie on the shelf, but that we are actually trying effectively to implement those values.

2.58 pm

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I share with the Minister a novel sensation in speaking in this Chamber, but it is a pleasure to be here and we shall see how it goes. We shall see if the modernisation—if modernisation it is—is an improvement, because not all progress is improvement.

I enjoyed listening to the Minister. It is always a pleasure to hear him. I hope that he will not think it too churlish of me when I say that I hoped that the Minister for the Cabinet Office would introduce the debate on the White Paper herself. It is a little more than eight months since its publication and the right hon. Lady's predecessor did not have, or perhaps did not seek, an opportunity to debate the matter. I am glad that we are debating it, but I am sorry that the Minister herself did not see the value of attending the debate.

Angela Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: It is a bit soon to give way; I shall do so in a moment. It is significant that the right hon. Lady chooses not to attend this debate. She was happy to give evidence on the subject to the Public Administration Committee. The Chairman of that Committee, the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright), is present. He said to the right hon. Lady

"as you have had to think and read your way into all this"— the "Modernising government" White Paper—over the last few weeks, what . . . is the really key idea that you want to have a go at in all this?"

The right hon. Lady replied:

"I do not think that I can answer that fairly because I am still ploughing my way through a lot of the detail."—

That is fair enough. She continued:

"If what you are saying to me is, what is the key bit, what am I prioritising, I do not think I can give you a straight answer. But I think I can say . . . that the overall thing that drives me is simplification and commonsense."

I seem to have heard that somewhere before. Like other members of the Government, the right hon. Lady finds it advantageous to pick up on Conservative rhetoric, but not necessarily on Conservative reality. I give way to the hon. Lady.

Angela Smith: I am glad to see that the hon. Gentleman has read the minutes of the meeting of the Public Administration Committee on 23 November. Can he explain why there were no Conservative Members present to hear the Minister's evidence?

Mr. Lansley: You can hardly expect me to know the comings and goings of my hon. Friends Mr. Deputy Speaker. Unfortunately, the hon. Lady knows that such is the preponderance of the Government's majority—it is a deeply unhealthy thing—that Conservative membership of any Select Committee is rather sparse: we are spread much thinner than that of the governing party. I know that my hon. Friends on the Public Administration Committee have given full measure of service to that Committee. I often hear from them about the issues that are raised there.

I am interested in the concept of joined-up government. I wonder whether the Minister of State connected the matter with yesterday's debate in the Chamber and whether he can justify the joined-up character of Government thinking. The right hon. Gentleman set out the Government's policy to reduce the Post Office monopoly, but in the space of a few months, after he had moved on to better and brighter things, his successor had to announce that the Post Office monopoly was not going to be reduced. The talk about joined-up government is all very well and the talk about delivery is all very well, but the reality of joined-up government is a different matter.

The right hon. Gentleman spoke predominantly about technology. Modernisation in government, the process in which the Government are, purportedly engaged, is cloaked in technology. None of us wants to be slow to adopt technologies that deliver better results. There are two important themes relating to the introduction of technology that the Parliamentary Secretary may wish to consider when he replies to the debate. First, there are issues relating to access to technology and to the delivery of services through technology. When services are delivered, those accessing them may have to commit themselves to related expenditure or to buy in services. That is not always the case in respect of public services, but it can be. The cost of access, the availability of technology, of hardware and software, telephone access charges, call charges and, in respect of the internet, access to credit, must all be considered.

As was evident in the recent Joseph Rowntree Foundation report, those on relatively low incomes do not necessarily have access to bank accounts or to credit. If they work largely on a cash basis, it can be incredibly difficult for them to gain access to services if credit is required.

The second issue relates to the effectiveness of technology. It does not automatically follow that the application of new technology delivers a more effective service. From personal experience in constitutency postbags and surgeries, all hon. Members know of the difficulties that surround the Child Support Agency and are aware of its unhappy history. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. The Minister must not seek to attract my attention from a sedentary position.

Mr. Ian McCartney: I was actually standing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was Chairman of the first Standing Committee on which the right hon. Gentleman served, so he knows that I sometimes have such trouble.

Mr. Lansley: As the Minister knows, I was not a Member of Parliament at the time in question. The Child Support Agency has an unhappy history which stretches back under previous Governments. We await evidence of what will be achieved after the introduction of new legislation, but the Government have not yet solved the continuing problems. They have not been solved on previous occasions by what were perceived to be important measures involving new technology, call centres, computerisation and so on. All hon. Members have met constituents at surgeries who have received computer-produced letters that bear no relation to their circumstances. A constituent of mine received in the space of two days eight letters dispatched by a computer system, each of which stated exactly the same thing. Such communications are the product of technology, but they are not necessarily benefits, and we must be careful about the success or otherwise of the introduction of technological systems.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): On the point about the CSA, where a letter is produced every time there is change, it is not the technology that causes the problem, but the regulations on which it was based. Such problems are caused by the interaction between regulation and technology, rather than just by technology.

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. Indeed, it is not necessarily the regulations that cause such problems, but the system that operates the technology. There is a danger of technology, rather than people, driving the service. The people providing the service should have been aware that, if changes in circumstances were not dealt with quickly enough, the technology would cause eight letters to arrive on the same day, each one saying pretty much the same thing. Technology must be understood and introduced in the right way to deliver an effective service.

I am afraid that the record on the introduction of information technology is not a happy one. The Minister will be aware of the breakdown of the national insurance computer system, and that 285,000 pensioners are not receiving correct pension payments. Indeed, one third of those pensioners still have cases outstanding. He will be aware of the problems resulting from computerisation at the Passport Agency, although I shall not dwell on the matter, as the debate does not concern it. He will know that the Home Office is presently speaking about 17 major projects that it has undertaken, 11 of which have not been completed on the date that was originally estimated.

During the previous Session, I served on the Standing Committee considering the Bill that became the Protection of Children Act 1999. The Act set out to achieve a one-stop criminal records check, which was intended to be in place by December 2000. Reportedly, however, the Home Office now has so little confidence in its ability to deliver information technology systems such as those involved that the police criminal records check will perhaps not be available for another two years. The student loan fiasco that occurred during the summer is another example of such problems. It was perfectly clear in the initial stages of the new project that the software being sent out was inadequate. I remember speaking to local education authorities that were receiving weekly updates on the software.

The Minister has introduced a task force with precisely the objective of trying to tackle such issues across Government. I shall happily give way to him if he can provide some comfort about the mechanisms by which the Government will introduce further information technology systems such as those which I have mentioned.

Mr. Ian McCartney: In my speech, I set out the pillars of what the Government are now doing, not of what we are waiting to do. As well as assessing projects established under the previous Government, some of which are unworkable or have failed to work appropriately, and taking steps to get such projects on line, we have now adopted a rigorous approach involving the Cabinet Office and the Treasury. The aim is to determine the design of programmes and what they are set to achieve, and to deal with risk assessment. From now on, putting it under the carpet and hoping that it goes away—the previous Government's strategy—is not an approach that we would take. Within days of coming to power, we at the Department of Trade and Industry found and resolved the mess that they had made of the Post Office. I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has exercised his mind on this matter. I am hopeful that we will soon see significant changes in the delivery of public services through communications systems that work.

Mr. Lansley: It is a pleasure to get another speech from the Minister. I look forward to the rigour of which he speaks being applied to those projects.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister made an intervention. Had it gone on too long and become a speech, I would have stopped it.

Mr. Lansley: You have greater patience than I do Mr. Deputy Speaker. Clearly, I am impatient; I want to be back on my feet as quickly as possible.

If the rigour of which the Minister speaks is not applied, I am sure that parties and mechanisms in this House, through the Public Administration Committee and the Public Accounts Committee, will ensure that the fiasco in the Home Office of the past few days, which seems to persist with all the costs that it implies, is not allowed to continue.

The White Paper is called "Modernising government". Well, modernising is an adjective with various meanings. I am struck by the fact—it is, no doubt, a manifestation of the third way—that the Government prefer not to think in what they regard as old-fashioned terms of big government and small government. Indeed, the Prime Minister's foreword to the White Paper puts that concept in the past. They do not want to talk about big versus small or interventionism versus laissez-faire, but I am afraid that we need to talk about it because that is where the manifestation of worse government is occurring under the Labour Administration.

Although we might all favour better government, that often means leaner government—a Government who do only what they need to and no more. The Labour Administration talk about better regulation rather than deregulation—the idea of abolishing regulation is a bridge too far—but, for them, better regulation means more regulation. Some 2,700 additional regulations have cost business an additional £5.25 billion. They do not need us to tell them that they have failed; they can talk to the business community. It is extraordinarily unhappy about the volume and cost of new regulation.

Ministers talk about regulation, but in the space of the past few weeks they have had to introduce a whole new package. When we look inside the package, we see not proposals to reduce regulation, but proposals to have Ministers who have a title that says that they are supposed to reduce regulation. It also proposes to establish committees and examine the costs and benefits of regulation. We do not see the reduction in the burden of regulation and the setting of regulatory budgets for Departments that is required. I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary will promise that, because Ministers must put themselves under that discipline if they are serious about deregulatory proposals.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Graham Stringer): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there has been no serious change in the number of regulations that have been produced by this Government compared with the previous Government? The average is 3,000 a year for both Governments. I assume that we can expect the support of the Conservative party for the next year's regulatory reform Bill.

Mr. Lansley: There are points there. The hon. Gentleman wants to talk about the past, but I want to talk about the future. He mentions past regulations. The fact is that businesses, irrespective of what level of regulation applies to them, are concerned not with politicians debating how many additional regulations we place on them, but with politicians reducing the number of regulations.

If the Parliamentary Secretary studies the common-sense revolution, he will discover a pledge to reduce the burden of regulation over the lifetime of a Parliament. That will be achieved only by setting regulatory budgets with independent compliance cost assessment, and by understanding from independent assessment the impact of regulation, and by being prepared when necessary to consider the experience of regulation. We discussed the experience of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998. Such experience should be considered; it should be asked whether compliance cost assessments produced by Departments were proved correct. It will often be found that the cost was significantly underestimated and the benefits overestimated. In those circumstances, one must be prepared to get rid of regulations and to set an overall limit.

You would not expect me to dwell at length, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the deregulation and contracting out legislation that the Minister proposes to introduce next year. We shall consider it, but given that Ministers are proposing to give themselves the power to introduce regulations that increase burdens on some areas to try to reduce burdens on other areas, we shall be critical. The overall effect of deregulation should be to cut regulations rather than impose them. We shall also consider seriously the question of moving from enforcement orders to codes of practice. Enforcement bodies should be subject to orders rather than codes—codes are easily altered and orders are, in theory, the right direction in which to go. I shall not give the Parliamentary Secretary the comfort that he seeks.

I have been encouraged by my desire to hear deregulatory proposals from the Government to pursue the issue at length. However, the situation is symptomatic of a general issue about Government. Complex issues associated with Governments often are not susceptible to centrally determined solutions. I do not regard our desire to pursue limited government—the least government and the best-working government—as an ideological pursuit. I regard it as being eminently practical. If any Adminstrations have demonstrated such an approach, Conservative Administrations have. We have tried to tackle the deep-seated social issues that have bedevilled us. For example, we have achieved considerable economic advancement and increased the overall wealth of the country, without necessarily seeing those achievements translated into the resolution of social problems.

The recent Joseph Rowntree Foundation report made interesting reading on that point. It illustrated the fact that the economic growth and increasing employment that resulted from the Conservative legacy, from which the Government have benefited, have not necessarily translated into a reduction in poverty or inequality. The report referred to the first year of the Government, in which poverty and inequality rose, even though the economy and employment were growing fast. We are dealing with complex social issues that, as the foundation notes, are not susceptible to Government solutions resting on Government expenditure, legislation and control. The common-sense revolution is based on a principle—I commend it to the Minister as being applicable to the modernisation of government—of giving leadership to local organisations, giving freedom to individuals, families and their communities, giving leadership to communities and neighbourhoods and letting local government and communities give leadership instead of central Government being prescriptive.

I shall give the Minister a practical example. Local government should not have to respond to a central Government's prescriptions through an extension of the public service agreement. Rather, local government should be given the ability to set its own agenda and to determine it own priorities—to set for itself the measures against which it must be tested by the local community. The proposals currently being worked on by the Treasury and, perhaps, by the Minister of State, would turn local government into agencies of central Government. It would have to pursue the central—Labour—Government's ideas of what it ought to be doing across the country rather than setting local government priorities from what is set at not only local government but, preferably, community and neighbourhood levels.

Mr. White: Under the previous Conservative Government, the Local Government Association and its predecessor organisations used to meet Ministers. It was always rare for more than one or two Ministers from the Department of the Environment to be present and for other Departments to be represented. The Government have met the LGA on several occasions, and the LGA has been involved in a number of working groups. How does that square with the hon. Gentleman saying that the LGA is actively involved under this Administration, but was not under the previous one?

Mr. Lansley: It is symptomatic that every time I talk about what we ought to do now and in future, Government Members think that they should talk about what happened in the past.—[Interruption.] This time the Minister is seated. Now he is on his feet—I knew that there was a difference.

Angela Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: No, I shall move on. I do not wish to take up too much time because other Members want to speak, and I have much to say.

Better government is not just about the delivery of services; independence and accountability are also at the heart of the process. The right hon. Gentleman said a lot about technology, but not much about accountability, and still less about independence. We have heard a great deal over the past few months about the politicisation of the civil service: Ministers unwilling to contemplate an independent statistical service; Ministers pursuing a 20 per cent. increase in Government advertising in the first year in order to pursue their political agenda; and all but two directors of communication in Government Departments leaving within the first two years.

Andy Wood, who was director of communications for the Northern Ireland Office, said that the Labour Government press machine would become that characterised America. The number of special advisers has trebled. The Prime Minister said that his chief press officer had done an effective job of attacking the Conservative party, as if that were the proper role of even a temporary civil servant, let alone of someone who occupies so significant a position in the Government information machine. I also note that the post of head of attack at Millbank tower was advertised, and that the Labour party made it clear in the advertisement that there would be high-level connections between the head of the attack unit at Millbank—a party appointment—and civil servants involved in the No. 10 policy operation.

The right hon. Gentleman knows that I have been around Whitehall and the party machines in the past, and I was always clear about where those distinctions lay. I fear that Ministers and civil servants are now neither clear nor comfortable about them. Will the Minister explain why the Labour party machine is advertising for someone who will clearly be working on a political basis with civil servants?

Mr. Ian McCartney: I give the hon. Gentleman a commitment that I have not read his personal file from his days in the civil service. I am sure that it would make interesting reading.

It is nonsense to suggest that the previous Conservative Government were not politicising. They put the full-time chairman of the Conservative party into the Cabinet. Their Deputy Prime Minister did nothing but Conservative party business. They introduced special advisers who tried to boss their way round the civil service, politicising and introducing the Conservative party line.

This Government have introduced an opening up of the process, a clarity of responsibility between politicians and the civil service, and a re-engagement with the need to value civil servants, their advice and their help. We value the support of the civil service. The hon. Gentleman's colleagues did none of that when they were in government, nor would they in future. I do not know why the hon. Gentleman wants to have a debate about Labour party special advisers. He obviously does not like the fact that a good Government are operating very well, and that the public think that we are doing well, too. However, we are not complacent.

Mr. Lansley: I could dwell on that matter for some time. The right hon. Gentleman knows that I was principal private secretary to a chairman of the Conservative party as well as to a Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. I was a civil servant responsible for making sure a Minister was keeping separate his party and his Government responsibilities. He was paid not by the taxpayer, but by the party.

The Minister and his colleagues engage in many political activities—I sometimes wonder whether they spend more of their time on party political activities than on Government activities. The Labour party does not appear to be willing to pay ministerial salaries according to the extent to which Ministers engage in party activity. But, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should move on.

The Minister challenged me to say what was happening as a consequence. Time does not permit a full answer, but rather than delivering, the Government have talked about delivery. That involves not joined-up government but an excess of reviews. There have been 500 reviews so far, and, we now discover, 318 task forces have been established. The social exclusion unit is backed up by 18 policy action teams. A plethora of activity functions as a substitute for achievement.

The Minister knows that this is one of my bugbears. It is not good enough for the Government merely to talk about target setting. The Minister did so this afternoon—he said that 25 per cent. of Government services should have electronic delivery by 2002, 50 per cent. by 2005 and 100 per cent. by 2008. Targets do not necessarily involve delivery. Many such targets are offered as a substitute for delivery.

I know precisely what game the Minister and his colleagues are playing—it is called, "In a year or so's time". Instead of explaining what they have achieved during the past three or four years, they point to the targets that they have set for four or five years hence. That is why Ministers' rhetoric involves talk of 10, 15 or 20-year targets—they are a substitute for explaining what the Government have achieved during the past two and a half years. This year has been a year not of delivery, but of non-delivery.

I have examined the Government's annual report in detail. I shall not plagiarise what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday during Prime Minister's Question Time, but the Minister may recall that I, too, have discussed the integrated transport policy. Littered through the Government's annual report are references to supposed delivery. Of 177 so-called pledges, only 45 have been met, 33 have failed, 45 have been fudged and 54 have not yet been delivered. That is a sad catalogue of failure to deliver.

The Government have not increased their delivery as time has gone by—the number of reviews has multiplied. Some of the worst cases are like chickens coming home to roost. Only one week ago, the Prime Minister made a big thing about dealing with long-term care. The traditional approach involves establishing a commission—in this case, a royal commission—to show how important the issue is. However, when the royal commission reports, the Government take nine months to say, "Well, we do not know what we are doing to do. We shall look at the matter further." When targets are substituted for action, the public lose out.

In the time that remains, I want to emphasise what needs to be done. We need to reform not only particular policy but the structure of government and how it should be delivered. That does not simply involve de-layering government or—to give the Minister a graphic example—squashing the pyramid. The civil service is quite a narrow pyramid with many layers. When I was a grade 7 civil servant, I worked on the public spending round in the Department of Trade and Industry. Every time I saw the Minister, I was accompanied by the assistant secretary, the under-secretary, the deputy secretary and the permanent secretary. During conversations between a grade 7 civil servant and the Minister, four other civil servants kept an eye on proceedings. I suspect that things may have changed since then.

There is a good argument for de-layering the civil service and for ensuring that those who do the work have direct contact with Ministers. The relevant responsibilities should be pushed down the system. We must ensure that we do not fight the management battles of the last decade; we must prepare for the management challenges of the next decade. The Minister knows that that involves not squashing or flattening the pyramid but having distributed systems of management. In view of the way in which centres of activity are connected to each other, perhaps we should consider not a pyramid, but a pizza. We will not solve the problems of government by setting up reviews and task forces outside the structure of Government Departments—the co-ordination of decisions has to take place inside the Government. It will not happen as a result of deconstructing Cabinet government, which is the basis through which interdepartmental co-ordination should be happening, and also the basis on which Government accountability should be delivered. It will not be achieved by having bilateral discussions in the Prime Minister's study, which is apparently everybody's fond hope.

I noted a reference in Kavanagh and Seldon's volume which is relevant in that respect. A member of the Prime Minister's staff described him as "a big picture man", and was further quoted as saying:

"'If it is not on his agenda or in his big picture, then he cuts it out.'"

The authors add that a Cabinet Office official, on reading an early version of the book, added:

"'Yes, and potentially fatally so'".

The solution lies not in deconstructing Cabinet Committees and Cabinet government, but in working through Cabinet government while having better systems of management inside the Government.

The Minister spoke about the structure of the civil service. Conservative Members share some of his objectives in that regard. He was typically uncharitable about previous Conservative Administrations, but I assure him that my colleagues in the Conservative party value the role of the civil service. We are in the business not of wanting more or fewer civil servants, but of wanting only the minimum amount of government that is necessary, together with less regulation, less control and less tax. However, given that we have civil servants, they must deliver quality policy making, quality administration and quality management—indeed, they are often capable of doing so. Many values inside the civil service could easily be undermined by the way in which the Government are going about their activities. They are undermining the independence and impartiality of the concept of a disinterested public service that is not tied to the political priorities of a particular Administration.

Even the civil service should accept that an appreciation of risk is necessary. Civil servants should understand that there must be downsides as well as upsides—it is not just a matter of performance bonuses for delivering particular objectives. They should know, as those in the private sector know only too well, that if they do not deliver there will be a downside to balance the upside when they do deliver.

We should not blur the boundaries of what civil servants are responsible for. Ministers are responsible for policy. Policy failures that were not the civil service's responsibility are littered across the pages of the Government's annual report and their record in general. In the summer, the Prime Minister sought to divert attention away from his—and his ministerial colleagues'—failure to deliver and towards setting performance targets for permanent secretaries, as if they were responsible for the delivery of Government policy. That was not right.

Two things about the civil service should be clear cut—where accountability lies and the difference between Ministers' responsibilities and civil servants' responsibilities. It seems that civil servants who appear before Select Committees are increasingly responsible, in a personal sense, for the explanation of their administration. That should not happen if Ministers' statements about setting the policies to which their civil servants work have previously been clarified.

The Government's proposals on freedom of information cut directly against precisely that kind of open accountability. The class exemptions that the Government are proposing mean that we will not be able to see where the difference lies between what Ministers are responsible for—because they took the decisions—and the basis on which civil servants gave factual advice or advised about the practicability of a particular body. Those lines of accountability must be clear.

The civil service must be able to support its values of impartiality and independence as well as seeking to foster additional new values that set standards for employment as a whole. The Minister discussed diversity in terms of ethnic minorities and disabled people in the civil service. In my experience, the civil service strives in that respect to be as good an employer as one could fine anywhere. However, it still does not succeed in that respect, which illustrates the need for it to continue down that path, with our support. I read with great care the Schneider-Ross report, which was useful in illustrating the nature of the problem, and I have also seen the illustration from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions about the subjectivity of assessments and performance assessments of staff.

However, neither that problem, nor the problem of promotion within the civil service, will be solved simply by improving the civil service's recruitment procedures among ethnic minorities and other groups. We must focus on the extent to which people in the civil service from diverse groups are progressing on merit. I should be grateful if the Minister would respond to that point. We want not recruitment fairs and objective measures of recruitment, but objective assessment throughout the civil service, so that quality recruits can make progress at an early stage. We should demonstrate as soon as possible that ethnic minority candidates are capable of reaching senior positions such as permanent secretary.

Delivery is the test of government, but time does not permit me to list in detail the ways in which the Government have failed to deliver. I am afraid that matters are deteriorating. Class sizes have risen, waiting lists have risen, and crime is starting to rise. Britain is being brought to a standstill by a transport policy that simply is not working. Taxes have risen and regulation has increased; the burdens have increased and the benefits have decreased.

It is no good the Prime Minister talking about scars on his back from the failings of the civil service—he cannot deflect attention elsewhere. The failures are policy failures. The Government are talking about change in the civil service, but that change must be independent and impartial. Technology should be service-orientated and cater for the public's needs. We must work for people's benefit, rather than technology's benefit. We must ensure that the civil service is not only accountable, but able to deliver the service that the public want.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): I welcome the Minister to Westminster Hall. As a new Labour arch-moderniser, I am sure that he will soon get used to it. The opportunity to debate matters in a different style will prove valuable to us all.

Liberal Democrats welcome the White Paper's title: no one could possibly object to modernising government. I could find no reference in it to the national minimum wage, care homes or several other issues to which reference has been made, so I shall not discuss them. Modernising government and making it more accessible are good ideas, as are making it more efficient, accountable and focused on the public's needs. No one could object to such aims. In short, the White Paper is full of apple pie and motherhood. Since it was written, progress on the motherhood policy has perhaps been unexpectedly rapid.

Page 7 of the White Paper refers to "five key commitments", and I shall pick out some of the important issues arising from those five bullet points, or helpings of apple pie. Under the heading "Information age government", the document states:

"we will use new technology to meet the needs of citizens and business, and not trail behind technological developments."

That is an excellent aim, but one doubts whether this or any Government can turn those words into reality.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) mentioned in passing the Child Support Agency. A constituent of mine received 17 letters from the CSA in one week. On taking up the matter, I was told that the cause of the problem was not the regulations, but the computer programme. Every time that a line of data was entered and the return button was pressed, a letter was automatically printed out. There were also the Benefits Agency and pensions payments fiascos. There were problems with the Passport Agency's computer, and the immigration and nationality directorate's computer. There was the fiasco surrounding the smart card technology introduction programme, which has been abandoned, and the medical department at the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency. There is a long list of failed projects which have had a serious impact on precisely the citizens and businesses that should have benefited from the new technology and should benefit in future.

If information-age government is considered in another context—a broader, non-IT framework—the Government are not delivering and it is not clear from the White Paper that they intend to deliver. Freedom of information is surely a vital component of the information age, but the Government are obstructing full revelation of information. We are a million miles short of the freedom of information Act that we should have. As the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire said, policy advice will not be disclosed. There will not even be disclosure of historical records. One of my hobby horses is to have much more rapid publication of historical records and Cabinet papers. Some of the limitations currently in place are unnecessary and outrageous. The Government are a long way short of achieving their key commitment on information-age government.

Another key commitment refers to public service and states:

"we will value public service, not denigrate it."

I suppose that, at face value, that means a commitment to pay nurses a sensible rate so that London will not suffer the current problems of recruitment. It presumably means not slagging off teachers as being the forces of conservatism. It presumably means providing appropriate rewards for civil servants and, perhaps, for Cabinet Ministers, who are currently subject to a pay freeze. On the other hand, bearing in mind the comments of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) during a recent debate in the Chamber when he referred to Cabinet meetings taking up six hours a week of Cabinet Ministers' time in his day and now taking 30 minutes, perhaps that pay freeze is correct.

We must consider not only the practical issue of what we mean by valuing public service, but the subliminal messages about it. What have the Government tried to do in valuing public service? We have fewer police, national health service waiting lists are stuck and secondary school class sizes are at an historic high. There are serious gaps in the Government's plan to make the valuing of public service a key commitment.

There is a reference in the five key commitments to setting

"new targets for all public bodies, focusing on real improvements".

I shall refer to the police service as an example. I asked a question in the House about police efficiency and the Greater Manchester police service and the answer stated:

"This Government's Comprehensive Spending Review has set the police a 2 per cent. year on year efficiency target from April 1999.—[Official Report, 7 December 1999; Vol. 340, c. 501W.]

I also asked the Home Secretary what assessment he had made of the efficiency levels of individual police forces and the answer stated:

"There is no agreed formula for measuring police efficiency".—[Official Report, 7 December 1999; Vol. 340, c. 501W.]

The Government are referring, as the Conservatives used to, to efficiency savings that have no benchmark, no measuring stick, no monitoring process, and which the Minister in a previous incarnation would have said were cuts.

When it comes to setting

"new targets for all public bodies, focusing on real improvements", there is a long way to go.

The Government will have to do better than that. The House—and citizens and business—want quality public services, not the activation of cuts that were set in train by the previous Conservative Administration.

Then there is a reference to policy making being "forward looking". Both the Minister of State and the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire referred to joined-up government; there is certainly plenty of scope for improving it. As my party's spokesman on energy, I am only too well aware of the gaps and contradictions in Government policy between the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the Treasury.

I could talk at even greater length about the problems that are raised by the five key commitments, but concerned as I am about the contents of the White Paper and how those five commitments are to be fulfilled, I am even more concerned about the missing commitment: the commitment not simply to modernise government, but to make it more accountable. It was said of Mussolini that he made the trains run on time, so it is certainly possible to have modern, efficient and effective government that does not connect with the real world, the real needs of the public, or with the democratic system that is supposed to sustain it.

I heard the Minister say that one of the benefits of implementing the White Paper would be electronic data transfer between public bodies. That sounds fine in a speech in Westminster Hall, but what does it mean? Are we moving towards one great computer in the sky, which will interconnect every piece of information about every citizen and every business some time in the next century? We have talked about public bodies being connected, but what about semi-public bodies or bodies that may be privatised in the future? Will the Post Office be connected? What about private providers of the second pension or the banks into which pension payments will be made? Simply making government quicker, slicker and sharper does not necessarily make it more democratic or automatically more accountable.

Parliament is slow footed and hamstrung enough by its procedures and the power of the party machines. Much accountability is bypassed and many of the checks and balances that are supposed to be in place are disconnected and sidelined. A Minister is more likely to be held to account by Jimmy Young than by the Leader of the Opposition. I do not hear anyone contradicting me. The historic role of this place is at risk unless we see, in parallel with anything that may be done as a result of this document to modernise and speed up government, measures to ensure that Parliament can keep up with the Government and maintain—and strengthen—accountability checks.

I do not deny that some improvements have been made—this very meeting place is an example of an extra opportunity to hold the Government to account and the introduction of pre-legislative scrutiny is clearly an advantage. But the system is still poor. What steps will be taken as a result of the White Paper and the ensuing legislation to modernise accountability and make it easier for hon. Members to keep track of what the Government are doing—and easier for us to stop them when they are wrong?

The power of Back Benchers in this Parliament is extremely slender. At least I have the advantage of being an Opposition Member—

Mr. White: Long may it continue.

Mr. Stunell: To be a Labour Back Bencher is surely to be without power and influence. I intend to carry on in opposition until the next general election. After that, I hope to be able to put into practice some of the accountability that this place so desperately lacks.

[Mr. Stunell]

The White Paper sets out the Government's intentions on the roles of Government Departments and of agencies. It also describes how local government fits in, how the Government will connect to local communities, to the national business community and to the media, and how they will respond to every kind of intervention and pressure. It says nothing at all, however, about how the Government will relate to Parliament or about how they will be held to account by it.

Bearing in mind that glaring omission of the sixth key commitment, the Government cannot expect to receive a blank sheet of approval from this place or its hearty endorsement. It is the job of Parliament, and especially of Opposition Members, to ensure that the Government are held to account and that scrutiny occurs. I am keen to see the whole democratic system modernised, not just the Government. That system is designed to provide, and should provide, protection for the weak and vulnerable, and it should ensure that the powerful are held to account, and it should protect the liberty of the individual.

The White Paper could be said to be a step forward in ensuring one part of that. However, reading it and thinking about it, it seems, on the contrary, that it will be a step backwards. I look forward to hearing the Minister reply to the debate, and especially to hearing assurances from the Government that, in making themselves faster, leaner, more efficient and so on, they will also make themselves more accountable and more ready to give Parliament the role that it should have in monitoring and scrutinising their performance.

3.52 pm

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): I came here today to talk about the White Paper, and to deal with some of its good and bad parts, commenting on where progress has been good and where much still has to be made. I am, however, rather depressed about the tone of the debate. In particular, I was amazed by the tirade of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), who compared his party's record in government with that of the present Government, and said that everything was wonderful when a Conservative Administration were in power. When he was challenged on the subject, however, he said that we should not talk about it and that we needed to look forward. I find that rather strange. My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith) referred to the Select Committee on Public Administration, which is conducting an inquiry into innovations in government, and pointed out that no Tories had bothered to turn up at its sittings. Perhaps I should not be surprised at that.

I should like to comment on the White Paper's three aspects: pilots, culture and information technology, which has already been mentioned. I shall then speak briefly about the service action team objectives, which have recently been published on the internet.

Some good pilots are in operation. The Minister referred to jobcentre web pages, which have transformed the way in which people access jobcentres. People seeking a job are less likely to look at a web page once a week; they will look at it several times a day to see whether there are any changes, and so will find work much more quickly. People who do not want work will not look at the pages at all. The scheme has some good parts and some bad parts, as it addresses only some issues.

NHS Direct has been an especially good pilot. One of the reasons for that is that it has an end date, and that it has a clear path for translation into a permanent feature throughout the NHS. In considering pilots, that is one of the issues that the Government need to address. Sure Start is an example of a bad pilot because people in large areas of the country cannot gain access to it, despite the fact that they desperately want to, because the programme does not have as clear a target as the Department of Health identified for NHS Direct. Therefore, the Government should have a clear target in mind when they implement pilots. That links in to budgets. In the case of several successful pilots, their budgets have been built into the Department's standard budget. However—this applies particularly in local government where there is a stand-alone budget—it often proves difficult to translate an excellent pilot into full-scale services if, when the pilot is incorporated into mainstream services, the budget is not there to support it. That is the key issue for the Government.

There is also an issue with regard to how people access pilots. A classic example is a project that involved the Department of Social Security, jobcentres and local authorities. People chose to go to the jobcentre because they did not trust the Department of Social Security as a result of their previous experience of its culture, which was one of rejection and exclusion, whereas their experience of the culture at the jobcentre was one of inclusion, especially since the new deal. So people make choices about how they access services, and that has implications for the knock-on effects that pilots have on Departments.

One common criticism of pilots is the element of devolved responsibility and how that is measured. Some people take up devolved responsibility enthusiastically, ahead of their colleagues, who then have a problem relating to the pilot when it is implemented. The Government need to address those key issues, which are referred to in the White Paper, but we should also consider the experience of previous pilots. The Government should also accept that people want to introduce other pilots and should encourage rather than restrict them. I recognise the budgetary implications of that, but we need to consider from where pilots come.

That leads me on to consider the culture of the civil service and Government. During the previous Government, the Department for Education and Employment had a centralising and restrictive policy, so that every broken window and missing tile, every lack of toilet and every poor building in any school in the country was the fault of the Secretary of State. The previous Government suffered badly because of the way in which that was perceived by the general public.

Mr. Ian McCartney: It was their fault.

Mr. White: The Minister is right, but my point about how people perceive Administrations is critical. Consider the Department of Health, which used to have a similar problem with perception in relation to trolleys in hospital wards. The reorganisation of the health service, which involved getting rid of the internal market, giving trusts and health authorities much more power and devolving power and decision making, encouraged people to take responsibility for themselves. People now accept that those reforms are working. That is the contrast between a Government who cloak themselves in regulation, and who proceed to take all the blame and none of the credit, and a Government who devolve power, take the credit and improve services.

Mr. Lansley: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I am not sure what world he is living in. The Government have abolished grant-maintained status, so schools in my constituency that used to be able to manage things like broken windows and damaged tiles on the roof now have to go through the local education authority. They do not have the same powers or devolved responsibilities. The Government have gone in the opposite direction.

Mr. White: I do not know what planet the hon. Gentleman is on. I can only refer to the grant-maintained school that my children attend. The head of that school, Stantonbury, one of the largest in the country, now thinks that the Government's reforms are best for the education of kids. They relate what the school is doing to what is happening in the community and address the overall objective of raising standards. The experience in my constituency—I cannot speak for that of the hon. Gentleman—is that the reforms are working. They are for the best and help to raise standards. The literacy hour and similar projects work and are welcomed by teachers, parents and anyone with a sensible view of education.

A major problem with innovation is how to get people to accept it. Administrations have had that problem with many projects for a long time. The White Paper does not place sufficient emphasis on how to achieve that. Implementing new projects requires clear political leadership. No doubt I am teaching my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary how to suck eggs when I refer him to the experience of local government. Those authorities with clear political leadership brought people in to make changes while those that went through the motions were not able to implement them. That critical distinction, which the Government are learning to make, must be understood if government modernisation is to work.

When we talk about modernising government, we forget the crucial role of the regulators. It was refreshing to hear the Rail Regulator at a west coast main line meeting yesterday; he understood his powers and was prepared to use them. I contrast that with Oftel which does not understand how it can influence the agenda on e-commerce.

We have talked about the need for accountability, but the fragmentation of the ombudsman system and the different complaint mechanisms needs to be addressed as part of modernising government. It would not be right to have an all-embracing ombudsman, but the interaction, for example, of the local government ombudsman and the health ombudsman, which must happen if we are to get rid of the Berlin wall between the social services and the health service, needs to be addressed. At the moment, people with complaints that involve both services have to go to both ombudsmen.

I am also concerned about language, in particular how it is used by Parliament. I doubt whether many citizens who are not lawyers can understand our laws because of the way in which they are written. If we are to modernise government, we need to modernise the language that is used in our Bills. Many Departments recognise that that is necessary for forms, but they do not apply the same strictures to their language of process.

It is important that comprehensive spending review 2 takes on board and accelerates the process of change. That is a key consideration if CSR2 is to deliver on change.

I have a couple of points to make on information and communication technology. I am worried that only public sector ICT projects appear to fail. From my work in the private sector, I know that many private sector companies have had IT failures, but they do not get the same publicity. This country is particularly bad at project management. Investing in the skills of project management would benefit the Government and the private sector. I will not dwell on the blockages that various ICT reforms are experiencing, except to say that the role of the voluntary sector in delivering access to new technology has been overlooked. The Government should give that greater priority.

A great deal of progress has been made on the service action team's action plan, which was published in October. A lot of progress has been made, but there should be an on-going process, not a one-off exercise. The current standard of web page design throughout Government lacks coherence and that should be improved.

Mr. Ian McCartney: We issued a document on the upgrading of all Government websites, which will be reviewed in March next year. If hon. Members want a copy of that, I shall circulate it to those who are in the Chamber.

Mr. White: Many of the service action teams had a wide range of people, but one area that was not well represented was that of rural issues. That is important because access in urban, suburban and rural areas is different and that needs to be addressed.

A good start has been made on modernising government. Some key issues will challenge the government in coming months, particularly how CSR2 can take the process forward and the crucial nature of political leadership in Departments. We have made a good start and the White Paper is a good blueprint, but everyone must buy into it if it is to be successful.

4.6 pm

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase): I was encouraged when I heard the Minister say that we would be more European and consensual, but we had a long exchange about the minimum wage, which went on for ever. We then had a dispiriting and churlish performance from the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) who was particularly ungenerous in trying to score points against the Minister for the Cabinet Office, who was not in the Chamber, about her appearance before the Public Administration Committee.

[Dr. Tony Wright]

We were delighted that, after only a few weeks in office, the Minister was prepared to come and exchange thoughts with us. It was an interesting occasion and I shall give an example of how responsive she was. When we discussed civil servants and how their experience would be enriched by secondment to the private and voluntary sectors, it was suggested that Select Committees would benefit if civil servants were seconded to them. She readily responded to that idea and wrote to me today to say that, having given further thought to the matter, it was a splendid idea and she would consider how it could be carried forward. That was an unusual response from a Minister, showing a desire to strengthen Parliament and a willingness to consider how to modernise government in general. We shall cast a veil over the attendance record of Conservative members of the Committee.

If our discussion was more European and consensual, it would have to be said that we are discussing one further instalment in a very long process of modernising government. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire would have made a better speech if he had told us about some of the building blocks in the process during the past 20 years or so. There has been a lot of reform in the civil service, and the public sector has changed out of all recognition. People find it impossible to understand who runs anything any more. I do not intend to be as negative as that sounds, but that is the effect of what we have done. Regulators have been mentioned and it is virtually impossible for people to understand who runs any public or quasi-public service. It could be argued that that does not matter so long as those services work well and something can be done when they work badly. They must have a seamless operation, but against a background of complete fragmentation. The agency process and the contracting-out process—all of the processes that we know about—have transformed the character of the public sector over the past 20 years. Our task now is to co-ordinate it again—to make it seamless—and to incorporate proper accountability. That was the unfinished business that was left over from the reform exercises.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire—this time, I refer to him more generously—quoted my question to the Minister for the Cabinet Office about the big idea. It is difficult to summarise what the big idea is in the process. The process has been going on for many years, and it will continue to do so, the result of which will be—if we get it right—that the public services will work better. That big idea is surrounded by all of the management-speak and buzz-words that make us, if we are not careful, rather cynical.

The process has acquired a momentum that it did not previously have. It would be wrong to say that there are no benchmarks or targets, or actions to set against those targets. It is unusual to have a White Paper and an action plan that includes great lists of what it calls milestones. We know what the targets are, and we are aware of the concrete measures against which the targets will be delivered. The system cannot be accused of being ethereal—it is concrete, and it is linked to a series of action programmes that require the people who work in the areas that are covered by the White Paper to deliver.

We have discussed modernising government, which suggests that we have unmodernised government. In some ways we do have that—the White Paper is good at identifying the key points of unmodernisation that need to be corrected. All government services used to be delivered by either the Government or local government, but we have come a long way since then. At that time, all that one needed to know was whether a particular function was the responsibility of the Government or of local government. I am afraid that we did not ask many questions about how good those services—whether central or local—were. When we asked, "What are you doing about education?" or, "What are you doing about health?" the answer, at best, would be, "Oh, we are spending £X million of your money in that area." That was as far as the argument about the effectiveness of public services used to go. The argument was entirely about what went in, not about what came out.

That argument also largely ignored the role of users of the services, which were provided in a top-down way. That system lacked user input and responsiveness, for which a political price had to be paid by those of us who were great believers in public services. We assumed that, if we simply told people that we believed in public services and that we were putting resources into them, we did not need to discuss how the system worked. An enormous change has taken place in that regard. We now focus on outcomes and we have to use dreadful words such as "joined-up" and "holistic" because they help us to think about government in the round. We know that problems do not come in neat departmental segments; that is not how people live their lives or experience problems. There is a mismatch between the way in which Governments organise themselves and the way in which problems arise, and part of the programme involves making a better connection between the two.

I conclude by making two or three brief points. First, I want to prove how unmodern I am. It sounds uncontroversial to say that we want all Government services to be delivered electronically by 2000. An innovation of the "Modernising government" White Paper is the people's panel, which asked:

"If you were able to use these services to deal with government, which, if any, do you think you would use?"

The overwhelming majority, 72 per cent., said that they would use telephone services. Only 25 per cent. of people over 65 think that new technology will improve Government services. We should pause for a moment and consider the gap between the ideology of modernising government and life as people live it. In many respects, this country is like a gigantic call centre in which one cannot have a conversation on the telephone with a public sector or private sector organisation, even though telephone systems are heavily staffed. Ordinary people are saying that being able to talk to someone on the telephone is rather important.

Similarly, the people's panel listed places, such as banks, where households might access government, and asked people how attractive they found each option. Sixty-four per cent. regarded the post office as the most attractive option. That should remind us that, for many people, the local post office fulfils a crucial social function. A certain mind set says, "Wouldn't it be a gee whiz idea to conduct electronic transfers through banks?" However, for many people and for a wide variety of reasons, access to the local post office is crucial, and is an important way of interacting with the state. I offer that point as a prehistoric, unreconstructed caution, in the context of my great enthusiasm for the entire programme.

Secondly, various references have been made to freedom of information. I shall not say much about it—I could easily bore hon. Members on that subject—but, so far, the point in relation to the "Modernising government" White Paper has been largely missed. There is a complete contrast between the way in which the policy process is dealt with in that document and in the Freedom of Information Bill. The White Paper states:

"Government should regard policy making as a continuous learning process, not as a series of one-off initiatives. We will improve our use of evidence and research so that we understand better the problems we are trying to address."

That is how one should view the policy process, but one cannot make it a continuous learning process if barriers to learning are imposed and people's ability to participate is closed off. Unfortunately, the Freedom of Information Bill—which was transferred from the Cabinet Office to the Home Office, and has become a different animal—has created three different protective layers. If one gets past one layer, a second and then a third is encountered, and access to the policy process is denied.

It is not possible to engage in a continuous learning process—which, as expressed in the White Paper, is exactly the right way in which to view policy—if policy is dealt with in the manner outlined in the Freedom of Information Bill.

Mr. Stunell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that joined-up government works only if the various parts of Government can talk to one another and take advantage of the advice and experience of the outside world? That is a problem with the current dichotomy between the Government's two proposals: they are not examples of joined-up thinking.

Dr. Wright: I may not have expressed myself as well as I intended to. The policy process will be strengthened if more people can contribute to it and evaluate the raw material on which policy decisions are based. That will improve and strengthen government, rather than weaken it.

If there is a gap in the White Paper, it centres on the word "accountability". It is surprising not to see accountability identified as a key objective of this process. The White Paper almost deals with accountability as a kind of problem, a kind of brake on what one can do. It refers to the fact that

"the cultures of Parliament, Ministers and the civil service create a situation in which the rewards for success are limited and penalties for failure can be severe."

It goes on to discuss the virtues of risk taking. I know what is being said here: it is a matter of how we can introduce more risk. In our exchanges with the Minister for the Cabinet Office the other day, she was frank enough to admit that more risk might mean more policy failure. We have to be intelligent and grown-up about that.

However, there are areas of life—whether the protection of children or making sure that ambulances run as they should—in which risk has no part to play. The reason why many of those responsibilities are in the public sector is that they are areas in which we are not prepared to play around with risk. In grasping that the role of risk has to be enlarged in the public sector, we must also be clear where the boundary lines are.

We must be clear that modernising government is not to be achieved at the expense of accountable government. That would be a profound mistake. People often have separate conversations about this: some talk in a technocratic way about modernising government and about delivery—it is important that they should, because we want efficient and effective public services—while others talk about the big accountability issues, which are also important.

It is rare to find people who talk about effectiveness and accountability in the same conversation, yet that is what we want. We need people who are committed to ensuring that we get effective and efficient services, but who know that those services must be accountable. There has been a loss of the traditional kinds of accountability as the public sector has become fragmented in the way that I have described.

If we were engaged in a less European and more partisan exercise here, I would have to remind the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire that one of the most devastating reports issued by the Public Accounts Committee during the previous Parliament was an indictment of the way in which the newly freed public bodies—quangos and the rest—had been guilty of the most extraordinary incompetence, malpractice and worse. It was a devastating account of what happens if one does not make government accountable and modernise it at the same time. Those are not separate agendas, but very much parts of the same agenda. A gap has become evident as we have moved on to talking about users of services. Although that is an advance, there is a difference between users and citizens. Citizens are people who also engage in the shaping of services. The whole agenda should properly have been dealt with by the White Paper, and I hope that it will be dealt with in due course.

I should like to return to an issue, that was briefly touched on by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire. Many of the matters that we discuss may seem to be managerial or limited by managerial considerations, but they are not. In fact, they have the most profound implications for how we organise the control of our public services. We cannot do the things that we are talking about doing in respect of the senior civil service—closely fixing and identifying performances, linking them to payments, measuring what people do—and still pretend that the civil service can continue to live under the veil of anonymity while ministerial responsibility continues to exist in its traditional form. It is inconsistent to claim that Ministers alone are responsible when, in practice, we are visibly putting mechanisms in place to ensure that civil servants are responsible. A real conflict arises in respect of the way in which the reforms are, rightly, progressing and will continue to progress after the publication of the Sunningdale conference report. It is not possible to reconcile that process, which is about making a can-do civil service in which people are responsible for their actions, with the traditional doctrine of ministerial responsibility, which provides anonymity. Those different approaches are irreconcilable. We must confront that fact, because it is one of the major constitutional implications of the modernisation process.

The White Paper will come to be seen as an extremely important document and an extremely important moment in a longer process. I shall conclude on a wretchedly ungenerous note, for which I apologise. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire extolled the virtues of a leaner state. However, we have heard years of sterile argument between people on the left who say that we need a bigger state and people on the right who say that we need a smaller state, while all the time the real argument should have been about how we get a better state that does the things that it should be doing and does them well. That is the breakthrough that is expressed in the White Paper. It represents a kind of revolution, which is, typically, a quiet revolution.

Angela Smith (Basildon): This is the first time that I have had the opportunity to speak in this Chamber, other than a brief intervention earlier in the week. I admit that I had reservations when it was first established, but those have now been put to rest. I have realised to my surprise that it has two great benefits. The first is to discover, when speaking, that Ministers have faces. Labour Members are used to looking at the backs of Ministers' necks. There is great benefit to be gained from seeing how the Minister's face changes as I talk. I hope that the smile on his face does not change to a frown too often.

The second benefit applies particularly to Conservative Members. When we speak in the main Chamber, with Labour Members on one side and Conservative Members on the other, shadow Ministers can look very lonely. Under these new arrangements, the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) does not look nearly so lonely, having been deserted by his colleagues, because he is surrounded by Labour Members. Given the lack of Conservative Members attending the Public Administration Committee, however, he may be getting used to that.

I am surprised that some hon. Members do not fully embrace the White Paper and wish to move forward from it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) said, modernisation is about the quality of government and making better government. It is about the quality of service that we as Members of Parliament can provide for our constituents and the quality of delivery at every level of government. It is also about the public's ability to hold the Government and those in power to account.

Unless we believe that government does not matter, we must support the modernisation programme. Hon. Members may disagree with specific proposals, but we must look behind them to make sure that what really matters is what happens on the ground, how the public perceive them and how their lives are affected by them. What counts is not our debates here, and whether we wear top hats when we make points of order during a Division, or whether, with due deference to my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. White), laws should be printed on vellum or paper, but actions. What really matters is the quality of service that our constituents receive and whether they feel that the Government are listening to them. In recent debates on the Representation of the People Bill, we discussed how to increase voter turnout, but democracy is a far wider issue than that. That is why the White Paper is so welcome.

Hon. Members of my generation will recall Snoopy cartoons. I am a fond fan of Snoopy and I used to have a car sticker that said, "If you don't vote, don't crab"—that is, if you do not take part in the process, do not complain. We want people to take part in the process, but not just by voting or complaining about something; they should feel that they are relevant to the process and that someone is listening to them. They should engage in the political system.

I have been criticised by some of my colleagues because I am always saying to constituents, "Write to your MP. Let your MP know how you feel", and I have said it publicly. By performing even that basic action, people are engaging in the political process. I want my constituents to feel that the Government listen, that they are responsive to what they hear and act on it.

I was disappointed to see that, when my right hon. Friend the Minister was speaking, the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire, who was sitting with a colleague, laughed and derided the notion of the Government listening to women.

Mr. Lansley: It may help to explain that we were discussing the fact that the Government had once again stolen Conservative party policy, as found in our listening to Britain programme. We were not deriding the process, merely the Government's derivative character.

Angela Smith: The hon. Gentleman's history is at fault. I remember taking part in Labour's listening to women programme when I was selected as a candidate for my constituency of Basildon. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman's actions explain why his political hero is Norman Tebbit.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire complained earlier about regulations and the burdens on small businesses. He said that he wanted to look forward, not backwards, and that a future Conservative Government—I find hard to imagine such a thing—would get rid of regulations on business. I can understand why he did not want to look back and defend the previous Government's record. His colleague, the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Portillo), said that his Government had passed volumes of new rules and laws interfering in almost every aspect of business and social life, so that might explain why the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire did not want to look back.

We must consider the response of public services and make it clear how much we value them. We rely on those in the front line to deliver the services that we debate and for which we legislate. We are dependent on public servants and we must ensure that they are responsive to the public. As Senator Robert Kennedy said, "Some people look at things and say, 'Why is that?' I look for things that could be and say, 'Why not?'" I may be paraphrasing, but that is the gist of it. We have to ask why not in the context of the White Paper.

When my right hon. Friend the Minister was speaking about the different hurdles that we put in the way of people before they can get the services they need, he brought to mind a constituent of mine. She has a child with health problems that necessitated special educational support. The family also needed the help of a carer, respite care for their child and adaptations to their home. Every time the parents wanted support or help from a different agency they had to explain everything all over again. They dealt with health, social services and education departments separately, even though they are part of the same authority, with the district council and with the Benefits Agency. They had different forms to fill in and had to give the same information to many different people. It is unfair on families under such pressure to make them go through the hoops again and again. Why cannot one person visit them at home to make things easier for them? There was no lack of willingness to help in any of the agencies and there is no criticism of individuals, but the system made it dispiriting and difficult for them. There was no one place from which to obtain the information that they needed and they had to hunt it down.

I pay tribute to some of the voluntary organisations in my constituency. The community resource centre run by Maggie Viney and Linda Figg is a one-stop voluntary agency to which people can go for information, which is very helpful. I am impressed by the home start group, which was set up in the back room of the Barge pub in Basildon by Geraldine Evans, and taken over by Paula Burns. It is a one-stop shop to give people the information that they need. It, too, was undertaken voluntarily. We can learn a lot from what those people are doing and incorporate their ideas into a partnership.

Even in my constituency, people are not treated the same. The previous Government made a complete botch of local government reorganisation. That means that on opposite sides of the street people have to deal with different councils. In one case, there is a unitary authority, in another part of the constituency there is two-tier local government. Constituents find it hard to understand why someone just down the road has different delivery of services and different people to whom to talk. That must change. I welcome the Government's commitment to consultation, but the public will become increasingly wary of being consulted if there is no action at the end of the day. We must ensure that consultation is genuine and that action results from it.

I welcome the commitment in the White Paper to the people's panel. I hope that some of my constituents are involved in that project; if not, I can give the Minister a list of names and addresses of people he might like to include. The chief executive of my local authority told me about a man who complained constantly about the council. Some people thought that he was a bit of a nuisance, but the chief executive did not. He looked on the man as a resource, who told him what is happening, what people were moaning about and what they wanted to be done. We should use such resources: that man would be welcome on the people's panel.

I have been slow to grasp the benefits of new technology. I admit that it has taken me a long time to get to grips with e-mail and the internet. However, I was convinced that it was the right thing to do when I found the Widdy web on the internet, which contains a mile of information about the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe). It led me to set up my own website, although I shall not call it anything like the Widdy web.

We are not making the best use of the new technology. We should use it far more than we do, although not everyone has access to internet websites. I should point out that the Conseryative party website keeps blocking my access to all sorts of things, such as press releases. It is a shame that the Conservative party does not practise what it preaches about freedom of information.

I welcome the report and the work that the Government are doing, but I want my constituents to know that we are a responsive Government; we do not just listen, we are committed to action. The White Paper takes us one step along that road.

Mr. Hilary Benn (Leeds, Central): I welcome the opportunity to contribute to this debate because the process of government is one that we would all do well to reflect upon. It is wholly appropriate that we are having a debate about modernisation in a modernised Chamber.

I make one suggestion about the arrangements: it was a rather surreal experience listening to the speech of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and seeing on the annunciator the name of my right hon. Friend and father, the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), speaking simultaneously in another place, if I may refer to it as that. If it were possible to have an annunciator that related to the proceedings of Westminster Hall, that would be an act of modernisation in itself.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire referred to failure in delivery. That does not appear to be the electorate's perception of the Government's success in the past two and a half years, to judge by the Labour party's lead in the polls. If that represents failure, please can we have a lot more of it from Ministers.

Let me be clear and frank: not all regulation is perfect, but some is necessary. It was unwise of the hon. Gentlemen to pick on the minimum wage, because one could not ask for a better example of regulation that is necessary in the interests of protecting the weak and vulnerable, of whom the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) rightly spoke. If my right hon. Friend the Minister achieves nothing else in the rest of his parliamentary career—I know that that will not be the case—he will go down in history as the person who did more than anyone else to give the people of this country the minimum wage. We are all grateful for that.

On targets and delivery, I think that the literacy and numeracy strategies are a perfect example of the case for a clear target. All hon. Members would agree on the need to improve literacy and numeracy, especially among those who are most disadvantaged by a lack of those skills when they leave school, and to provide a mechanism to deliver that improvement. I take this opportunity to place on record my congratulations to the teachers and head teachers in my constituency on their work in trying to achieve improvement.

I should like to refer to the role of special advisers, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for South

[Mr. Hilary Benn]

Cambridgeshire. I should perhaps declare an interest as a former special adviser. Special advisers are a much maligned group. Every time there is a change of Government, the papers are full of tales of warning about this new group of politically motivated people who will subvert democracy, undermine the civil service and so on. One would not think for a minute that special advisers as a species have been around Whitehall for more than a quarter of a century, which makes them sound very ancient. We know that the special adviser is a peculiar form of civil servant—a point that was made forcefully to me when I opened my letter of appointment as a special adviser. It said that I was obliged to abide by the civil service code of conduct, but with two exceptions. First, I was exempt from the requirement that civil servants should not engage in party political activity, which is a recognition of the peculiar and particular role of special advisers. Secondly, the letter said rather pointedly that I was also exempt from the requirement that normally all civil servants should be appointed on merit. I did not take that personally.

The letter was a good way for the civil service machine to tell special advisers that they are rather different, as indeed they are. It is a typically British compromise. When there is a change of Government in other countries, the whole top tier of the civil service disappears and is replaced by a new set of people. In our British way, we have found a mechanism that gives Ministers in all Governments the support that they need to achieve their objectives, while recognising that Ministers, special advisers and civil servants have different roles. Arguments about politicisation of the civil service do not, therefore, stand up to scrutiny, and provided that each of the players understands his or her different roles, advisers help Governments of all parties to achieve their objectives.

I want to make two brief points. First, I should like to reflect on the fact that government is about the relationship between Government and the governed. We stand on the edge of the new millennium, never mind of the period in office of the previous Conservative Government. Some big changes have occurred during the past millennium, such as the end of the absolute right of kings. Poor old Canute discovered that his writ did not run to the sea. The whole of the thousand years has been about people who thought that they had power—and in some cases did—coming to terms with the desire of people who live in the same country to have some say over that country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) mentioned the people's panel, which is a great innovation. One could probably have described the barons at Runnymede as the first manifestation of the people's panel to which King John found himself having to justify his power. My serious point is that government today faces the challenge of a much better educated and informed society. That is a healthy challenge to face, and it manifests itself in all sorts of forms.

I was speaking recently to a general practitioner. Patients may now see their doctor, having obtained on the internet printed information about their condition and about new forms of treatment, and, although not medical equals, engage in an informed discussion. All hon. Members will be familiar with the use of such information in the worlds in which we operate. It is healthy, and it creates a challenge for the way in which government works. People will argue with us as equals, and information is at the heart of the new relationship.

The first challenge that the White Paper addresses, taking account of that fundamental fact, is the form that government will take in the next century. Information is the key—the Government must have information to be able to target resources. My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. White) commented on the comprehensive spending review process. I saw part of that process from the inside because of my former role. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase noted, the arguments are largely about what money is to be spent on and what will be received in return. That is wholly positive. In addition, the electorate want information to challenge us and our decisions. That is an essential part of the accountability of which other hon. Members spoke and a part of the openness in government to which we all aspire.

Occasionally—the food safety scare is a good example—the trick for the Government might be to say, "Here is the information and the advice from the chief scientific officer. We are no more scientifically qualified than you are; there might be a small risk. As adult members of our society, you can make a judgment using the information." The debate is interesting. People might come to the Government and ask whether 100 per cent. safety can be absolutely guaranteed, but we could not truthfully offer such a guarantee. Sharing information with people and allowing them to make decisions would be a step forward.

The second challenge—I say this with some feeling, having been elected for the constituency of Leeds, Central on an extremely low by-election turnout—is that there is another group in society. Some members of that group, whether through circumstances or by choice, are disengaged from the process of government. We knock on their doors, but they are not interested—they do not see the relevance to their lives of what we do and they are not convinced that the Government can make a difference. That is also an accountability issue.

We must recognise that modern government is an increasingly complex business. One reason why Governments have established organisations such as agencies, arm's-length bodies and task forces is that that is a way of managing the complex process. The weakness of our party political system is that it tends to encourage a five-yearly auction with the electorate. If we were being perfectly honest, we would accept that we tended to say, "Whatever your problems are, we will solve them if you vote for us." We know that that is not the reality and we probably do the process of efficient government a disservice.

The good example of risk has been mentioned. If one wishes civil servants to take more risks, one must be prepared to live with the consequences of failure. We know what the political process does under those circumstances—the Opposition see it as their job to say that the Government have failed and are not competent, and that a Minister should resign. That is not necessarily the best way to act. The question of policy advice is also relevant to the issue of freedom of information and we must reflect on that.

The process is not necessarily comfortable for us as politicians. Sharing power, information and accountability can be hard. I am not sufficiently naive to think that party politics will ever be written out of the script. At its best, it sharpens the nature of debate and the choices that we must make as elected politicians. However, it is worth recognising the limitations that it can create.

The most important feature of the White Paper is that it is open to the challenges that modernising government will create for us all in the next century; we may not yet have all the answers.

Mr Neil Turner (Wigan): I was anxious to speak, even if only for some catharsis, because I seem to have spent the past two or three years doing nothing but talking about modernising government. That was about local government, however. While a councillor, I was the chairman of the best value panel introducing best value to Wigan. As a result of holding that post, I was a leading member of the team modernising the way in which the council acted, in advance of the Local Government Bill currently being considered in the other place. I was also a member of the Local Government Association's quality panel and so was involved in establishing the project to improve local government. I shall mention that later.

I was interested to get the White Paper off the internet. I should confess, in light of the Freedom of Information Bill, that that was done for me. I read it avidly, which may raise one or two eyebrows, but I do have a large number of anoraks at home. In contrast to previous Governments, I was struck by the commitment to public service and public servants. That is not an aside, but central to the whole process. Chapter 4, entitled "Quality public services", begins:

"This Government believes in the public service and public servants."

Chapter 6 states:

"Public service has for too long been neglected, undervalued and denigrated. It has suffered from a perception that the private sector was always best and the public sector was always inefficient. The Government rejects these prejudices."

That is right. I was a little surprised to hear the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) reject that. He is infected with the same collective amnesia as the rest of his party. I am not alone in thinking that their local government legislation was a wholesale attack on public service and public servants.

I was really sold on best value in Wigan. The chief executive told me that there were 75 cross-departmental organisations in Wigan council. Some were administrative groups led by public servants, but many should have had member involvement. That sold me on the need for best value and the involvement of members in scrutinising issues. I was keen on releasing the talent of public servants in local and central Government by turning from a blame culture to a "learn from our mistakes" culture. That meant admitting mistakes but not saying, "It's your fault." That would allow us to learn from mistakes and to ensure a better future.

I laid down and agreed the approach for Wigan. However, the last thing that I said was, "We've got it wrong. We have to recognise that there is no way that we can sit down here and get all this right at the first attempt." We did not know where we had gone wrong; that would only come out when the new process was put into practice. I quickly found out that a major reason why it was not working was that we overloaded people. We put the scrutiny role of best value above normal council activities.

One issue that is relevant to best value is that of inspectorates. There are a lot of inspectorates. They suck talent out of local government by employing people at high salaries. We need to remember the adage, "You do not fatten the pig by constantly measuring its size." It is important that the people who do the work are recognised as being important. That is where the best value lies.

I mentioned the improvement project. The Local Government Association established that project and the improvement and development agency to improve local authorities. The approach is to assist, criticise, examine weaknesses and strengths and to suggest ways forward. That approach is rightly replicated in the White Paper. However, we should be careful because some parts of government use the name and shame approach as the first option. Naming and shaming is demotivating and should be used as the last resort.

I was involved in two week-long projects, one in Mansfield in November and the other in Hull in March, which shows dedication bordering on, if not insanity, at least martyrdom. Those projects were very interesting and valuable. Once the improvement project has suggested improvements, it will review the situation six or nine months later to see how local authorities have followed up the points that it made. That is an important part of the process.

Last Friday, I was in my constituency helping colleagues at the council to consider how to deal with the modernising programme and the structures that need to be put in place following enactment of the Local Government Bill. One of the issues raised by hon. Members during consideration of that Bill was the question of secrecy, referred to in questions 35 and 36 of the Public Administration Committee's report. The issue centres on policy development. Some see that as a major issue and an innate part of the whole process, but I do not see it in that way. It is important that we recognise that it is a problem, but a problem that can be resolved. The important thing is to ensure that the whole council is involved in policy development, and that it is not left to the executive to decide policy in secret and hand it down as if it were written on tablets of stone. Policy must be decided by the whole council, and the cabinet or executive must execute that agreed policy. Then we can follow the scrutiny role, learning lessons on the way, in order to develop policy that accurately reflects the needs of the people in any particular local authority.

Another important aspect of our actions—this is relevant to the modernising government agenda at not only local but national level—was to recognise that it is important not only to think about internal structures but to develop links. That is recognised in chapter 3, which refers to responsive public services as "genuine partnerships between those providing services and those using them."

It is essential that we develop those wider partnerships, as we are doing in Wigan. We are ensuring that voluntary organisations, such as Age Concern, for example, are involved in services for the infirm. In developing sporting facilities and our sports field strategy, we are involving local football and rugby clubs. We involve representatives from business, such as the chambers of commerce and training and enterprise councils when considering how to retain businesses in the authority and how to bring in new businesses. Local agencies, such as the police, the health trust and health authority, and neighbouring authorities and central agencies, such as the Benefits Agency, need to be brought together to provide services. Those partnerships must not operate in isolation, so that there is one partnership with social services and another with young people, because they are interconnected. We need to create a matrix of relationships that can feed into the community plan, which is an integral part of the best value process, and into policy development for the community.

I welcome the moves to exchange public servants because it is important to build up personal relationships so that people can learn from others' experiences of working in health authorities and local and central Government in order to give them a better understanding of how all those government organisations that serve the people can relate to each other and feed back their experiences so that there is a wider understanding throughout. It can be difficult to break down barriers, but it is essential that we do so.

I hope that the modernisation process described in the White Paper is not party political. It will happen as e-commerce, e-mail and electronic communication come about. This modernising White Paper tackles those subjects by ensuring that the services that we provide are more relevant to the people who use them than they were in the past. It is important that we welcome the White Paper and make it work.

5 pm

Mr. Lansley: With the leave of the Chamber, I should like to capture a few of the issues before the Parliamentary Secretary responds to the debate. The White Paper and the debate raised some important issues. I shall reflect on two or three of them and provide some focus for our views on the subject before the Minister replies.

I am not sure who the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Benn) will see on the annunciator now, but at least he explained the paucity of support behind me. I am honest enough to admit that my right hon. and hon. Friends would rather listen to his right hon. Friend and father, the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), than to me. That clearly explains why they were not in Westminster Hall.

The hon. Gentleman rightly mentioned the relationship between Government and government. He is right to say that things have changed dramatically in the last millennium. We are only 90 ft from the place where the country has been governed, in some form at least, for 900 years. Much has changed but, in some respects, much is the same.

Not long ago, the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) talked about the devolved character of the constitution. Anyone who has taken part in local government, like the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Turner), will know that devolved administration has a longer and, in some respects, more honourable, history in this country than central Government.

I take issue with the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright): it is not a matter of better government as distinct from big or small government. I do not regard small government as an ideological pursuit. I confess that there were occasions in the past when we fell prey to it—I think especially of the Conservative Administration's relationship with local government. We wanted the kind of control in which central Government said, "We know what should be happening, we know what ought to be done, we don't want people to interfere with our prescription. We want them to do what we tell them to do or we won't let them do it at all." Down that path lies big government. My view, and that of my party, is that whatever the history, we still see small government as not an abandonment of the public by Government but as a place where the Government base their solutions not on central prescription but on local leadership, ownership and control. That means, not that local communities, especially if they are outside the public sector in the charity, voluntary or private sector, have less accountability, but that the performance measures, which determine what is being done, what should be done and what should be the priorities of local government or local community activity, are not set from the centre.

That brings me to the White Paper. It should not be about having such a powerful mechanism of central management control that it takes over the setting of priorities.

Dr. Tony Wright: The hon. Gentleman is genuinely confused. The issue of the size of government is different from the issue of the manner in which government should operate. In his speech the hon. Gentleman argued about the size of government. He is now describing issues that relate to how government operates.

Mr. Lansley: I may be confused; it happens often. The Minister of State will no doubt quote that back to me in future. I do not think that there is a direct relationship between the manner of government and the amount of government, but if central Government are not disarmed, if excessive control of regulation, tax, activities and legislation is not wrested from them, there will never be local ownership and control.

There are specific issues—as well as the broad, conceptual ones—which I am sure the Minister will also want to discuss. We have not referred to it today, but in the context of the White Paper there was a Government pledge to put the civil service code of conduct on a statutory footing. Does the Minister propose to take any action on that?

There is also the issue of technology. I was worried that the White Paper's big idea is not the character of government, which we have been discussing, but technology. That should not be its big idea. The hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) mentioned, for example, electronic data interchange. One can get hooked on particular technological solutions, but many businesses in my constituency, which are at the cutting edge of some of these technologies, went into electronic data interchange, found it extraordinarily difficult to arrive at common standards with their customers and suppliers, so moved on to an internet-based system. Will the Minister confirm that the technological solutions that we are talking about will be flexible rather than rigid? We must not use a technology simply because it is available.

The hon. Member for Cannock Chase asked a question about the Post Office. Without debating the origins and conclusions of the Horizon project, it is important to recognise that, in its absence, there is a question about access to services, particularly in rural areas such as the one that I represent. The Post Office has been an important source of that access, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said. I hope that Ministers will consider not only technological access but physical access. By providing the latter, post offices also give social support.

The hon. Member for Cannock Chase also talked about freedom of information. He will probably accuse me of further confusion, but I was a civil servant for eight years under a Conservative Administration and I never felt myself to be especially undervalued.

Mr. White: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that many people, myself included, left the civil service in the 1980s—around the time that he was a member of it—because we felt that it was being politicised?

Mr. Lansley: I did not leave the civil service because I felt undervalued; I left because I wished to pursue a political career—not inside the civil service, which is a danger if it becomes too politicised. I recognised that I had to leave it to pursue a political career.

Much is said about civil service secondment. Rather than promoting too high a level of interchange between the civil service and the private sector, the civil service is extraordinarily good at recruiting, training and giving people responsibility at an early stage. People in the civil service should be encouraged to have a genuine interchange into the private sector—not secondment, with all the protections that go with it, but a genuine interchange with the possibility of coming back, perhaps five or 10 years later, with private sector experience. The combination of civil service and private sector experience can create just those people who might be most appropriate for the highest levels of administration.

Finally, I turn to the issue of accountability and modernisation. We must recognise that, if we choose to have activities in the public sector—leaving aside the debate about what should be in the public sector—they are there for a reason. In our view, they are in the public sector because of the accountability that needs to flow with that decision. I can give an example from my constituency. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food chose to transfer an asset out to the private sector, saying that the same legal rights attached to that asset in the private sector as in the public sector. But, of course, the choice of legal rights is not the end of the story; there is the question of accountability for what is done with that asset in future. That accountability has now been lost. That issue is at the heart, not just of the structure of the civil service, but of the accountability of government as a whole. I hope that the Minister will respond to that point, too.

5.9 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Graham Stringer): I am pleased to be speaking for the first time in this Room and to reply in a Government-sponsored debate. I hope that you will know when I am standing and sitting, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall do my best to ensure that you do.

I spent much of my adult life in a horseshoe-shaped chamber and it does not necessarily lead to consensus. In Manchester city council I participated in debates that were at least as vicious as the most vicious debates in the House—

Mr. Ian McCartney: And that was just in the Labour group.

Mr. Stringer: Yes. I hope that we have a different experience in this Room, but horseshoes and consensus do not necessarily go together.

I shall start by responding to my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright), who made a thoughtful speech and showed himself to be a thoroughly modern hon. Member. He encapsulated the White Paper when he referred to putting the public service back together and making it accountable, which was an accurate interpretation.

My experience as a member of the public and a councillor 30 years ago was that local government and central Government services were not accountable. An elected councillor could not easily change housing policy. The examples that were given time and again during the late 1970s concerned simple things. It was not possible to introduce a policy allowing people to paint their own front door in a colour that they wanted.

The same was true of the national health service. In theory, the Secretary of State for Health was responsible for everything from the butcher to, in Aneurin Bevan's words, emptying the chamber pots. If people had difficulties with their local hospital or major hospitals, it was very difficult for them to get a response.

I examined the White Paper through the eyes of my constituents. Approximately £150 million of local government money is spent in my constituency and a similar amount is spent there by central Government. I listen to my constituents' problems concerning information, vandalism and a range of other matters, but approximately £300 million of public expenditure is locked up. A new phrase, which has not been mentioned during our debate but is common among officials and officers of the Local Government Association, is that it is locked up in silence. It may not be with local government or central Government, but it is locked up in voluntary sector bodies, local government bodies, central Government bodies and so on.

If there is a problem with vandalism, the cause and effect may involve environmental health officials, housing officials, police, truancy officers, educational welfare officers and a whole range of people. Dealing with a simple, regular problem may be difficult because of the way in which services are organised now. The same is true of people in the benefits system, who often require information about benefits and how they relate to other factors in their lives. They may go from one building to another trying to find that information. That is one of the five key messages in the White Paper. The others are that we need long-term policy rather than short-term responses to policy; that we want responsive, high-quality services; that we want information technology to be used to get such information; and, most importantly, that we must publicise the fact that we want a debate about the best way in which to deliver services and the fact that we value the services that the people who work in the public sector provide.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Turner) said that, for most of the previous 18 years, people who worked in public services felt that they were second-rate citizens. They were regularly denigrated and told that they were inefficient. Compulsory competitive tendering did much to destabilise the situation, and although it often lowered costs, it did not necessarily produce greater efficiency. The Government should not mirror the policies of the Conservative Government, who said, "Private good, public bad." We should reverse that approach, specify what is appropriate and value those who are in the public sector.

The least serious point that was made by the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell)—it detracted from his otherwise serious speech—was about the policy of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister towards teachers. To say that one values the public sector and those who work in it does not mean that one believes that there should be no change or that one will not, from time to time, enter into dialogue with those in the public sector. If the hon. Gentleman reads my right hon. Friend's speech, he will realise that the Prime Minister said that 90-odd per cent. of teachers—my right hon. Friend did not give an exact figure—were doing an extraordinarily good job.

The hon. Gentleman's next point involved arguing that everyone should be paid much more. That is standard Liberal Democrat policy and I do not blame him for that approach. I presume that all the extra money that will go to nurses and teachers—and to many others—will come from his party's proposed 1p on income tax. He also said that he wanted the basic structure of pay in those services to remain the same. However, it is obvious to everyone who thinks seriously about the matter that if people are doing a good job they should have incentives—financial or otherwise—and receive rewards.

Mr. Stunell: Does not the Minister recognise that there is a serious problem with morale and recruitment in the medical and the teaching professions? A significant part of the problem involves their feeling that the Government do not value their contribution to the public sector.

Mr. Stringer: The hon. Gentleman is discussing what is left over from 18 years of Conservative Government. He makes precisely my point—that there has been poor morale in the public sector. However, the initiatives that have been taken by my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) have resulted in record numbers of nurses returning to the health service. We could discuss other parts of the public sector, where there have been similar experiences. People recognise that this Government are different from the previous Government.

I shall probably disappoint my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase by referring him to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary for a detailed discussion of the Freedom of Information Bill. The discussion that he wants to have is beyond the scope of this debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. White) made several interesting, relevant and thoughtful points. His comments on how long pilot schemes should run and how they should be integrated into local government have been made regularly by the Local Government Association, which has discussed pilot schemes and action zones. The Government's position is that some solutions are better determined locally, and others nationally. Action zones and pilot schemes are partly intended to function as experiments and to establish what will work. There have been so many interesting and relevant points raised that it will be impossible to respond to them all. However, I will ensure that my hon. Friend receives a letter about any that I do not pick up.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Benn) spoke eloquently about matters in his constituency and how they related to democracy and the delivery of service. He pinpointed the alienation and social exclusion experienced by those known to many of us who represent inner-city areas. The social exclusion unit has been set up precisely to help us understand those problems.

We cannot afford, as a society, to allow people to be socially excluded. It is not simply a matter of the cost to society. It is a disgrace in a modern society when so many people decide that they have no interest in voting or in participating at any level—be it at the jobs level or any other. That often leads to drug taking, through cause and effect. We are studying all those issues, so that we can obtain a joined-up policy response to them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith) was basically supportive of the Government's policy and of the White Paper, but raised an issue that had not been mentioned by other hon. Members. It is another core issue in the White Paper—that of consultation. There cannot be a more over-used word than "consultation". Everyone is in favour of it, but they find it difficult to define. Some people, when asked about consultation, mean the transfer of power to the consultees. Others see it as a process of handing over information to people.

It is important that consultation should take place, and that the consulters and the consultees should understand what the exchange is about before they go any further. That is the case whether the exchange is about the transfer of power—which is rare—or about setting the limits of a policy within which to work, eliciting another's views on the matter, and stating how those views will be taken into account. That is the core of good consultation, and I agree with my hon. Friend on that point.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) raised many points, and one would need about an hour and half in which to respond to them. I shall try to go through them as quickly as I can.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. Stringer: I understand that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That is why I shall reply in writing to the hon. Gentleman on any points that I miss.

It was a bit rich of the hon. Gentleman to talk about not having joined-up government, when the Conservative party must be the most non-joined-up party of this century. It is so non-joined-up that it has decided to exclude the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) from the London mayoral contest although she supports her party's policy on section 28, yet support an ex-Member of Parliament in the contest who does not agree with its policy. It is extraordinary that the hon. Gentleman can talk about joined-up government, given that that is his party's record.

The hon. Gentleman asked in his winding-up speech about the civil service code. The legislation to put that code into law is not necessary to implement the White Paper. It is still Government policy to put the code into law, but that will have to wait for its space in the legislative timetable.

The hon. Gentleman, like the hon. Member for Hazel Grove, made a serious point about people being excluded by new technology, and the fact that some of the big projects simply have not worked. I probably know more about national air traffic control systems than I do about the projects that were mentioned. There are so many projects that we probably missed one or two. Because we do not want people to be excluded from technology, £500 million has been invested in learning centres. Libraries will stock 100,000 computers that can be taken out on loan, just as one borrows a book. That is part of modernising government and of not excluding people from services and a modern society.

On the issue of big projects and people's exclusion from new technology, it is true that some people will always be excluded. For example, about 98 per cent.—not 100 per cent.—of people in this country own a telephone. The important point is to include as many people as one can. The alternative is to do nothing and stay as we are, but a society that uses the internet cannot afford to do that. We must ensure that people have access to computers and new technology.

Major IT projects such as the National Air Traffic Services system—if it works—will greatly increase air capacity. A passport system that works would provide quicker access to passports. One could list many such benefits. The Cabinet Office is looking at why those projects have failed in the past, so that they do not fail in future. We cannot turn our faces to history and say, "Well, the old system worked, but the most recent one did not, so we shall go back to the old one." That would not deliver the service that we want.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire talked about regulation, but he did not say why the number of regulatory orders that were passed after the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) had cut and burned as much red tape as he could was virtually the same as before he started, and virtually the same as was passed by this Government. Regulation is important. Most people want to be protected by it, but they do not want unnecessary regulation. The important concept is proportionate regulation. The Government are determined not to introduce regulation that is disproportionate. Where existing regulation is not proportionate, we shall get rid of it. It is not good policy to say "Forget what we did". During the previous Conservative Administration, no one could accuse the right hon. Member for Henley of being less than ideologically determined to get rid of as much red tape as he could.

I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion. It was extraordinary to hear a Conservative spokesman say that conservatives now want as much decentralisation as possible. We are now to believe that they are the champions of local democracy. Many people in this Chamber served on local councils at a time when it was the previous Government's policy increasingly to privatise and to centralise control. By 1997, this country had become the most centralised in western Europe. It is part of this Government's policy to modernise the country that the previous Government left in such a mess.

The "Modernising government" White Paper is central to improving the quality of people's lives. I thank hon. Members for participating in this debate.

Question put and agreed to.

DEFENCE

Procurement

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (i) the original in-service date, (ii) the current in-service date, (iii) the estimated and actual costs, (iv) the years of expected peak expenditure and (v) the prime contractor for all the endorsed staff requirements. [98583]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The information requested is not held centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Indonesia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the use of equipment supplied to Indonesia's armed forces by United Kingdom suppliers; and if he will make a statement. [99297]

Mr. Kilfoyle: We are in regular contact with our Embassy in Jakarta about the use of such equipment. We have made it clear to Indonesia that UK-supplied defence equipment should not be used in East Timor or against civilians in violation of human rights standards.

Target Setting

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many targets have been agreed between his Department and (i) local authorities and (ii) other bodies apart from his own agencies and non-departmental bodies since May 1997. [99478]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 24 November 1999]: With the exception of the Public Service Agreement with HM Treasury my Department has no targets agreed with other bodies at the Departmental level. However the Public Service Agreement is consistent with the wider goals of the Government. At a lower level some elements of the Department and the Armed Forces will share goals with outside bodies. It would not be possible to provide a comprehensive list of such shared goals without disproportionate cost.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the armed forces are currently committed to the defence of the Falkland Islands. [100018]

Mr. Spellar: There are currently approximately 1,650 Service personnel in the Falkland Islands.

Old Ranges, Shoeburyness

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date the tender documents for the site at the Old Ranges, Shoeburyness, have to be lodged with Donaldsons of 70 Jermyn Street, London SW1; and when the tender documents will be available to possible bidders. [100055]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The sales brochure specified that the extra site would be sold by means of Best Offer bids, and that proposals should be received by 12 noon on Friday 10 December 1999, at the agents, Donaldsons, 70 Jermyn street, London. Donaldsons wrote to all prospective purchasers on 24 November 1999, explaining the basis upon which offers should be made. There is no requirement for formal tender documentation given that the site is not being sold by Formal Tender.

IT Projects

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information on (a) costs and (b) time scales of IT projects currently being undertaken by his Department is held centrally; if he will list the (i) start date, (ii) planned completion date, (iii) expected completion date, (iv) planned cost and (v) current estimated cost of these projects where available; and if he will make a statement. [99666]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The information requested is not readily available; however, I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Army (Terms of Service)

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the impact of the Army Terms of Service (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1999 on the ability of young people in the armed forces to leave after enlistment; and what is the minimum period of service for which such young persons will have to enlist. [100193]

Mr. Spellar: All recruits to non-commissioned service in the Army enter on an Open Engagement of 22 years reckonable service from age 18 or the date of joining, whichever is the later. The Army Terms of Service (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1999, which came into effect on 1 November 1999, increased the minimum commitment period for newly recruited soldiers from three to four years. Those enlisted after this date will, therefore, serve for an additional year before they have the right to discharge to the reserve.

The Army Terms of Service (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1999 have no effect on the statutory right to discharge provisions. A recruit under the age of 18 can leave the Army free as of right within the first six months of service (having served at least 28 days and having given 14 days notice); for those aged over 18, the statutory right to discharge ends three months after joining for duty.

New recruits who do not exercise this right are committed to serve for four years from their 18th birthday or 4.25 years after attestation, whichever is the later. Provision does, however, exist for personnel of any age to be discharged from the service at any time for a number of reasons, including compassionate.

War Widows

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence by what date war widows will be able to keep their armed forces pension on remarriage. [99094]

Mr. Spellar: The payment of widows' pensions is being examined as part of the review of the Armed Forces Pension Scheme which is currently under way. We hope it will be concluded by next summer. It is not possible at this stage to comment on the outcome.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions Ministers or his officials have held with the Department of Social Security in respect of war pensions for widows; and if he will make a statement. [100310]

Mr. Spellar: MOD and DSS officials have worked closely on the joint MOD-DSS review of compensation for members of the armed forces who suffer illness, injury, and death for reasons attributable to service. The MOD and DSS routinely discuss war pensions issues, including arrangements for war widows. There are also day-to-day contacts between DSS War Pensions Agency and the MOD Armed Forces Personnel Administration Agency about the handling of individual cases.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what would be the cost of war widows retaining for life attributable pensions awarded under his Department's armed forces pension scheme. [100313]

Mr. Spellar: We estimate that the cost of war widows retaining for life their attributable pensions would be between £2 million and £3 million per annum.

Marital Status (Service Personnel)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of (a) the Army, (b) the Royal Air Force and (c) the Royal Navy have changed from Maristat One in each year between and including 1989 and the current financial year; into which marital category they have changed; what proportion of each service this represents for each year; and if he will make a statement. [99928]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Air Crashes

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if, for the RAF, the Royal Navy and the Army, he will list (a) the number of aircraft crashed in each of the past five years to November 1999, (b) their value, (c) the age and type of each aircraft, (d) the fate of the pilots and (e) the attributed cause of each accident. [100311]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The information requested is not readily available; however I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

National Employers Liaison Committee

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the budget for the National Employers Liaison Committee for the reserves of the armed forces and (b) the Territorial Army Recruiting Budget for each year from 1994. [99930]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Pay Scales

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the current pay scales for (a) non-regular permanent staff staff sergeants and (b) MOD civil service executive officers. [99932]

Mr. Spellar: The current pay scale for a non-regular permanent staff (NRPS) staff sergeant, effective from 1 April 1999, is £20,613 per annum on appointment, rising to £20,723 after nine years.

With effect from 1 August 1999, the maximum point on the executive officer pay scale was increased from £18,264 to £22,727. The minimum was also increased, from £11,914 to £12,523.

Redundancy Payments

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the value of redundancy payments made to non-regular permanent staff replaced by Executive Officers as Territorial Army financial systems administrators; and how many NRPS FSAs over 50 years of age have been pensioned off. [99934]

Mr. Spellar: To date there have been no redundancy payments made to non-regular permanent staff (NRPS) financial systems administrator (FSA) personnel, including those over age 50, who are being replaced by civilian Executive Officers (EOs). It is not currently possible to provide the value of redundancy payments which will be made because such payments will be determined individually and will be calculated on the basis of length of NRPS service and rate of pay on discharge.

The number of NRPS FSAs over the age of 50 is not held centrally, but is being collated, and I will write to the hon. Member with this detail and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Broadsword

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the cost of repairing and refitting the Joint Services Adventure Sail Training vessel Broadsword in the past year; and what would be the cost of purchasing an equivalent new boat. [99931]

Mr. Spellar: The Joint Services Adventure Sail Training vessel Broadsword completed an extensive package of work in May 1998 to extend her life for a further 15 years. The total cost of this work was £256,000. Since then, the only costs incurred on Broadsword have been for repair work associated with her participation in the Transglobe Inter-Savings global yacht race, which has not yet completed. It is estimated that the repair work undertaken to-date will cost about £14,000. No refit work is planned for 1999–2000. The cost of purchasing an equivalent new boat is estimated to be about £700,000.

Territorial Army

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) for what reason Territorial Army financial systems administrators have each received substitution pay of £10 per day; and what has been the total cost to his budget; [99929]

(2) how many Territorial Army financial systems administrator posts are being civilianised; what is (a) the average and (b) the maximum number of training weeks required to train executive officers as FSAs; what is the cost of that training; what is the cost of (i) subsistence and (ii) travelling expenses per person per day for that training at Worthy Down; and whether overtime will be payable to civilianised FSAs. [99933]

Mr. Spellar: The post of Financial Systems Administrator (FSA) was civilianised with effect from 1 July 1999, and this will affect some 78 non-regular permanent staff (NRPS). The executive officer (EO) grade civil servants who will fulfil this function in future will each undergo a maximum of 18 weeks training at the School of Employment (SET) Training at Worthy Down before taking over the job fully. One additional member of staff has been temporarily employed to assist in running courses at SET at a cost of some £35,000 to minimise the impact of this surge in requirement on existing courses.

The travel and subsistence costs for EOs attending these courses depend on an individual's circumstances. Where EOs stay in the Officers' Mess at Worthy Down, they will receive daily subsistence of £5 in addition to the cost of accommodation. If they stay in a hotel, the rate is up to a maximum of £25 in addition to the cost of accommodation. It is not possible to provide a meaningful figure for travelling expenses because each individual's circumstances are unique. Executive officer FSAs will be entitled to claim overtime.

Until such time as the executive officers take over these responsibilities, the NRPS staff sergeants who are currently filling the posts are entitled to substitution pay which equates to £10 a day. In order to provide an overall cost, it would be necessary to refer to individual records and this has not been possible in the time available.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what motor mileage allowance rates his Department offers to (a) ministers and (b) civil servants using their own vehicles for official business; and what has been the cost of each in each of the last five years. [98699]

Mr. Straw: Home Office Ministers, when travelling on official business, may use a private car instead of an official car, and claim mileage allowances in the same circumstances and on the same terms as Home Office civil servants. However, all five Ministers use the Government Car Service. The vehicles available to me, while purchased by my Department, are operated by the Metropolitan Police.

The Motor Mileage Allowance Rates offered to Ministers and civil servants using their own vehicles for official business are as follows:

Home Office (excluding Prison Service)

Motor Vehicle Rates

Public Transport Rate
23.8p per mile

Standard Rate Mileage

Engine capacity up to 1500cc
35.7p for first 5,000 miles
19p for over 5,000 miles

Engine capacity 1501–2000cc
43p for first 5,000 miles
23p for over 5,000 miles

Engine capacity over 2000cc
46p for first 5,000 miles
31p for over 5,000 miles

Motor Cycle Rates

6.5p for over 4,000 miles

Engine capacity over 125cc
27.2p for first 4,000 miles
9.7p for over 4,000 miles

Expenditure

The cost of motor mileage allowances for Home Office civil servants in each of the last three years has been as follows:

Year	£
1996–97	1,116,202
1998–99	930,237

Unfortunately, data are not available for the earlier two years: 1994–95 and 1995–96. Also these figures exclude expenditure in the United Kingdom Passport Agency and the Prison Service because these data could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Passport Agency

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from organisations representing tourism and the travel industry (a) supporting and (b) opposing an increase in fees charged by the Passport Agency for issuing passports. [99401]

Mrs. Roche: Representations expressing concern about increases in passport fees have been received from The Association of British Travel Agents Ltd., The Council of Travel and Tourism, the Passenger Shipping Association and the Federation of Tour Operators.

The Agency has taken careful account of their representations in its review of passport fees.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date he plans to publish the Passport Agency's business plan 1999–2000 and its corporate plan 1999 to 2002. [100210]

Mr. Straw: The Passport Agency's Corporate and Business Plans 1999–2002 will be published shortly.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date his advisory board considered the Passport Agency's business plan 1999 to 2000 and its corporate plan 1999 to 2002; and if his advisory board has now approved those plans. [100208]

Mr. Straw: The Passport Agency's revised Corporate and Business Plans were considered by the Advisory Board on 27 September. The plans, which were held back pending the publication of the National Audit Office report, have now been approved. They will be issued shortly, together with a recovery plan which sets out the action the Agency is taking to prevent a recurrence of this year's problems.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date the Board of the United Kingdom Passport Agency considered its business plan 1999–2000 and its corporate plan 1999 to 2002; and if the plans have been approved. [100209]

Mr. Straw: The Passport Agency's revised Corporate and Business Plans were considered by the Agency's Management Board on 20 September. The plans, which were held back pending publication of the National Audit Office Report, have now been approved. They will be published shortly, together with a recovery plan which sets out the action the Agency is taking to prevent a recurrence of this year's problems.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress in his review of the future level of passport fees. [100214]

Mr. Straw: We are looking at various options for a possible increase in passport fees and an announcement of the outcome will be made shortly.

Airport Vetting

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when it became the practice for immigration officers to vet passengers as to the status of their visas and passports prior to leaving aeroplanes arriving in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [99848]

Mrs. Roche: While there are powers in Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971 which allow an Immigration officer to board and search an aircraft and to require the production of a passenger's documents, Immigration officers do not routinely examine passengers' travel documents prior to their leaving an aircraft. However, Immigration officers regularly attend arriving flights and check travel documents shortly after disembarkation in order to identify inadequately documented passengers. This practice has grown since the late 1980s in order to deal with the increasing number of passengers who destroy or otherwise dispose of their travel documents and tickets after departure for the United Kingdom. The procedures have been developed to establish the proof of carriage so that charges under the carriers' liability legislation can be effectively pursued and also to minimise the difficulties and costs in removing persons where the identity of the carrier and the port of embarkation cannot be established.

Commission for Racial Equality

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the total amount of the settlements made with the five employees of the Commission for Racial Equality with regard to their claims of racial discrimination against the Commission. [100211]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Details of personal settlements are confidential between the parties involved.

Post Office

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the principal activities of his Department and its agencies which provide business for (a) Crown post offices and (b) other post offices; if he will assess whether the level of business generated in each case is likely to increase or decrease over the next five years; and which new areas of business for post offices are likely to be developed by his Department and its agencies over the same period. [99556]

Mrs. Roche: The United Kingdom Passport Agency has a partnership arrangement with Post Office Counters Limited which was established in January 1996. Under this arrangement, passport applicants can lodge their application at any main Post Office.

The Agency is currently re-tendering its partnership arrangements, however both the Agency and Post Office Counters Ltd. have indicated a commitment to working together in the future.

Identity Cards

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent assessment he has made of the advantages of the introduction of national identity cards which include identification for entitlement to social security payments. [99093]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We are considering all the relevant issues involved in identity cards including their possible contribution to tackling welfare fraud, increasing individual convenience and simplifying Government. We have not yet reached any final conclusions.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Clay Pigeon Shooting

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what progress is being made towards a code of practice for clay pigeon shooting. [98827]

Kate Hoey: The Chartered Institute of Environmental Health, Clay Pigeon Shooting Association and British Shooting Sports Council jointly issued, for consultation, draft guidance on the management and control of noise for clay pigeon shooting in November 1997. The consultation period was completed in March 1998 and the guidance is still under preparation. I understand the authors are awaiting further input from various bodies, and will publish the guidance at the earliest opportunity.

TV Licence Fees

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people will benefit from the free licence fee for those persons aged over 75 years, announced by him; and if he will make a statement. [98535]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 22 November 1999]: Over 3 million households will benefit from the provision of television licences free of charge to people aged 75 or over, announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his pre-Budget statement.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to review TV licence concessions available for blind people and those in residential and sheltered accommodation below the age of 75 years. [99173]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 22 November 1999]: The Government accept that the introduction of free television licences for people aged 75 or over will not remove the need to consider the shortcomings of the existing concessionary arrangements. We shall consider the recommendations of the BBC funding review panel in the light of the responses to the public consultation which has just concluded. We intend to announce our conclusions in January.

Channel 5

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement in respect of his policy towards the percentage of home-produced material broadcast on Channel 5. [99133]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 23 November 1999]: Under the terms of its licence from the Independent Television Commission, Channel 5 must comply with the terms of the European Commission's Directive 97/36/EC (which amended Directive 89/552/EC). Under the Directive, the majority of programmes broadcast by Channel 5 must be of European origin. Channel 5 met that licence condition in 1997 and 1998. For these years, the proportions of European-originated programming transmitted by Channel 5 (other than news, sports coverage, games, advertising and teletext services which are exempted from the Directive) were 60 per cent. and 52 per cent. respectively. A high proportion of Channel 5's European-originated programming is produced in the UK.

BBC Funding

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he plans to respond to the report by the Independent Review Panel on the future funding of the BBC. [100045]

Janet Anderson: The period of public consultation on the panel's recommendations ended on 1 November. We are considering all the panel's recommendations in the light of responses received and hope to announce our final decisions in January.

Culture/Audiovisual Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what was the outcome of the Culture/Audiovisual Council held in Brussels on 23 November; and if he will make a statement. [99847]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I represented the United Kingdom at the Culture/Audiovisual Council held in Brussels on 23 November. The Presidency reported on the ongoing conciliation process for the Culture 2000 programme. The Council agreed a Resolution on the promotion of the free movement of persons working in the cultural sector. The Commission will carry out a study on the obstacles to free movement, and the results will be presented at the beginning of the French Presidency. The Council agreed conclusions on the cultural industries and employment in Europe. There was some discussion of the successor programme to MEDIA II and we now await the Commission's proposals for this, which are expected shortly. The Council adopted conclusions on the protection of minors in the context of development in digital audiovisual services. These encourage the parties concerned, (manufacturers, broadcasters and operators), to co-operate in considering ways of evaluating and rating audiovisual content in order to assist parents in the protection of minors. Several cultural initiatives carried out by member states in support of reconciliation in Kosovo were also announced.

National Lottery Commission

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the National Lottery Commission. [100809]

Mr. Chris Smith: I regret to report that Robin Squire has resigned his membership of the National Lottery Commission for business and other personal reasons. I will appoint a successor in due course.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Teddy Bear Ties

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Chairman of the Catering Committee on what authority, and for what reason, the decision was taken to sell teddy bear ties in the souvenir shop. [100435]

Mr. Dennis Turner: This is a matter for the Director of Catering Services. I have asked her to reply to my right hon. Friend.

Divisions

Mr. Miller: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, what estimate he has made of the cost to the House of (a) the conducting of each division of the House (i) before and (ii) after 10 pm and (b) each hour of the House's sitting after 10 pm, in each case including all costs relating to staff and the Parliamentary Estate. [100746]

Mr. Kirkwood: The cost to the House of conducting divisions is met from the day-to-day budgets of House departments. The figures are not separately identified.

For divisions after 10 pm, no additional staff or services are required when the House divides, so no separately identifiable costs are incurred for such divisions. Some additional costs are incurred when House staff have to stay after 11 pm. e.g. for providing late night transport for staff of the House and others (e.g. security staff).

The fixed costs of running the estate are incurred regardless of what time the House rises.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Russia

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with the Russian Government concerning help with, and advice on, the welfare and protection of street children. [99523]

Clare Short: I have had no direct discussion with the Russian government on street children.

My Department is developing a project, expected to start early next year, which will directly benefit homeless and vulnerable children in Ekaterinburg and Sverdlovsk oblast. Throughout the design process, DFID officials have maintained close contact with the Russian regional and municipal authorities, who support the proposed work.

Hurricane Lenny

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what reports she has received of the effects of Hurricane Lenny in the Bahamas. [99205]

Clare Short: The effects of Hurricane Lenny in the Bahamas were limited to heavy rainfall. There have been no reports of significant damage.

PRIME MINISTER

National Insurance

Mr. Field: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the reforms that have been made to national insurance as mentioned in the Gracious Speech. [99412]

The Prime Minister: Following recommendations in the Taylor Report on "The Modernisation of Britain's Tax and Benefits System", the Government have introduced the most far-reaching restructuring of the National Insurance System for 20 years. Measures announced in the last two Budgets have been designed to improve work incentives, encourage job creation and build a fairer and simpler National Insurance System.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the official visits to China since 1 May 1997, specifying for each occasion (i) the (a) Ministers, (b) special advisers and (c) numbers of officials who attended, (ii) the matters discussed and conclusions reached and (iii) the cost of the visit. [99130]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 23 November 1999]: Under the terms of the "Ministerial Code", any member of the Cabinet who wishes to be absent from the United Kingdom for any reason, except for visits to European countries on official business, or visits to member countries for NATO business requires my written approval. Other Ministers who propose to be absent from the country must seek the approval of the Ministerial Head of the Department concerned. A list of visits overseas by Cabinet Ministers costing £500 or more during the period May 1997 to March 1999 was placed in the Library of the House on 17 June 1999. Since then two Cabinet Ministers, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport have visited China at an estimated cost of £34,000. This includes the cost of travel and accommodation for a Private Secretary accompanying each Minister and in the case of the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, a Special Adviser. Both visits were made in accordance with the rules set out in the "Ministerial Code".

Detailed information on visits overseas by Junior Ministers is not collected centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Special Advisers

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister what has been the total salary bill, including on-costs, of special advisers employed at 10 Downing street for each year since 1 May 1997. [99137]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 23 November 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) on 21 January 1998, Official Report, columns 567W-68W and to the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) on 15 June 1998, Official Report, columns 5W-6W and that my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office gave to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on 11 November 1999, Official Report, column 828W.

Ministers (Private Health Insurance)

Mr. Brady: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to provide guidance to Government ministers regarding the purchase of private health insurance policies. [99309]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 23 November 1999]: No. The purchase of insurance policies by individual Ministers in a private capacity is a personal matter.

State Visits

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the State Visits to the United Kingdom that have been made since May 1997 and the dates of each visit. [98655]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 23 November 1999]: The following State Visits to the United Kingdom have been made since 1 May 1997:

Visitor	Date
President of Brazil	2–5 December 1997
Emperor of Japan	26–29 May 1998
President of Germany	1–4 December 1998
President of Hungary	22–25 June 1999
President of the People's Republic of China	19–22 October 1999

Tibet

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish in the Official Report the reply he gave to the letter from Amnesty International, the Free Tibet Campaign and Mr. Wei Jingsheng of 21 October, requesting an official statement from Her Majesty's Government on human rights and Tibet. [99435]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 24 November 1999]: My Office's reply to the letter of 21 October from Amnesty International and others said that I discussed human rights with the Chinese President during our meeting and lunch on 21 October. It added that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office would brief Amnesty International and other non-governmental organisations concerned on the human rights aspect of the State Visit and the next steps in our human rights dialogue with the Chinese. The briefing took place on 9 November.

Lord Chancellor

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister what consultation the Lord Chancellor had with him about the newspaper reports that officials in the House of Lords were asked by him to make untrue statements; and what advice he gave to the Lord Chancellor. [100186]

The Prime Minister: None.

Social Exclusion Unit

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Prime Minister what is the budget of the Social Exclusion Unit for the current financial year and for each future year for which a budget has been set for it. [99588]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 November 1999]: The Social Exclusion Unit's running costs budget for 1999–2000 is £1,846,334. The Unit's budget for 2000–01 and subsequent financial years has not been agreed and will depend partly on the outcome of the current review of the Unit's future which will be announced before the end of this year.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the title of each report published to date by the Social Exclusion Unit, stating the cost implications of the recommendations made in each report. [99644]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 November 1999]: To date the Social Exclusion Unit has published the following reports:

"School Exclusion and Truancy" (published May 1998);

"Rough Sleeping" (published July 1998);

"Neighbourhood Renewal" (published September 1998);

"Teenage Pregnancy" (published June 1999);

"Bridging the Gap: New Opportunities for 16–18 Year Olds Not in Education, Employment or Training" (published July 1999).

Each report contains information on the cost implications of its recommendations

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the title, purpose and work programme of all policy action teams led (a) by the Social Exclusion Unit and (b) by departments with Social Exclusion Unit involvement, indicating in each case (i) the date when they were set up and (ii) the date when their work is due for completion. [99587]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 November 1999]: The remit and timetable for each of the 18 Policy Action Teams is set out in the Social Exclusion Unit's report "Bringing Britain Together: a national strategy for neighbourhood renewal" [CM 4045]. Copies are available in the Libraries of the House. All 18 Teams started work in autumn 1998. The following six Teams have published reports:

Business;

Housing Management;

Unpopular Housing;

Community Self-Help;

Arts and Sport;

Financial Services.

The others will follow over the next few months.

Copies of all the published reports are available in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Prime Minister how many staff were employed in the Social Exclusion Unit in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999; and what plans he has for staffing levels in 2000 to 2002. [99643]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 November 1999]: By the end of 1997 The Social Exclusion Unit had 12 members of staff. On 30 June 1998 the Unit had 21 members of staff and on 30 June 1999 the Unit had 35 members of staff. The Unit's staffing for 2000–01 and subsequent financial years has not been agreed and will depend partly on the conclusions of the current review of the Unit's future which will be announced before the end of this year.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Prime Minister what the current work programme is of the Social Exclusion unit, including (a) the titles of all reports in preparation, (b) their expected publication dates and (c) any further subjects due to be examined by the unit during the period 2000 to 2002. [99645]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 November 1999]: The current work programme of the Social Exclusion Unit includes support to the Policy Action Teams which the Unit itself leads and liaison with those led by other Departments, the preparation of a National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal and oversight of the implementation of previous reports.

The Unit's future work programme will reflect the conclusions of the current review of the Unit's future which will be announced before the end of the year.

Balkans

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what action the Government are taking to minimise hypothermia in the Balkans during the winter. [100090]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The impact of the Balkan winter is likely to be the harshest in Kosovo, where 100,000 houses were severely damaged or destroyed during the conflict. The Department for International Development (DFID) aims to complement shelter initiatives being carried out by other donors by rehabilitating utilities, especially power and water supplies, before the weather becomes too severe.

The electrical distribution system (100KV) sustained considerable war damage and is the focus of DFID's attention. Other donors are working on the 220KV and 440KV transmission systems. Our aim is to help the local authorities with the supply of equipment and technical advice on the electrical distribution system throughout Kosovo. A British management team, jointly funded by the EU Task Force and British Trade International (BTI), is currently working with the EU Task Force, UNMIK and the Kosovo Electric Company, to manage the overall power situation in Kosovo. Specific funding from DFID and BTI is ensuring the continued supply of coal to the Kosovo power stations.

Additionally, DFID has committed £3 million to carry out emergency works to Pristina airport to keep it operational throughout the winter. The airport is a crucial alternative supply route to the congested Blace border crossing.

In Serbia heating assistance is being targeted on vulnerable groups by the international agencies such as UNHCR and the European Commission's Humanitarian Office (ECHO). ECHO's assistance to Serbia and Montenegro since May 1999 amounts to 26.6 million euros, of which the UK has contributed approximately 15 per cent.

Life Peerages

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister if he will seek to change the law to provide a way for a life peerage to be disclaimed; and if he will make a statement. [100126]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 26 November 1999]: In the unlikely event that a life peer wished to disclaim a life peerage he or she could seek to introduce a Private Bill to enable that to happen.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Lift Installations

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average waiting time between the occupational therapist's recommendation of a through-floor lift and the installation of the lift in (a) the South and East and (b) the North and West Trust areas in the last 12 months. [98474]

Mr. George Howarth: The average waiting time in South and East Belfast Trust area in public sector housing is three months for terminally ill clients and over one year for others. For private sector housing this is 3–5 months if the building work is undertaken by the client and over one year where an application is made for a Disabled Facilities Grant. In North and West Belfast Trust area the average waiting time is 4–5 months.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many requests for through-floor lifts in (a) the South and East and the (b) North and West Trust areas were made in the last 12 months; and in which areas such lifts are still to be installed. [98475]

Mr. George Howarth: The need for through floor lifts is normally identified following an assessment of an individual's needs and home environment by an Occupational Therapist. During the last 12 months South and East Belfast HSS Trust identified a total of 33 clients requiring a through floor lift although 10 clients later withdrew from the scheme. Four lifts have still to be installed by the Trust. In North and West Belfast HSS

Trust area 37 clients were identified as requiring a through floor lift in the last 12 months and 22 lifts have still to be installed by the Trust.

Health Investment

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has for investment in the National Health Service infrastructure in Northern Ireland. [99381]

Mr. George Howarth: Major hospitals in each of the four Health and Social Services Board Areas are being modernised or replaced. Within the next two years, the Causeway Hospital will come into operation, along with the Altnagelvin Hospital Nucleaus Extension. Following that, a major external refurbishment project will be completed at Craigavon Area Hospital, and the Phase 1 New Block at the Royal Victoria Hospital redevelopment will be completed. The total value of these projects is almost £139 million.

Construction of a £15 million local hospital at Downpatrick in County Down is planned to begin next year and is due to be completed in 2003.

Further investment is planned with a £28 million upgrading of Altnagelvin Hospital Tower Block, and Phase 2 of the Royal Victoria Hospital redevelopment estimated at £24 million.

A £30 million Regional Cancer Centre is planned, and detailed proposals are being drawn up for a Regional Medical Rehabilitation Centre and for a Medium Secure Unit for the mentally ill. It is anticipated that these projects will be procured under the Private Finance Initiative.

Railways

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will undertake an inquiry into the safety of the railway system in Northern Ireland. [99279]

Mr. George Howarth: NIR has a statutory duty to ensure the safety of operations on the network.

NIR commissioned consultants in March this year to conduct a strategic safety review of NIO's network and operations.

The final report should be available shortly.

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he is taking to increase investment in the railway system outside the Belfast to Dublin line. [99280]

Mr. George Howarth: Work has recently commenced on the reinstatement of the Antrim Bleach Green line at a cost of approximately £17 million. In addition, work on a new Bangor Interchange Centre is in progress at a cost of £4.2 million.

The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland has also examined opportunities for a Public Private Partnership (PPP) to meet future investment needs. It is expected that an announcement on the way forward will be made in the near future.

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he is taking to improve the state of the Northern Ireland Railway's rolling stock. [99281]

Mr. George Howarth: It is acknowledged that much of the NIR class 80 rolling stock is nearing the end of its useful life and will need to be replaced over the coming years. To this end the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland has been examining opportunities for a Public Private Partnership (PPP) to meet the investment needs. A report on PPP options is expected in the near future and an announcement will follow when decisions have been made on the way forward. In view of the time scales involved in bringing forward any PPP option the Department is also examining the interim funding that would be required for rolling stock replacement.

Prisoners (Early Release)

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average resettlement grant made to prisoners released under the early releases scheme in Northern Ireland; who is responsible for distributing this money; what criteria are used in determining the levels of awards; and if he will make a statement. [100207]

Mr. Ingram: Prisoners in Northern Ireland do not receive resettlement grants.

Every prisoner, however, including those released by decision of the independent Sentence Review Commissioners under the provisions of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998, is entitled to a Discharge Grant paid and administered by the Northern Ireland Prison Service.

The Discharge Grant is intended to ensure that each discharged inmate has enough money for his immediate needs and the rates are calculated to reflect the rate of Income Support Benefit currently in payment by the Social Security Agency.

Current rates, uprated in April 1999, are as follows:

A Standard Grant is payable at the rate of £40.70 for inmates aged 18 to 24 years and £51.40 for inmates aged 25 years and upwards.

A Higher Grant is payable at the rate of £103.81 to any inmate who satisfies the prison authorities that he or she is effectively homeless on discharge. The higher amount takes into account the average costs of hostel or bed and breakfast accommodation in Northern Ireland.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pigmeat

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps to ensure that all departments and public sector agencies require that pigmeat supplied under their catering contracts be produced according to UK welfare standards. [99057]

Ms Quin: We cannot dictate to public procurement authorities, but we will continue to seek to persuade them that buying to British welfare and other standards offers good value and meets the needs of their "customers".

To back up this message, my right hon. Friend the Minister has written to local councils and health authorities in England to emphasise the importance of sourcing to British standards. As the welfare legislation was passed in this House with an overwhelming majority, we also believe that every right hon. and hon. Member has a duty to raise this issue with public procurement authorities in their constituencies.

Climate Change Levy

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment his Ministry has made of the potential impact of the proposed climate change levy on the agricultural sector. [99049]

Ms Quin: It is not possible to say what the impact of the levy on the agricultural industry will be. That will depend on a number of factors, including future energy consumption and what use the industry makes of electricity generated from 'new' renewable sources of energy or in 'good quality' combined heat and power plants. The use the industry makes of the proposed system of enhanced capital allowances for energy saving investments will also have an impact. In addition certain sectors of the industry will be eligible for an 80 per cent. discount on the rates of the levy if they enter into energy saving agreements with the Government. All sectors of the industry will also benefit from the lower overall rates of the levy announced by the Chancellor in his pre-Budget Report statement.

Fur Farming

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he plans to (a) introduce and (b) facilitate the passage of a Bill banning fur farming within the current parliamentary session. [99119]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 23 November 1999]: A Bill to ban fur farming in England and Wales was introduced on 22 November. I understand the Scottish Executive will be introducing a separate Bill to extend the ban to Scotland.

Primates

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what regulatory requirements must be satisfied by persons seeking to export primates for experimentation purposes. [99138]

Ms Quin [holding answer 23 November 1999]: The rules governing the export of primates from the UK to member states of the European Union are set down in Council Directive 92/65/EEC of 13 July 1992. These rules are implemented in Great Britain by the Animals and Animal Products (Import and Export) Regulations 1998 and in Northern Ireland by the Animals and Animal Products (Import and Export) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1995 (as amended).

Under this legislation primates may be traded within the EU only between institutes or establishments which have been approved by the competent authority. Commission Decision 92/65/EEC sets down detailed specifications for the approval of institutes or establishments engaged in the import and export of primates. An up-to-date list of all such approved premises is lodged with the European Commission.

Exported primates must be accompanied by official veterinary documentation confirming that the animals are in good health and that they originate from approved premises.

In the case of exports of primates to third countries, exporters are required to satisfy conditions agreed bilaterally between the UK and the importing country.

All primates exported from the UK are subject to rules introduced by The Welfare of Animals (Transport) Order 1997. Exporters are required to give a written undertaking that arrangements have been made to comply with the terms of the EU Directive 91/628 on the protection of animals during transport. The animals must not be transported in a way that causes or could cause injury or unnecessary suffering. Strict rules covering the construction and maintenance of the receptacles and means of transport must be complied with.

Bee Diseases

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is putting into effect to contain bee diseases in 2000. [99441]

Ms Quin [holding answer 25 November 1999]: The Government fund a range of measures in England through its bee health programme, which is delivered by the Central Science Laboratory's National Bee Unit. In 2000–01 the programme will cost £1.3 million. The measures include a free diagnostic service for varroa, American Foul Brood and European Foul Brood as well as providing training and guidance on how to improve bee husbandry to help control bee diseases. In addition, in 2000–01 MAFF expects to spend around £244,000 on research and development (mainly on varroa) to support our bee health work. This includes a four year project on the biological control of varroa.

Arrangements for bee health matters in Scotland and Wales are the responsibility of the Scottish Executive and the Welsh Assembly respectively.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Shipbuilding

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he is taking to promote ship building and repair in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [99208]

Mr. Alan Johnson: To support and promote the UK shipbuilding industry, in July 1998 the Department established the Shipbuilding Forum whose membership comprises representatives of the shipbuilding and shiprepair industry, trades unions, equipment suppliers and customers, both private and public sector. Also involved are the National Training Organisation for the marine sector and relevant Government Departments. The Forum's terms of reference were to consider the current situation of the shipbuilding and shiprepair industry and how to improve its competitiveness so as to increase its share of the European market, leading to increased output, profitability and employment. The Forum produced a Report (a copy of which was placed in the Library in May 1999) and a subsequent Implementation Plan containing Recommendations—more than 40—addressed to all the participants, not just to Government. The Forum believes that these Recommendations will go a long way towards improving the fortunes of the UK shipbuilding and shiprepair industry.

The Department has already implemented most of the Recommendations addressed to it, most of which related to improvements to the Shipbuilding Intervention Fund (SIF) and the Home Shipbuilding Credit Guarantee Scheme (HSCGS). The Department has agreed to include an element of profit in SIF calculation; has extended SIF to conversion contracts; and has extended access to SIF to a number of previously excluded yards. The HSCGS has been improved by allowing contacts offering "pure cover" and by allowing US dollar and euro financing. In addition my Department has supported financially two projects being undertaken by the Shipbuilders and Shiprepairers Association aimed at improving productivity in shipyards, both new building and repair/conversion.

As well as these measures we are working in the EU and the OECD to find effective international trade disciplines to tackle unfair trade practices, such as low pricing from Korea. The Industry Council achieved a positive conclusion on this issue at its meeting on 9 November, making clear the EU's determination to deal with Korean unfair pricing and agreeing further actions to this end, including re-engaging Korea in bilateral consultations and pursuing possible actions under the World Trade Organisation.

Post Office

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the principal activities of his Department and its agencies which provide business for (a) Crown post offices and (b) other post offices; if he will assess whether the level of business generated in each case is likely to increase or decrease over the next five years; and which new areas of business for post offices are likely to be developed by his Department and its agencies over the same period. [99554]

Mr. Alan Johnson: By the nature of their operations and activities, this Department and its agencies do not directly provide business for Crown or other post offices and this position is not expected to change over the next five years. Currently no specific new areas of business for post offices are foreseen by this department but the targets for electronic delivery of services (50 per cent. by 2005, 100 per cent. by 2008) represent a real opportunity for additional business for the Post Office network across all public services delivered by central Government. Moreover, equivalent targets are now being set for local Government and there is an opportunity for the Post Office network to gain further business in delivery of services which are the responsibility of local Government. In addition to these Modern Government initiatives, the potential to provide a wider range of banking and other financial services through the Horizon automated system could facilitate an increase in the levels of business generated by or with Government Departments and agencies.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many post offices there are in each parliamentary constituency; and how many of them transact more than 40 per cent. of their work volumes on behalf of the Benefits Agency. [99766]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 25 November 1999]: I have obtained from the Post Office a list providing the information requested and have arranged for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has approved the Post Office's five year Strategic Plan; and if he will make a statement. [100811]

Mr. Byers: I am pleased to announce Government approval of the Post Office's Strategic Plan for 1999–2004. This is a five year rolling Plan which will be updated annually. The Plan, as submitted by the Post Office Board meets the requirements set out in the Post Office White Paper (CM 4340) and represents a key element in the new arm's length relationship that the Government is now establishing with the Post Office in fulfilment of the reforms described in the White Paper. The Post Office will now be pursuing and developing their strategy and this will be reflected in the Plan for 2000–05, which the Board will be presenting to me next spring.

For the Post Office both to modernise and improve services to customers in this country and to develop into a significant global player in distribution markets poses tough challenges, but exciting opportunities. In an increasingly competitive market place for postal services these challenges should not be underestimated as the Post Office itself fully recognises. This means that the Post Office must successfully build on current initiatives and seize commercial opportunities as they arise in the UK and internationally.

The key features of the Strategic Plan are commercially confidential, and as such will not be published. However, on the basis of the Plan the Government have set a post-tax profit target of £350 million for the financial year 1999–2000. This figure excludes any exceptional provisions which may be made for the Horizon automation project. As already announced, the Government have set the external financing regime (excluding adjustments for Horizon and acquisitions) as 50 per cent. of the post-tax profits for this year, and therefore, if the Post Office achieves the profit target, this equivalent of a commercial dividend will be £175 million. In the unlikely event of the Post Office falling short of the profit target the minimum figure will be £140 million. The Post Office will not pay dividends until it becomes a plc but in the meantime will set aside the relevant amount in its reserves.

Employment Tribunals

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to allocate funding for a permanent hearing centre in North Wales for employment tribunal cases; and if he will make a statement. [99985]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Employment Tribunals Service is presently seeking to identify suitable premises in North Wales. Decisions on funding priorities for 2000–01 and beyond have not yet been taken.

Target Setting

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many targets have been agreed between his Department and (i) local authorities and (ii) other bodies apart from his own agencies and non-departmental bodies since May 1997. [99474]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 24 November 1999]: The Department's Public Service Agreement (PSA) sets out Departmental and Agency targets. The PSA includes two targets which are shared with HM Treasury and two shared with the Foreign Office. These apart, none of the targets have been agreed between the Department and (i) Local Authorities, or (ii) other bodies apart from the Department's own agencies and Non-Departmental Public Bodies.

Ilisu Dam

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the Government's current investment in the Ilisu Dam, Turkey; and if he will make a statement. [100056]

Mr. Caborn: The Government have provided no support for the Ilisu dam project. We have not yet made a decision on the application for export credit support from Balfour Beatty.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the meetings his Department has held with Balfour Beatty plc about the Ilisu Dam Project since 1 January 1998. [100170]

Mr. Caborn: Balfour Beatty has attended meetings with ECGD on:

9 October 1998

9 April 1999

9 July 1999

8 September 1999

30 September 1999

Balfour Beatty and ECGD have been present at meetings of the Export Credit Agencies and contractors on:

24 July 1998

18 December 1998

28 April 1999

Balfour Beatty was also present at meetings in Turkey on 12–13 May which the Minister for Trade held with Turkish officials, when Ilisu was discussed.

Trade Liberalisation

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what quantitative assessment the Government have made of the benefits and costs to the United Kingdom of a comprehensive multilateral trade round involving far-reaching liberalisation of trade in (a) agriculture, (b) manufacturing and (c) services. [99873]

Mr. Caborn: A number of studies have been published estimating substantial income gains to the world and the European Union from further trade liberalisation. Two recent ones are by the European Commission and the OECD. The Commission study covers agriculture, industrial tariffs and services; the OECD study does not include services. These studies do not provide separate estimates of the impact on the UK. However, on the assumption that the UK gains in line with its share of Community output and external trade, it is possible to provide a broad indication of the likely effects on the UK economy. On this basis, the European Commission and the OECD studies suggest that further trade liberalisation could bring income gains for the UK of between $8 billion and $19 billion (£5 billion and £11 billion) per year in terms of 1998 prices and incomes. This is equivalent to an income increase of between £210 and £480 per year for the average UK household. All such estimates are sensitive to assumptions made, particularly about the form, scope and scale of further liberalisation. I shall also be writing to the hon. Member with further information.

World Trade Organisation

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what formal representations have been made by (a) Ministers and (b) officials to the European Commission regarding the negotiating objectives for the forthcoming World Trade Organisation talks. [100277]

Mr. Caborn: UK Ministers have played a key role in shaping the EU's approach to the Seattle meeting where we hope that a new comprehensive round of trade negotiations will be launched. The EU's position was agreed by the Council of Ministers in formal Conclusions on 26 October. Trade Commissioner Lamy and Commission officials have been negotiating on behalf of the EU in Geneva on the basis of these formal Conclusions.

ECGD

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the environmental and ethical considerations that he has announced will apply to the ECGD. [100477]

Mr. Caborn: There has been no announcement about ethical or environmental considerations that will apply to ECGD. This is being addressed in the current review of ECGD's Mission and Status. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced the introduction of a screening process to facilitate the identification of environmentally sensitive cases.

Mr. Onllwyn Glyndwr Williams

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reasons Mr. Onllwyn Glyndwr Williams, a constituent of the hon. Member for Hereford, has not yet undergone spirometry testing for the purposes of his compensation claim against British Coal; and if he will make a statement. [99855]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 26 November 1999]: Appointments for spirometry testing are being made on a regional basis according to an agreed order of priority which reflects age of claimant, age of claim and other relevant information. I understand that Mr. Williams will be receiving an appointment at his home in the course of next week.

Approximately 95 per cent. of the 43,000 living claimants identified as at May this year should now have been contacted to arrange an appointment, and nearly 30,000 tests have been conducted.

Corporate Assets

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the value of land and property in (i) Scotland, (ii) the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas and (iv) total within the responsibility of the (a) Bio-technology and Biological Sciences Research Council, (b) Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Council, (c) Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council, (d) Economic and Social Research Council, (e) Medical Research Council, (f) Natural Environment Research Council and (g) Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council. [99816]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 26 November 1999]: Details of the total assets of the seven science Research Councils are published in their Annual Accounts and the latest DTI Annual Expenditure Plans Report (Cm4211). As expenditure from the Science Budget is deemed to be for the benefit of the UK as a whole, data are not collected in the form requested.

Video Recorders

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the Government's policy on the continuation of the EU import tariff on video recorders; and what representations on this it has received in the last 12 months. [100278]

Mr. Caborn: The Government's broad policy objective is to maximise the liberalisation of industrial tariffs world-wide including those of the EU. The consumer electronics industry has indicated, in response to a DTI consultative document on future tariff liberalisation published in May and on other occasions, that in exchange for greatly improved access to third-country markets it would welcome tariff reductions world-wide, including by the EU, on video recorders and all other consumer electronics.

Tweeddale Press Group

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the proposed acquisition of the Tweeddale Press Group by Johnston Press has been referred to the Competition Commission. [100080]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 26 November 1999]: I have issued a Press Notice inviting comments on the proposed transfer, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

EU Structural Funding

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements he proposes to make to cover the anticipated time lag between the ending of the existing European structural funding on 31 December and the beginning of the transitional payments under the reformed system; and if he will make a statement. [100343]

Mr. Caborn: Projects approved within current Structural funds programmes by the end of this year can be co-financed until the end of 2001.

For projects approved within programmes that cover the new period 2000–2006, the Regulations provide for these to be co-financed from 1 January 2000, provided that the draft programmes have been lodged with the Commission by 31 April 2000.

These arrangements will ensure continuity of funding between the programming periods.

Private Recruitment Industry

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what assessment his Department has made concerning (a) the potential impact of proposals for the regulation of the private recruitment industry on job seekers over the age of 50 years and (b) the potential effects of restrictions of the charging by recruitment agencies of fees; and if he will make a statement; [99667]

(2) what assessment his Department has made of the effect of his proposals on the regulation of the private recruitment industry on the ability of hirers to fill vacancies in a timely fashion; [99668]

(3) what plans his Department has to establish a code of practice for the private recruitment industry as an alternative to regulation. [99669]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Except in respect of a few provisions specifically to protect those under 18 the proposals seek to protect the interests of those using bureaux equally, regardless of age. The effect of the proposals to restrict fee charging to hirers in certain circumstances are assessed in the Regulatory Impact Assessment in the consultation document. Changes to the controls on fee charging to workseekers are set out in Annex 1 of the document. The proposals seek to ensure both that bureaux are able to respond to hirers' requirements promptly and that neither hirers, workers nor third parties are put at risk as a consequence of bureaux not doing necessary checks to establish the suitability of those they are supplying. Careful consideration is being given to all the representations received. I have no plans to establish a code of practice. The reasons why this approach is not considered practicable are set out in chapter 4 of the consultation document.

Environmental Impact Assessment

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library a copy of the environmental assessment questionnaire which companies seeking cover from the ECGD will have to complete from 4 January 2000. [100415]

Mr. Caborn: A copy of ECGD's "Environmental Questionnaire" is being placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reason the announcement on 23 November imposing a requirement upon companies applying for credit insurance to the ECGD that they must provide an environmental impact assessment of projects in respect of which they seek cover, was not made to the House. [100411]

Mr. Caborn: The intention to introduce an enhanced environmental screening process was covered in the summer edition of ECGD News and was also mentioned in presentations at successive customer seminars. It is not customary to announce such procedural changes to the House.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who will judge and against what criteria whether an environmental impact assessment questionnaire completed by an applicant for ECGD cover meets the Government's requirements. [100416]

Mr. Caborn: The "Questionnaire" is simply designed to help ECGD Underwriters identify whether a case may be environmentally sensitive, and consider appropriate action.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library a copy of the regulatory impact assessment which has been carried out in respect of the new requirement upon companies applying for credit insurance to the ECGD that they must provide an environmental impact assessment of projects in respect of which they seek cover. [100413]

Mr. Caborn: A regulatory impact assessment is not appropriate in this case since the introduction of the enhanced environmental screening process does not involve Parliamentary legislation.

The environmental screening process being introduced is designed to facilitate the identification of environmentally sensitive cases. Companies will not have to provide an environmental impact assessment in all cases.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations were carried out with British industry and exporters prior to his announcement that applicants for credit guarantees to the Export Credits Guarantee Department will have to provide an Environmental Impact Assessment of the projects in respect of which they seek cover. [100412]

Mr. Caborn: A number of customers were consulted by ECGD about the form of a draft 'Environmental Questionnaire'. Environmental Impact Assessments will not be required in all cases.

Industrial Diseases

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what will be the (a) maximum and (b) minimum fee received by lawyers for work on any individual claim for compensation for (i) vibration white finger injuries and (ii) chronic bronchitis/emphysema. [100213]

Mrs. Liddell: Solicitor's costs and the precise circumstances in which those costs are met are detailed in the Handling Agreements for both diseases.

The agreed costs for most successful vibration white finger claims will be in the range of £600 plus VAT and reasonable disbursements, although in some cases the costs are dealt with on the merits of each case. For respiratory disease the agreed costs per successful claim range from £500 to £1,750 plus VAT and reasonable disbursements.

In addition to these costs the agreements also provide for the payment of costs for claims in particular instances, for example where the disputes procedures have been invoked or where complex special damages are being claimed.

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much of the provision he has made for the British Coal health liabilities in respect of compensation claims for (a) vibration white finger injuries and (b) chronic bronchitis and emphysema he estimates will be paid to lawyers in fees agreed under the scheme. [100212]

Mrs. Liddell: Solicitors costs are based on agreed tariffs set out in the Handling Agreements. It is not possible at this stage to forecast accurately the provision to cover these costs. The actual amounts paid will depend on the number of successful claims, the particular characteristics of these claims (for example, whether they have been settled by expedited payments) and the disbursements involved.

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what fees lawyers will receive under the scheme agreed for compensation for former miners suffering from (a) vibration white finger and (b) chronic bronchitis/emphysema in respect of claims which are unsuccessful. [100206]

Mrs. Liddell: Under the terms of the Handling Agreements negotiated for compensating former miners for these injuries, the Government meets the costs and reasonable disbursements of solicitors in successful claims. No such costs are reimbursed where the claim is unsuccessful. However, in the case of chronic bronchitis and emphysema in addition to the costs agreed for successful claims the Department has also agreed to make payments in respect of all claims on the Register (some 62,000) held by the Department's claim handlers as at 14 June 1999, whether the claimant is successful or not. These costs range from £25 to £100 per claim depending on the date of claim and number of claims held by the solicitor and are in recognition of client care work carried out after the Judgment and before the signing of the Agreement.

Insurance Industry

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the UK insurance industry about promoting plain English in insurance policies. [99594]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I have been asked to reply.

Policy terms and conditions, and the way they are presented, are ultimately matters for individual insurers. However, the use of Plain English is to be encouraged, not least because of the commercial benefits that accrue from customer satisfaction.

The Association of British Insurers, whose members provide 96 per cent. of insurance in the United Kingdom, has promoted better practice. In this area, its Statement of General Insurance Practice notes that insurers will continue to develop more explicit proposal forms and policy documents, while bearing in mind the legal nature of insurance contracts.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to encourage the insurance industry to provide more information to customers about its practice of premium-loading after claims. [99593]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I have been asked to reply.

None. It is for insurance companies themselves to determine the terms and conditions of their policies and the premiums that they charge in the light of their assessment of the perceived risk and the need to remain competitive.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Diplomatic Corps (Non-payment of Rates)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the names of the diplomatic missions and international organisations which have outstanding balances of over £10,000 as at 31 March in respect of national non-domestic rates. [99443]

Mr. Battle: Most missions and international organisations meet their obligations. However, at 31 March 1999, the following missions owed over £10,000 for national non-domestic rates:

Country	Amount outstanding up to 31 March 1999 (£)
Algeria	34,545.78
Bulgaria	149,468.19
Cameroon	22,323.83
Ghana	17,783.05
Iran	79,123.25
Jordan	27,601.50
Mozambique	28,554.63
Nigeria	314,714.57
Portugal	43,692.28
Senegal	10,927.33
Sierra Leone	49,576.00
Uganda	17,649.17
Yemen	27,561.83
Yugoslavia	43,734.21

Family Visit Appeals

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the cost to UK embassies and high commissions of the appeal system for family visits in each of the last five years. [99897]

Mr. Vaz: The Right of Appeal against the refusal of visas for visits was withdrawn in 1993. There has therefore been no extra cost to UK Embassies and High Commissions over the past five years in this respect. An appeal system for family visits is to be introduced within the next 12 months.

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent estimate he has made, in respect of each of the five posts overseas that deal with the greatest number of visitor applications, of the need for further entry clearance officers to deal with family visit appeals. [99898]

Mr. Vaz: All visa issuing posts have been asked to estimate the likely staffing implications arising from the new right of appeal for family visits, which is due to be introduced within the next twelve months. We are assessing the responses but no final decisions on additional staff will be taken until the implementation procedures are agreed.

Pakistan

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made about ensuring the safety of Ahmadiyya followers in Pakistan in the last two months. [99849]

Mr. Hain: We continue to raise our concerns about the position of Pakistan's Ahmadiyya community with the Pakistani authorities. We have noted General Musharraf's promise to Pakistan's minorities that their rights would be respected and that they would be treated as equal citizens. Our High Commissioner in Islamabad has underlined to General Musharraf and other members of his administration the need for the military authorities in Pakistan to maintain respect for human rights.

Falklands

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his policy is on opening negotiations with Argentina regarding the sovereignty of the Falkland Islands. [R] [100017]

Mr. Battle: There is no doubt about British sovereignty of the Falkland Islands, confirmed in international law. This is not negotiable. We are committed to defend the Islanders' right to determine their own future.

In consultation with the Falkland Islands Government, we continue to discuss with Argentina issues of common interest in the South Atlantic, for example the conservation of fish stocks, in order to improve the way we manage our differences with Argentina that arise from our respective positions on sovereignty. The British-Argentine Joint Statement of 14 July was a significant milestone in this process.

BBC World Television

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received about the contribution of BBC World Television to the promotion of British interests internationally; and if he will make a statement. [99997]

Mr. Hain: We have received no such representations. In July, a senior producer from BBC World wrote to my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary about future funding of BBC World. In his reply, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary made clear that, as BBC World was established as a commercial venture, he could see no possibility of Government taking on responsibility for its financing.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to provide grant in aid from his Department's budget for BBC World Television; and if he will make a statement. [99996]

Mr. Hain: There are no plans to provide grant in aid from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's budget for BBC World. BBC World is a commercial operation funded by subscription and/or advertising. It is part of the BBC's commercial arm and is quite separate from the BBC World Service which is funded by parliamentary grant in aid.

Kosovo

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what legal advice he has obtained since the Kosovo campaign on the legality of the NATO intervention in Kosovo. [100089]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 26 November 1999]: Throughout the Kosovo crisis, the Government took legal advice in accordance with standing procedures. They continue to do so as necessary. During the NATO air campaign, a series of cases was brought by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia against the UK and other NATO Allies before the International Court of Justice. The UK's defence in these proceedings has been handled by the Attorney-General in person, assisted by a legal team composed of officials and outside counsel. If the FRY persists in its case against the UK, we shall contest it vigorously.

Danube

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has had from (a) Bulgaria, (b) Hungary and (c) Romania on the clearing of the Danube. [100088]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 26 November 1999]: We are aware of, and share, the concerns of Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania about the blockages in the Danube caused by downed bridges at Novi Sad. The matter is currently under discussion within the Danube Commission at technical level, and within the EU. The last meeting of the General Affairs Council on 15 November confirmed the EU's willingness to provide the Danube states and the Danube Commission with active support in their efforts to devise and implement a solution, and that it was prepared to examine an EU contribution to the clearance on the Danube on the basis of proposals to be put forward by the Danube Commission.

The General Affairs Council also recalled however, that, under international law, the main responsibility for clearing the Danube lies with the FRY. It requested the Yugoslav authorities immediately and unconditionally to perform or allow the necessary clearance operations.

Stability Pact

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the cost of the UK contribution to the Stability Pact between its inception and 30 October. [100081]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 26 November 1999]: We anticipate that the UK's contribution to cover the costs of the inaugural Summit meeting of the Stability Pact, and the costs incurred in supporting the EU's Special Representative for the Stability Pact until 31 December 1999, will be approximately £225,000.

The Stability Pact is not intended to be a grant-giving organisation but we will continue to support the implementing agencies (EU, OSCE, IFIs etc.) through our regular contributions and on a case-by-case basis.

Iran

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the deaths of Iranian law enforcement personnel in a clash with drug traffickers on 3 November. [100337]

Mr. Battle: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary greatly regrets these tragic deaths and sent a message of condolence to the Iranian Foreign Minister. They are another very distressing reflection of the efforts and commitment that Iran has made to combat the narcotics trade.

Hon. Members will recall that, in March this year, the UK donated £300,000 to the United Nations International Drugs Control Programme to provide Iranian frontier personnel with 1,020 bullet proof vests. I should like to announce that, following discussions with the Iranian authorities in Tehran over the weekend, the Government are donating a further £1 million to UNDCP for projects in Iran and separately giving £150,000 of bilateral drugs assistance. The UNDCP programme covers training and equipment primarily to strengthen counter-narcotics work at Iran's borders with Afghanistan and Pakistan. Our proposed bilateral assistance covers training and equipment for the border with Turkey and airport controls, areas not covered by the UNDCP programme. Our overall assistance package will improve the capacity of Iranian drugs control agencies to combat the traffickers and to stop drugs entering and leaving Iran.

No suppliers have yet been nominated for the goods covered by this assistance package. The export from the UK of some of the goods concerned may be subject to control and an export licence might need to be granted if they are sourced from the UK. If such a licence were granted, this could constitute an exception to our arms embargo on Iran and would be announced.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Iranian Government, and with what response, over the arrest and detention of those who took part in pro-democracy demonstrations in July. [100471]

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary raised our concerns about these detentions with Foreign Minister Kharrazi during their meeting at the United Nations General Assembly on 21 September. He was told that should charges be brought against those detained, then they would receive a fair trial, and that any sentences would be subject to appeal.

A Resolution on the Human Rights situation in Iran was adopted on 18 November at the United Nations General Assembly. This resolution, tabled in conjunction with our EU partners, also underlined continuing international concern over these arrests.

Surveying Agreement

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the working of the agreement relating to co-operation in mapping, charting and geodesy signed at Feltham and Washington on 4 and 18 July 1985. [100344]

Mr. Battle: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary will write to the hon. Member.

British Citizenship

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many (a) officials in his Department, (b) officials in other Departments and (c) others are currently working on the bill to restore British citizenship to the people of British Dependent Territories. [100312]

Mr. Battle: A joint Steering Group of Foreign and Commonwealth Office and Home Office officials has been established to work on the British citizenship offer to be contained in the Overseas Territories Bill. The Steering Group membership comprises a core of some 10 people of whom six are FCO officials and the rest from the Home Office. They are supported by other members of the Overseas Territories Department of the FCO who are involved in the implementation of the White Paper. Consultations are being held with Overseas Territory Governments.

Chinese President (State Visit)

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what written record was kept of the (a) proceedings and (b) conclusions reached at meetings between the Metropolitan Police and his Department's officials in relation to the Chinese President's State Visit. [100420]

Mr. Battle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 4 November 1999, Official Report, columns 271–72W.

"Your Britain Your Europe" Campaign

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent the costs of the "Your Britain Your Europe" campaign and the tour of the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz), of the UK are being met from public funds. [100319]

Mr. Vaz: The costs of the "Your Britain Your Europe" Roadshow are estimated at £60,000, plus travel and accommodation.

It is Government policy to set out the benefits of the UK's membership of the EU. One of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's publicly declared performance targets is:

"a step change in the UK's relations with the rest of Europe, with increasing public support for EU activities".

The Roadshow is excellent value for money, with 23 events in 11 cities in five days. We are working with a number of business, educational and other organisations which are providing their time and resources free of charge.

Sri Lanka

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the killings in Madhu Church, Manar, Sri Lanka. [100134]

Mr. Hain: None. I deeply regret the loss of civilian life in this incident. I urge all parties to this tragic conflict to do their utmost to avoid civilian casualties.

Export Licences (Bahrain)

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the six ML1 SIELS and one ML1 open individual export licences for exports to Bahrain this year. [100135]

Mr. Hain: I refer the hon. Member to the written answer I gave on 24 November 1999, Official Report, columns 148-49W.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

David Cocks and Jonathan Goldberg

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Solicitor-General what were the total sums received from public funds by David Cocks and Jonathan Goldberg in the period from the beginning of 1994 to the latest date for which he has figures. [99331]

The Solicitor-General: I will write to my hon. Friend shortly.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Heathrow Airport

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to announce the decision on Part 2 of the second stage consultation on options for changes to the preferential use of Heathrow Airport's runways at night. [99218]

Mr. Mullin: The Government announced their decision on 23 November 1999, Official Report, columns 62-65W.

Homelessness (Merseyside)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what the primary reasons were for families becoming homeless within Merseyside in each year since 1993; [98601]

(2) what the primary reasons were for homelessness on Merseyside in the most recent year for which figures are available, broken down by gender. [98598]

Mr. Mullin: Data are reported to the Department each quarter by local authorities on their activity under the homelessness provisions of the 1985 and 1996 Housing

Acts. These identify the main reasons for loss of last settled home of homeless households accepted by local authorities as in priority need. Further classification by gender, or household type, is not collected. The following table summarises information provided by authorities in Merseyside since 1993:

Homeless households in Merseyside authorities: reasons for loss of last settled home

Note:
Prior to 1997, reported figures include a small number of households not in priority need.

Homelessness (Sefton)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many children formed part of families made homeless in Sefton in each year since 1996. [98600]

Mr. Mullin: Data are reported to the Department each quarter by local authorities on their activity under the homelessness provisions of the 1985 and 1996 Housing Acts. Information is not collected on the numbers of children in homeless families. The following table provides for Sefton the available data on the numbers of households with dependent children accepted as homeless.

Genetically Modified Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library a copy of the voluntary agreement on the commercial growing of genetically modified crops between his Department and SCIMAC, which he announced on 5 November. [99543]

Mr. Meacher: Yes. The details of the voluntary agreement on the commercial growing of genetically modified crops between my Department and SCIMAC are publicly available and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list research contracts controlled by his Department for work associated with the genetically modified crop farm-scale trials. [99536]

Mr. Meacher: The Department currently has three contracts in place covering farm scale trials of genetically modified crops and farmland wildlife, worth £3.3 million. The contracts are as follows:

Contract	Lead contractor	Start date	Completion date
Winter oilseed rape	Institute of Arable Crops Research	9 April 1999	31 December 2003
Spring oilseed rape	Scottish Crop Research Institute	9 April 1999	31 December 2002
Maize	NERC Institute of Terrestrial Ecology	9 April 1999	31 December 2002

GM Farm-scale Trials

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the payments made to farmers hosting the genetically modified farm-scale trials; and whether the payments include (a) a fee for managing the farm-scale trial crop, (b) compensation for loss of income from the land growing the farm-scale crop and (c) a fee for taking part in the farm scale trial. [99541]

Mr. Meacher: The Department has no involvement in any payments made to farmers for taking part in the farm-scale evaluations of GM crops, nor is it party to any such arrangements. All fields and crops are provided by the industry group SCIMAC (supply chain initiative on modified agricultural crops).

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the method and date of destruction and disposal used for the harvested crops from the 1999 genetically modified farm-scale trial of fodder maize at Little Park Farm, Beech Hill Road, Mortimer, Berkshire. [99540]

Mr. Meacher: The genetically modified farm-scale trial of fodder maize at Little Park Farm, Beech Hill Road, Mortimer, Berkshire was harvested in early October 1999. The harvested crop was then mechanically chopped and ploughed back into the ground.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the criteria used by the Farm-Scale Trials Scientific Steering Committee for the selection of farms to take part in the farm-scale trials. [99542]

Mr. Meacher: The criteria for selecting farms to take part in the farm-scale evaluations are still under discussion by the research contractors and the Scientific Steering Committee. The issue was discussed at the first and second meetings of the Scientific Steering Committee and the Committee's opinions are recorded in the minutes which have been published.

The intention is to compare the GM crops with the non-GM equivalent crops grown and managed using a range of current agricultural practices and distributed throughout the normal geographic range for that particular crop.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish a list of the crop varieties, including the respective companies which developed them, so far proposed by SCIMAC for the inclusion in the genetically modified crop farm-scale trials. [99538]

Mr. Meacher: The crops provided by SCIMAC for the farm-scale evaluations are fodder maize and oil seed rape, which are genetically modified to be tolerant to glufosinate ammonium. AgrEvo UK Limited have developed these crops.

The trait has been bred into varieties of maize and oil seed rape (both spring-sown and autumn-sown) suitable for growing in the UK. The intention is that only one variety of fodder maize, and one variety each of spring-sown and autumn-sown oil seed rape, will be used in the farm-scale evaluations as the results will be generic in nature.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish a copy of the protocols for the management of the GM farm-scale trials for each crop and each variety planted. [99544]

Mr. Meacher: All GM crops in the farm-scale evaluations will be grown in accordance with the SCIMAC (supply chain initiative on modified agricultural crops) guidelines, the industry code for good practice. These guidelines have been published. A copy has been placed in the House Library.

The approval for the herbicide sets out the protocol for its use. This has been seen and approved by the scientific steering committee, but is not fully published yet. It is intended that this information be published as soon as possible.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on which dates the crops in the 1999 genetically modified crop farm-scale trials were sown and harvested involving fodder maize at Walnut Tree Farm, Lyng, Norfolk, crops at (a) Home Farm, Spittle-in-the-Street, Glentham, Lincolnshire, (b) Little Park Farm, Beech Hill Road, Mortimer, Reading, Berkshire, and (c) Rothampsted Experimental Station, Harpenden, Hertfordshire, and spring oilseed rape at Advanta Seed, Booth Graffoe, Lincoln, and Model Farm, Shirburn, Watlington, Oxfordshire. [99539]

Mr. Meacher: The fodder maize crop at Walnut Tree Farm, Lyng, Norfolk was sown on 7 May 1999 and harvested in early October. The fodder maize crop at Home Farm, Spittle-in-the-Street, Glentham, Lincolnshire was sown on 18 May 1999 and harvested in early October. The fodder maize crop at Little Park Farm, Beech Hill Road, Mortimer, Reading, Berkshire was sown on 10 May 1999 and harvested in early October. The fodder maize crop at Rothamsted Experimental Station, Harpenden, Hertfordshire was sown on 12 May 1999 and harvested on 22 September.

The spring oil seed rape crop at Advanta Seed, Boothby Graffoe, Lincoln was sown on 28 April 1999 and harvested on 1 September 1999. The spring oil seed rape crop at Model Farm, Shirburn, Watlington, Oxfordshire was sown on 29 April 1999 and harvested on 2 September 1999.

Central Railways

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what new proposals have been submitted to his Department by the company seeking to develop the Central Railways project; and if he will make a statement. [99630]

Mr. Hill: We are aware that Central Railway plc has been consulting about its proposal for a freight and passenger railway between Liverpool and Lille, via London. Ministers have received copies of the company's consultation documents but have not taken a view on the scheme.

If Central Railway plc is to proceed with the scheme it will have to apply for an Order under the Transport and Works Acts 1992. We understand that the company hopes to submit an application next year. The company's previous application in 1996 was rejected by Parliament. As was the case last time, the company will be obliged to consult on any applications and affected parties will have the right to put forward their views.

John Harrison

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he received a report on the Louth District Coroners Court hearing into the death of coastguard John Harrison; and what action he has undertaken. [99621]

Mr. Hill: No report into the death of Coastguard John Harrison from Louth District Coroners Court has been received by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency. The Louth District Coroners Court office has confirmed that no report has been issued.

Maritime and Coastguard Agency

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on what date the Maritime and Coastguard Agency achieved its Charter Mark. [99612]

Mr. Hill: The Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA) has not applied for a Charter Mark yet, in view of the changes the agency has undergone since its formation. The MCA is committed to a high level of customer service and has 15 Service Standards which cover the business activities of the whole agency.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions in the last 12 months the automatic data retrieval system has failed to function at (a) Oban, (b) Shetland and (c) Pentland Coastguard stations. [99615]

Mr. Hill: The Action Data System (ADAS) has failed twice in the last 12 months at these stations—once at Pentland and once at Oban. At Oban the failure was caused by an engineer shutting off the power, followed by a temporary failure of the auxiliary electricity supply. On both occasions, the system was restarted within an hour.

Other minor problems have been experienced which have affected printers or individual terminals, but none of these has resulted in a failure of the whole system.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will instigate an inquiry into charges of bullying and intimidation of coastguard officers by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency Management. [99613]

Mr. Hill: The Maritime and Coastguard Agency has a well established grievance procedure for handling complaints from its staff. Both cases of bullying and intimidation reported under the procedure during 1999 have been investigated using this procedure which has been agreed with Trade Unions.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what experiments have been carried out to establish the response times necessary to respond physically to emergency calls at present covered by Oban Coastguard. [99617]

Mr. Hill: No experiments have been carried out to establish Coastguard response times as these are covered by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA) Service Standards. The target response time for a Coastguard presence at the reported scene of an incident in the area covered by the Oban Coastguard District is 30 minutes. This is a national target response time which is reported to the MCA Headquarters monthly, and reviewed locally by Coastguard management, through regular operational readiness inspections. The expectation is that this target will be met 95 per cent. of the time, since some remote locations can cause teams to take up to an hour to arrive.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the digital computer system for the new Maritime and Coastguard Agency communications system is operational. [99614]

Mr. Hill: The Action Data System, as modified for compliance for the year 2000 (ADAS 2000), is used to record data about incidents dealt with by HMCG. This system was operational at all Coastguard Stations by September 1999. The new Integrated Coastguard Communication System (ICCS) will replace the existing equipment which is nearing the end of its life. Operational roll out will start in May 2000, and finish three years later.

Proprietorial Schools

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what discussions he has with the Department for Education and Employment concerning the impact on proprietorial schools of his decision not to issue permits to such schools under Section 19 of the Transport Act 1985; [99760]

(2) how many proprietorial schools have registered as public service operators following a decision not to grant them permits to operate a minibus under Section 19 of the Transport Act 1985. [99761]

Mr. Hill: It has always been the case that only vehicles that are not being used with a view to profit may be operated under a permit issued under Section 19 of the Transport Act 1985. Decisions on whether particular applicants are eligible under the terms of Section 19 are for the Traffic Commissioners not my Department. I understand that there have been a small number of recent cases where proprietorial schools have applied for a public service vehicle operator's licence after having been ruled ineligible for a Section 19 permit by the Traffic Commissioner.

There have been no discussions between my Department and the Department for Education and Employment on this particular issue.

Health and Safety Laboratory

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Health and Safety Laboratory intends to publish its Annual report and Accounts for 1998–99. [100474]

Mr. Meacher: The Health and Safety Laboratory has today published the 1998–99 Annual Report and Accounts, and copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Cement

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received on the use of alternative fuels for the production of cement. [100023]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The use of alternative fuels for the production of cement has raised a significant amount of public interest. The Department has received a number of representations from local communities where cement kilns are situated, environmental pressure groups, as well as representations from the cement industry itself.

Regional Development Agencies

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to ensure that regional development agencies are responsible for promoting a sustainable energy policy within their region. [100455]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The new UK Sustainable Development Strategy, published in May this year, said that the Government wished to see high level sustainable development frameworks for each English region by the end of 2000. These frameworks will set out a regional vision for sustainable development. They will need to have the support of a wide range of stakeholders and should be agreed by Regional Chambers. Although they will not be in the lead, RDAs will be one of the key partners in the preparation of frameworks.

One of the tasks identified for these frameworks will be to build consensus on how the national policy and target on renewable energy will be taken forward in each region. Government Offices are initiating work to produce regional assessments and targets for renewable energy provision based on regional resource studies. The Government hope that frameworks will draw upon this work and elaborate a regional approach to renewable energy delivery, including regional targets.

The frameworks should take account of issues raised by the RDA strategies for sustainable development and, in turn, will inform future revisions of the RDA strategies.

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many people are employed by each of the regional development agencies; and what have been their administration costs since their establishment. [100464]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The table shows the number of full-time equivalent staff in the Regional Development Agencies, as at 1 April 1999 (the most recent figures available); the administration costs for the period December 1998 to April 1999, when the Agencies were being set up; and administration budgets for the current financial year.

Signals (Millennium Compliance)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if all (a) road traffic signals systems and (b) rail signals systems are millennium compliant; and if he will make a statement. [100078]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The millennium readiness of road traffic signals systems and national railways signals systems has been assessed under Action 2000's Independent Assessment Programme. These assessments concluded that all safety critical and business continuity systems within the local and national road sectors in England, and the national railways sector in Great Britain, were 100 per cent. blue—indicating that the assessments have identified no risk of material disruption. Full details are available on Action 2000's website (www.bu[illegible]000.co.uk).

Public Transport (Millennium Holiday)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about public transport arrangements for new year's eve and new year's day. [100077]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The details of transport provision over the Millennium period are primarily a matter for decisions and announcement by individual transport operators taking account of local needs and in consultation with local authorities and other relevant bodies. Many bus and rail transport providers will operate special timetables to enable members of the public to get to and from Millennium celebrations. In developing such timetables, operators have maintained close contact with police and emergency services.

Disabled Facilities Grant

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will review the operation of the disabled facilities grant to ensure that it provides prompt and sympathetic treatment for those with degenerative conditions. [99063]

Mr. Mullin: My Department keeps the operation of disabled facilities grants under regular review, to ensure that they continue to provide prompt and sympathetic treatment for all disabled people who need adaptations to their homes. The allowances in the test of resources are reviewed and uprated annually, to ensure that they reflect changes in living costs. Last year, we announced that we would increase the resources available for the grant by a quarter over the following three years, and this should enable local authorities to deal with applications more promptly. Local authorities are required by law to deal with applications as quickly as possible, and we advise them in guidance to ensure that applicants with the most pressing needs are dealt with first.

Transport Council

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what issues will be discussed at the next meeting of EU transport ministers. [100499]

Mr. Hill: The proposed agenda for the 9–10 December Transport Council comprises the following items.

1. Adoption of the agenda.
2. Approval of "A" points.

Maritime Transport

3. Commission Communications on short sea shipping.

Horizontal Issues

4. Commission Communication on intermodality and intermodal freight transport;
5. Galileo satellite navigation project.

Land Transport

6. New developments for European railways (including rail infrastructure, rail interoperability and alleviation of bottlenecks);

7. Working time in road transport;

Air Transport

8. Short and long term perspectives on aviation noise;

9. Establishment of a European Aviation Safety Authority

10. Air Transport negotiations with Central and Eastern European countries;

11. Commission Communication on air traffic management

12. Other business

Inverness Airport

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many flights there were (a) into and (b) out of Inverness airport, in each of the last three years. [100307]

Mr. Mullin: Data on aircraft movements are collected by the Civil Aviation Authority (CAA). The CAA data does not distinguish between a take-off and a landing referring only to aircraft movements which can be either a take-off or a landing. The last three years for which there is a full year's data are 1996, 1997 and 1998.

In 1996 there were 26,776 aircraft movements at Inverness airport.

In 1997 there were 22,475 aircraft movements.

In 1998 there were 26,875 aircraft movements.

Disused Railway Lines

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many disused railway lines have been re-opened since 1969; and what was the cost to public funds in each case. [100580]

Mr. Hill: This information is not readily available.

Council Housing

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to synchronize secured and assured tenancy regulations in connection with the large-scale voluntary transfer scheme of council houses; and if he will make a statement. [100095]

Mr. Mullin: I am aware of the discussion paper published by the Chartered Institute of Housing on a single form of tenancy for social housing. It is an interesting proposal which the Department will bear in mind in developing the contents of any forthcoming Housing Green Paper.

Correspondence

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Woking concerning the law on abandoned vehicles, dated 17 September, forwarded to him by the Home Office in October. [100419]

Mr. Hill: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary wrote to the hon. Member on 26 November.

Green Ministers Committee

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the actions taken by the Green Ministers Committee since its formation. [99927]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The Green Ministers Committee has made good progress since May 1997 and has met seven times. I refer the hon. Member to the replies I have given previously announcing the actions taken at each meeting.

To my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy) on 22 November 1999, Official Report, column 22W, with regard to the outcome of the Committee's meeting in November 1999.

To my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Burgon) on 16 July 1999, Official Report, column 341W, with regard to the outcome of the Committee's meeting in July 1999.

To the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 24 March 1999, Official Report, column 248W, with regard to the outcome of the Committee's meeting in March 1999.

To my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) on 25 November 1998, Official Report, column 5W, with regard to the outcome of the Committee's meeting in November 1998.

To the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 29 June 1998, Official Report, column 90W, with regard to the outcome of the Committee's meeting in June 1998.

To the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 17 March 1998, Official Report, column 546W, with regard to the outcome of the Committee's meeting in December 1997.

To my hon. Friend the Member for Worsley (Mr. Lewis) on 31 July 1997, Official Report, column 542W, with regard to the outcome of the Committee's meeting in July 1997.

The Committee published its first annual report on its activities, "Greening Government: the first annual report of Green Ministers 1998/99" in July 1999. It sets out achievements and a future work programme across a wide range of activities.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Child Care

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many places with registered forms of child care there have been for each quarter of 1999 in England. [98664]

Ms Hodge: Information, which is collected annually, is not available in the precise form requested. The available information is shown in the following table.

Children's day care provision in England as at 31 March 1999 (provisional)

	Providers	Child care places
Day Nurseries	7,000	247,700
Playgroups	15,000	347,200
Child minders	82,200	336,600
Out of School Clubs	3,800	113,800
Holiday Schemes	10,200	435,300

Note:
Data compiled from information provided by local authorities. Figures have been rounded to the nearest 100. Provision may be made by local authorities, voluntary or private organisations register under Part X of the Children Act 1989 or exempt from registration. Where complete information was not available, some estimates have been made. Holiday schemes are counted once for each holiday period in which they operate.

Merseyside Training and Enterprise Council

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what (a) performance indicators and (b) output measures are used to measure the (i) absolute and (ii) relative performance of Merseyside TEC. [98569]

Mr. Wicks: The indicators used to measure performance of all Training and Enterprise Councils (including Chambers of Commerce, Training and Enterprise) are:

Work based training for young people:
- NVQs per 100 leavers
- NVQ2s per 100 leavers
- NVQ3+s per 100 leavers
- Cost per point
- Percentage other training trainees who found training very/fairly useful
- Percentage ethnic minority leavers gaining at least one whole NVQ
- Percentage non ethnic minority leavers gaining at least one whole NVQ
- Percentage disabled leavers gaining at least one whole NVQ
- Percentage non disabled leavers gaining at least one whole NVQ

Work based training for adults:
- Jobs per 100 leavers
- NVQs per 100 leavers
- Cost per point
- Percentage ethnic minority leavers gaining at least one whole NVQ
- Percentage non ethnic minority leavers gaining at least one whole NVQ
- Percentage disabled leavers gaining at least one whole NVQ
- Percentage non disabled leavers gaining at least one whole NVQ

Investors in People:
- Percentage medium/large companies recognised as an Investor in People
- Percentage large (200+) companies recognised as an Investor in People.

Performance information for all TECs is collated and published annually. A copy of the publication "TEC/CCTE Performance Indicators 1998–99" has been placed in the Library. The publication shows the absolute performance of Merseyside TEC against a range of indicators and makes relative comparison with TECs within the North West and in England as a whole.

Equal Opportunities Legislation

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when his Department will give its considered response to the Equal Opportunities Commission's proposal for reform of equal opportunities legislation. [98680]

Ms Hodge: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg) on 14 July 1999, Official Report, column 194W.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what level of funding was received by each TEC in the north-west and north-east in the last financial year. [98515]

Mr. Wicks: Information relating to the funding of Training and Enterprise Councils (including Chambers of Commerce, Training and Enterprise) can be found in the individual or group TEC/CCTE Statutory Accounts for 1998–99 filed in the Library.

The following table shows the income reported in the 1998–99 Statutory Accounts:

Early Years Education

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice since May 1997 he has given to local education authorities on funding early years provision (a) at school and (b) at pre-school nurseries. [100008]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have provided policy and funding guidance to Local Education Authorities and early years settings through the "Requirements of Nursery Education Grant" document as well as our "Early Years Development and Childcare Partnership Planning Guidance", both of which are distributed annually. The guidance makes clear that early years provision must be provided across all sectors, be appropriate to the age of the children and that new places for three year olds must not be in reception classes.

Child Counselling

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to ensure that a child counselling service is available for all schools in England and Wales. [100187]

Jacqui Smith: The Government are already supporting a range of counselling services for pupils in schools. We are proposing to develop these further, for example, through our funding of a national mentoring network. The planned youth support service, to be introduced in 2001, will ensure that young people aged 13 to 19 have access to the specialist support they need. Provision in Wales is a matter for the National Assembly for Wales.

School Transport

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which local education authorities provide school transport (a) free of charge to all school pupils travelling a distance of over (i) three miles, for secondary pupils, and (ii) two miles, for primary pupils, and (b) free of charge as in (a) to pupils below the age of 16 years, but charge pupils when they become 16 years; and what savings on such travel costs those local education authorities that charge post-16 year olds to travel make. [100005]

Jacqui Smith: This information is not held centrally.

Education Action Zones

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for each education action zone the total amount of private sector resource included in the original bids broken down by (a) cash support, (b) equipment, (c) consultancy and (d) other. [100066]

Ms Estelle Morris: The original bids did not contain the requested degree of detail. Figures for the private sector contributions to the 25 round 1 Education Action Zones will be available as part of the annual audited accounts. The National Audit Office will lay the 25 sets of accounts before Parliament. The NAO expects to lay the first of these in December.

Swimming

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance he has given to local authorities regarding the provision of time for swimming within the national curriculum. [100229]

Jacqui Smith: The amount of time to be spent on swimming is not prescribed, but primary schools must ensure that, by age 11, pupils have been taught:

to swim unaided, competently and safely, for at least 25 metres; to develop confidence in water, and how to rest, float and adopt support positions;

a variety of means of propulsion using either arms or legs or both, and how to develop effective and efficient swimming strokes on the front and the back; the principles and skills of water safety and survival.

Swimming has remained a compulsory element of the primary curriculum between September 1998 and September 2000 (while the full programmes of study for the non core subjects have been relaxed to allow the literacy and numeracy strategies to be given priority) and will continue to be compulsory in the new National Curriculum for September 2000.

School Funding

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of school funding by local education authorities came through the (a) standard spending assessment and (b) the Standards Fund for (i) 1997–98, and (ii) 1998–99; and what are the projected figures for (A) 1999–2000, and (B) 2000–01. [100092]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table sets out the proportions of Education Total Standard Spending provided through central government grant to the Standards Fund, LEA contributions to the Standards Fund, and through SSAs (minus LEAs' matching contributions). Over this period grant from the DfEE will increase from £211 million to £1,077 million. Funding devolved to schools from the Standards Fund was £563 million in 1999–2000.

Percentage

Year	Standards Fund grant	LEA contributions	SSA minus LEA contributions
1997–98	1.2	0.6	98.2
1998–99	1.7	1.1	97.2
1999–2000	2.7	1.9	95.4
2000–01 (estimate)	4.8	2.8	92.4

Disability Rights Commission

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the proposed disability rights commission will have power to review the performance of social security appeals tribunals. [99091]

Ms Hodge: The functions of social security appeal tribunals will be transferred to the new unified appeal tribunals from 29 November 1999. The Disability Rights Commission will have the power to review the performance of these appeal tribunals in so far as it is carrying out its functions and duties under the Disability Rights Commission Act 1999, in particular, its duty to take such steps as it considers appropriate to encourage good practice in the treatment of disabled persons. For example, the Commission may, for a purpose connected with the performance of its functions, carry out research or provide advice or information, or make proposals or give other advice to any Government agency or other public authority as to the practical application of any law. The Commission may also decide to conduct a general formal investigation into the activities of the appeal tribunals for any purpose connected with the performance of its duties.

Pop Music (School Performances)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he takes to ensure children in primary schools are not subject to commercial pressure by pop music bands performing in those schools. [100346]

Ms Estelle Morris: This is a matter for individual schools to decide.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefits (Savings)

17. Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will review the limits on savings relating to benefits administered by his Department. [99079]

Mr. Bayley: The Pensions Green Paper outlined our commitment to looking at ways to better reward savers. We will bring forward our proposals later in this Parliament.

Earnings Allowances

19. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many Reduced Earnings Allowance cases are currently in the appeal system. [99081]

Angela Eagle: The Appeals Service currently hold 2,410 appeals relating to Reduced Earnings Allowance. Of these appeals 1,609 cases are held pending a decision of the European Court of Justice on lead cases.

CSA (Inland Revenue)

20. Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures he intends to take to allow information about income presently in the possession of the Inland Revenue to be shared with the Child Support Agency. [99082]

Angela Eagle: It is not right that some self-employed non-resident parents avoid their obligations to their children by refusing to provide details of their income to the Child Support Agency. That is why the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999 gives the Child Support Agency access to information held by the Inland Revenue about the earnings of self-employed non-resident parents.

Means-tested Benefits (Pensioners)

21. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the Government's proposals for reducing the numbers of pensioners reliant on means-tested benefits. [99083]

Mr. Rooker: We are pressing on with our pensions reforms. Reforming the State Earnings Related Pension Scheme through the introduction of the State Second Pension is the final stage of our pensions strategy, following stakeholder pension schemes and the Minimum Income Guarantee. This will give more help in retirement to low and moderate earners, carers and some long-term disabled people with broken work records. By 2038, everyone who has a working life of employment or caring will retire with a State Pension above the means-tested threshold.

24. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the results available from the pilot schemes to increase the rate of take-up of means-tested benefits for those past state retirement age. [99087]

Mr. Rooker: The evaluation of the pilot initiatives will be published later this year.

Housing Benefit

22. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on his proposals to reform housing benefit. [99084]

Angela Eagle: We intend to publish a Housing Green Paper in due course. This will present proposals for Housing Benefit within the overall strategy for Housing .

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to reduce scope for error and fraud in the housing benefit system; and if he will make a statement. [99635]

Mr. Rooker: We are committed to taking tough action to combat Housing Benefit fraud. We have:

reformed the anti-fraud financial incentive scheme for local authorities to ensure that they are rewarded for detecting cases of fraud; made an additional £100 million available over the next three years to encourage local authorities to adopt the Verification Framework, which, through a series of checks throughout the period of a benefit claim, will help make Housing Benefit administration more secure;

invited all local authorities to participate in the Royal Mail "do not redirect" initiative which prevents benefit claimants from using Royal Mail's postal redirection arrangements to make false claims to benefit from multiple addresses. Already, over 200 local authorities are operating this scheme and many more are preparing to implement it; made over £4 million available to install computer terminals in local authorities which provide access to the Department's benefit systems. We are now looking to extend this initiative to include exchanging information electronically between local authorities and the Department, providing further scope to prevent fraud and error occurring.

Carers

23. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he last met the Carers National Association to discuss support for carers. [R] [99086]

Mr. Bayley: I visited the headquarters of the Carers National Association on 29 June 1999 to discuss various issues of concern to carers. I was the keynote speaker at a CNA meeting in September and participated in an any questions panel with their Deputy Chief Executive last month. I value the Association's expertise and experience and I keep in touch with them.

Child Support Reform

25. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received concerning the use of a default rate to calculate maintenance payments under the new proposals for reforming child support. [99088]

Angela Eagle: The White Paper published on 1 July gave details of our plans to impose a default rate of maintenance liability. It is important that maintenance starts flowing quickly and reliably to children. Where exceptionally it is clear that there is going to be a delay in assessing maintenance, we plan to impose a default rate until the CSA has enough information to calculate the true liability.

We have not received any representations on this issue.

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to amend section 6(1) of the Child Support Act 1991. [100103]

Angela Eagle: Our plans for the reform of child support were published in the White Paper "Children's Rights and Parent's Responsibilities" (Cm 4349) on 1 July 1999. Legislation announced in the Queen's Speech in November 1999 will set out the detail of the reforms.

Section 6(1) of the 1991 Act provides that parents with care on Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance can be required to apply for child support. Our plans to change this provision were set out in Chapter 4 of the White Paper. Currently, child support arrangements cannot be made unless a parent specifically applies for maintenance. While every effort is made to ensure parents with care are not put at risk by the child support process, this rule can actually increase the risk that parents face. This is because when non-resident parents receive notification that the parent with care had applied for child support, some feel that they have been 'shopped' to the Department of Social Security.

Under the new scheme, it is planned that a separate application for maintenance will not be required for parents with care on benefit. Claiming Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance will be enough to start the child support process, unless a parent with care specifically asks us not to pursue maintenance. A parent with care who opts out will be asked to show that she has good cause for doing so. If it is clear that the child support process would cause her or her children harm or undue distress no further action will be taken. Otherwise, a benefit penalty may be imposed.

Fraud

26. Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he plans to take to reduce fraud in benefits. [99089]

Mr. Rooker: The Government published "Safeguarding Social Security", its strategy for combating fraud and reducing error on 23 March. This document is available on the Department's website.

Income Support (Pensioners)

27. Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about the Government's policy towards increasing take-up of income support by pensioners. [99090]

Mr. Rooker: Research on why pensioners do not take up their entitlement to Income Support was published on 15 October. We will present our plans for the national programme in due course.

ONE Service

28. Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the progress to date of the ONE service pilots. [99092]

Angela Eagle: The first four ONE service pilots, which were launched in June, are making good progress. We are already helping people plan ways to become independent, while ensuring that claims to benefit are dealt with promptly and accurately.

A further eight pilots are being launched today. Four will test the advantages of using call centre technology and the other four will be delivered in partnership with private and voluntary sector providers.

New Deal (Disabled People)

29. Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the progress of the pilot scheme for the New Deal for the disabled as it affects Scarborough and Whitby. [99095]

Mr. Bayley: There are 12 Personal Adviser Service pilots within the New Deal for Disabled People. The North Yorkshire pilot, which includes my hon. Friend's constituency, is one of these and was the most recent to start. It has so far helped 24 disabled people into work, including 10 in the last month. Overall the New Deal for Disabled People has helped nearly 1,500 people into jobs.

Disabled People

30. Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the effects of his reforms to the system of benefits for disabled people. [99097]

Mr. Bayley: We are modernising the welfare system to encourage work for those who can and provide security for those who cannot. Our reforms will help disabled people who want to work and ensure that extra support is given to those who need it most.

Benefits Agency Medical Service

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to review the Benefits Agency Medical Service. [99073]

Mr. Bayley: The Contract for the provision of medical services to the Benefits Agency was awarded to Sema Group from 1 September 1998 for five years. The service is managed and monitored on a daily basis by a dedicated Benefits Agency Contract Management Team. The service provided by Sema Group has not necessitated a review to be conducted and there are no plans currently for a review to be carried out.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the cost of imposing a threshold of £125 in relation to incapacity benefit. [99080]

Mr. Bayley: We estimate that setting a threshold of £125, below which no account would be taken of pension income, would increase benefit expenditure by £10 million in the first year, £45 million in the third year and £120 million after ten years.

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what motor mileage allowance rates his Department offers to (a) Ministers and (b) civil servants using their own vehicles for official business; and what has been the cost of each in each of the last five years. [98717]

Mr. Bayley: Information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Ministers, when travelling on official business, may use a private car instead of the official vehicle provided and claim mileage allowance on the same terms as civil servants in the Department.

Departmental motor mileage allowance rates

All cars (irrespective of engine capacity)	Pence per mile
Standard Rate
Up to 4,000 miles per annum	40
Over 4,000 miles per annum	22.5
Public Transport Rate	22.5

Notes:

1. These rates were first introduced on 4 April 1997.
2. Information is not kept in a format which provides a breakdown of the components in the Department's overall spend on transport for the last five years.
3. Standard rate milage can only be claimed if it an be justified that the journey taken by private vehicle is in the public interest.

Benefit Payment Methods

Valerie Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what assessment he has made of the accessibility to benefit recipients of (a) post offices and (b) banks; and if he will estimate the average distance from home in each case; [99270]

(2) what investigation the Benefits Agency has conducted of the effects of its decision to pay benefits through banks by 2003 on (a) benefit recipients, (b) banks and (c) post offices, with particular reference to smaller post offices; and what the results were; [99271]

(3) in his discussions with the banks about paying benefits through bank accounts, if the banks have agreed to (a) handle the cash necessary for all benefit recipients and (b) issue bank accounts to all benefit recipients. [99269]

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what assurances he has received from the banking industry that, if new accounts were opened solely for the purpose of receipt of social security benefits, no charges would be levied for the withdrawal of cash; [99577]

(2) what assurances he has received from the banking industry that, in the event of all benefit payments being made into bank accounts from 2003, bank accounts would be available to all benefit recipients. [99570]

Mr. Rooker: No assessment of the accessibility of post offices or banks to benefit recipients has been made. Customers can choose to access their benefits in cash at both post offices and banks. We have no plans to change this.

We have decided to move to automated credit transfer (ACT) from 2003 as a modern, more secure and efficient method of paying benefits. People are increasingly choosing ACT as their preferred method of payment. The Benefits Agency and Post Office Counters Ltd. will be working together to build on this trend to ensure that, from 2003, ACT offers an attractive choice to benefit recipients, opening up access to a wider range of banking and other financial services, while continuing to offer access to cash at post office counters. The Performance and Innovation Unit will pay particular attention to this as part of their study into the post office network which was announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 21 October.

The Department will be arranging discussions with the banking industry on issues surrounding benefit recipients, charges and other matters in due course. We envisage there will be alternative arrangements for anyone who cannot open a bank account. We will ensure procedures are in place for payment of emergency payments where cash is required on day of decision.

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to change the present system of benefits payments by requiring all recipients to receive payment by automated credit transfer. [99632]

Mr. Rooker: We are to move from the traditional paper based methods of payment to a more modern, secure and efficient way of paying benefits using the existing Automatic Credit Transfer (ACT) system to make benefit payments available through banks and the Post Office network. The new arrangements will begin in 2003 to be completed by 2005. Those benefit recipients who wish to collect their benefits in cash at post offices will continue to be able to do so.

Valerie Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the extent of fraud when benefits are paid (a) through bank accounts and (b) through post offices. [99268]

Mr. Rooker: The majority of payments through bank accounts relate to benefits such as Retirement Pension and Child Benefit. Few cases of fraud have been detected in these payments; however, the BA continues to work on identifying risks on dealing with them.

It is estimated that fraudulent losses from benefits paid through post offices were £19.4 million in respect of girocheques and £83.3 million in respect of order books.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what the results were of his trial of the use of a benefits payment card in respect of the level of benefit fraud; [99566]

(2) what assessment he has made of the extent of benefit fraud when payments are made by automated credit transfer. [99568]

Mr. Rooker: A pilot payment card exercise started in September 1996 in 12 post offices. The full trial took place from April 1997 to May 1999 in 204 post offices in the south-west and north-east areas of England. In total, 35,000 Child Benefit customers were issued with payment cards. No cases of benefit fraud were found.

Around 65 per cent. of all benefits are still paid to customers by order books and girocheques which are cashed at post offices. However, automated credit transfer (ACT) is becoming more prevalent and therefore, as the attendant risks increase, the Benefits Agency (BA) is working on identifying the nature of the fraud associated with this method of payment.

The majority of payments through bank accounts currently relate to benefits such as Retirement Pension and Child Benefit. Few cases of fraud have been detected in these payments.

Departmental Publications

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the titles of official departmental reports he is preparing with a view to publication in (a) 1999 and (b) 2000, stating in each case the planned date of publication. [99627]

Mr. Rooker: The Department fully expects to publish the following documents in 1999–2000.

Social Security Departmental Report—The Government's Expenditure Plans 2000–01 and 2001–02

The 2nd Poverty Audit Report

The Chief Adjudication Officer's final report

The War Pensions Agency Business Plan 2000–01

The War Pensions Agency Annual Report and Accounts 1999–2000

The War Pensioners Report 1999–2000

The Information Technology Services Agency Annual Report and Accounts 1999–2000

The Benefits Agency Business Plan 2000–01

The Benefits Agency Annual Report and Accounts 2000–01

The Child Support Agency Annual Report 1999–2000

The Child Support Agency Business Plan 2000–01

As yet dates for these are unconfirmed. Publication dates will be determined by the progress of work, the requirements of Parliament and the efficient management of Government. Other reports may emerge during the course of the year.

Child Poverty

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much extra cash income would need to be received by low-income households in the latest year for which figures are available in order to ensure that all children are in households with at least half average income (a) as the half average is at present and (b) as half average income would be after the extra transfers. [99395]

Angela Eagle: Our strategy for eradicating child poverty within 20 years involves tackling the main causes of poverty and social exclusion. This means helping parents find work, making work pay and ensuring that every child gets the best possible start in life as well as providing additional help for families through the tax and benefit system.

Using information drawn from the 1997–98 Households Below Average Income data set, based on the 1997–98 Family Resources Survey; it is estimated that, on average, around £46 per week per household of additional income from earnings, benefit, or other source would have needed to have been received in 1997–98 to ensure that all children were in households with at least half average income before housing costs as it was before the transfers; and around £52 per week using the after housing costs measure.

The amount of additional income needed, as half average income would be after transfers depends on the proportion of the total additional income accounted for by transfers and how those transfers are funded.

Notes:

1. Figures given in April 1999 prices are rounded to the nearest pound. All figures are estimates and are taken from the Households Below Average Income (HBAI) data sets. The current series is based on the Family Resources Survey (FRS) and is available for the years 1994–95 to 1997–98 and covers Great Britain but not Northern Ireland. The figures presented will be subject to sampling error. Figures for children are sensitive to the choice of equivalence scale.

2. Estimates assume that each household receives exactly enough extra to reach half average income.

3. The estimates assume no change in working patterns after the transfers have been made.

4. Estimates based on reported current income, which is assumed to stay constant throughout the year. Estimates include some negative incomes (after tax and housing costs). Estimates exclude the self-employed. Income data at the bottom of the income distribution and for self-employed people are known to be an imperfect indicator of living standards. Estimates of the median gap, which are less affected by very low incomes at the bottom of the income distribution than the mean, are £36 per week (after housing costs) and £32 per week (before housing costs).

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the Government's policy of eliminating child poverty requires rates of social security benefits set above the official poverty line. [99569]

Mr. Bayley: We published the document "Opportunity for all" on 21 September (Cm 4445) which sets out our strategy for tackling the causes of poverty and social exclusion. The report includes a range of indicators against which we can monitor our progress in tackling these causes and overcoming the problems faced by people living in poverty. Further details on all the indicators in the report have been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Our strategy for eradicating child poverty within 20 years involves tackling the main causes of poverty and social exclusion, providing additional help for families with children through the tax and benefit systems and ensuring that every child gets the best possible start in life.

Capital Limits (Benefits)

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the Government's review of the capital limits for (a) income support, (b) housing benefit and (c) council tax benefit will be concluded. [99445]

Angela Eagle: We announced in the Pensions Green Paper, "Partnership in Pensions", that we would examine ways to greater reward those who have made provision for their own retirement. Our proposals will be announced during this Parliament.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what circumstances a female appellant against a disability living allowance rejection is permitted to ask for an all-female tribunal to hear her case; and if he will make a statement. [99549]

Angela Eagle: The allocation of members to a tribunal is a matter for the President of the Independent Tribunal Service, His Honour Judge Michael Harris. He will write to the right hon. Member.

Industrial Injuries Benefit

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent assessment he has made of the adequacy of the medical examination given to claimants of industrial injuries benefits. [100257]

Mr. Bayley: Decisions on claims for Industrial Injuries benefits are made by decision makers, taking into account the medical evidence provided by medical advisers trained in Disability Assessment Medicine. It is for the decision maker to judge whether the medical examination report is adequate for the purpose of deciding a claim. The on-going medical quality monitoring of the medical advisers' examination reports suggests that they are maintaining the same standards as pertained when the doctors were responsible for decision making. However following the introduction of lay decision making in July this year the quality of the medical report is further enhanced by a requirement that medical advisers give clear, unambiguous and jargon-free reasons for their opinion.

Asbestos-related Disease

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to claim from asbestos manufacturers, suppliers and their insurance companies for the cost to the public purse of asbestos-related illness. [99575]

Mr. Bayley: The Industrial Injuries scheme provides benefits for employed earners disabled by asbestos-related illness arising out of and in the course of their employment. This benefit compensates people for a loss of faculty which results in disablement; it is not based on issues of 'fault'.

Under the provisions of the compensation recovery scheme, benefits paid as a result of asbestos-related illness can be recovered if the person suffering from the illness is awarded third party compensation. Benefits are recovered from the compensator from the date of claim to benefit in respect of the disease, subject to a five year maximum. The compensator may reduce the compensation payment to take account of this liability, but only where compensation and benefits are paid for the same need. Compensation for pain and suffering cannot be reduced.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations have been made to him about the adequacy of the diagnosis procedures for asbestos-related diseases for qualifying for social security benefits; and if he will make a statement. [99572]

Mr. Bayley: Representations have been received about individual claimants, which are of course confidential. We are not aware of any representations specifically about the adequacy of diagnostic procedures for these diseases.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what training is undergone by doctors serving his Department to enable them to distinguish between diseases having their origin in smoking and those having their origin in asbestos. [99574]

Mr. Bayley: Medical Services doctors receive a five day training course instructing them how to apply their medical knowledge to the legislative criteria. It includes considering the raw materials, radiological and pathological findings and clinical presentation. Each doctor is then assigned to a more experienced colleague who acts as a supervisory mentor until he or she is assessed as capable of working alone. Work is then audited regularly with quality assured processes to assess any need for further training, and the training is kept under constant review. Forms used to record medical assessments for respiratory prescribed diseases require the doctor to record details of the claimant's smoking habits.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if it is his policy that all those claiming a social security benefit on the grounds of suffering from an asbestos-related disease should have undergone a CT scan to improve diagnosis. [99573]

Mr. Bayley: It is not our policy that such Social Security benefit claimants should have undergone a CT scan.

CT scans involve considerable exposure to ionising radiation. It would be incompatible with EU and UK legislation on reducing radiation exposure to set any such requirement when it is possible to award benefit on the basis of other evidence of an acceptable nature, such as ordinary chest radiographs. It is important to note that the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council (which advises the Secretary of State on this benefit) recommended in 1996 that awards for bilateral diffuse pleural thickening should be based upon the chest radiograph rather than a CT scan.

War Pensions

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent discussions Ministers or his officials have held with the Ministry of Defence in respect of war pensions for widows; what was the outcome; and if he will make a statement. [100314]

Mr. Bayley: Officials of both Departments have been fully involved in the joint review of compensation for members of the Armed Forces who are disabled because of or whose death is due to service. Ministers and officials of both Departments also discussed the issues raised by the recent debates on war widows' pensions during the passage of the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act.

Widow's Benefit

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what effect the removal of widow's benefit will have on the widow's eligibility for the basic state pension. [99075]

Mr. Rooker: We have ensured that, when the new Bereavement Benefits scheme is introduced, a widow on reaching pension age, who has not remarried, will receive Retirement Pension as if she had been receiving Widow's Pension up to pension age under the current scheme. This provision will, of course, like the Bereavement Benefits themselves be available equally to widows and widowers.

Winter Fuel Allowance

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the arrangements for the payment of the winter fuel allowance. [99098]

Mr. Rooker: For the third winter running, Winter Fuel Payments are being made to eligible pensioners. For the first time, payments this year will be made before Christmas. The issue of payments began on 8 November and should be completed by 3 December.

The payment has been increased to £100 for eligible pensioner households from this winter. Also, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security announced that the payments will be made every year from now on.

Pensioners (Benefits)

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of pensioners entitled to receive the minimum income guarantee (a) in the current year and (b) in each of the next five years, assuming it is uprated by earnings each year. [99398]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Estimates of the average number of pensioners entitled to receive the minimum income guarantee in each year, 1999–2000 to 2001–02

Thousand

Income Support cases aged over 60	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02
Pensioner cases (excluding RA/RCNH)	1,390	1,380	1,350
Pensioner cases plus partners (excluding RA/RCNH)	1,640	1,620	1,580
Residential Allowance cases	170	180	180
RC/NH cases	50	40	30

Notes:

1. The partners of pensioner cases (excluding Residential Allowance (RA) and Residential Care and Nursing Home (RCNH) cases) may be under 60, but the majority will be over 60.

2. The figures are consistent with expenditure estimates published in the November 1999 Pre Budget Report for the years 1998–99 to 2001–02.

3. There are no published estimates for later years.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners are entitled to means-tested benefit in 1999; and how many will be so entitled after the implementation of the increases in the basic state pension and the minimum income guarantee for pensions announced in his up-rating statement, when broken down between the different benefits. [99448]

Mr. Rooker: As at May 1998, the latest date for which information on all means-tested benefits is available, the estimated number of pensioners (aged 60 or over) who were entitled to means-tested benefit was 3.08 million. We estimate that a further 25,000 pensioners will become entitled to the minimum income guarantee from next April because of its link with earnings growth. 6,000 pensioners will become entitled to Housing Benefit and 9,000 will become entitled to Council Tax Benefit for the same reason.

Notes:

1. In this analysis, pensioners are defined as where the claimant or partner is aged 60 or over.

2. Means-tested benefits include Disability Working Allowance, Family Credit, Income Support, Jobseeker's Allowance (Income Based), Council Tax Benefit and Housing.

3. Numbers refer to benefit units, which may be a single person or a couple.

4. Figures do not include second adult rebates.

5. Numbers are rounded to the nearest ten thousand.

WALES

Special Advisers

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of special advisers working for the Secretary of State for Wales in each year from 1992–93. [100097]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Figures are not available for the financial year 1992–93. From that year they are as follows:

Date	Number
1993–94	1
1994–95	1
1995–96	1
1996–97	1
1997–98	2
1998–99	1
1999
1 April to 30 June	3
1 July to 29 November	1

From the start of December this year I will employ two special advisers.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Lord Chancellor (Tenure of Office) (Amendment) Bill

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what discussions (a) he and (b) his officials have had since 27 March 1998 concerning the Lord Chancellor (Tenure of Office) (Amendment) Bill [Lords] 1998; if he will make a statement on the statutory provisions concerning disbarment from holding the position of Lord Chancellor as it affects (i) Jews, (ii) Muslims, (iii) Buddhists and (iv) members of other non-Christian religions; and what steps he proposes to ensure there is no religious requirement in (a) holding the office of Lord Chancellor and (b) carrying out the functions of Lord Chancellor. [99810]

Jane Kennedy [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The Lord Chancellor and his officials have held preliminary discussions with the promoter of the Lord Chancellor (Tenure of Office) (Amendment) Bill, the noble Lord Alderdice, and his advisers. The purpose of the discussions is to consider how legislation could provide for alternative arrangements to be made in the event of a Lord Chancellor considering that it was not proper for him or her personally to exercise ecclesiastical functions attached to the office of Lord Chancellor. The discussion follows proposals made during the debates on the Bill which Lord Alderdice introduced last year.

I am not aware of any extant statutory provisions which would disbar any person from holding the office of Lord Chancellor on the ground of his or her religious persuasion.

The Government do not propose to take any steps to change any existing law which governs the holding of the office of Lord Chancellor, or the carrying out of the functions of that office. Traditionally, it has not been regarded as appropriate for the Government to introduce legislation intended to facilitate the holding or performance of such office by individuals of particular religious persuasions.

Magistrates Courts (Legal Aid)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what would have been the hourly rate for legal aid work in magistrates courts had fees been raised annually in line with inflation, detailed by each year, in each of the last five years. [100470]

Mr. Lock: The majority of magistrates court criminal cases are paid for by a standard fee. Hourly rates are paid on non standard cases. Of cases receiving criminal legal aid, 9 per cent. are currently paid by non standard fees and account for 35 per cent. of expenditure. Although hourly rates have not increased during the period in question, the average amount paid in a case has increased from £1,554 to £1,649. Had the hourly rates increased in line with inflation, the rates would be as detailed.

Judicial Appointments

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department of the judicial vacancies filled since May 1997 in the (a) House of Lords, (b) Court of Appeal, (c) High Court and (d) Circuit Bench, how many were filled by (i) women, (ii) people from ethnic minorities and (iii) solicitors. [100417]

Mr. Lock: The available information is as follows:

The figures for the number of appointments made since May 1997 and the further breakdown by gender, ethnic background and professional background are detailed in the table.

Full-time appointments made since May 1997, classified by gender, ethnic and professional background

Post	Appointments made	Number of females	Number of ethnic minority background	Solicitors
House of Lords	4	0	0	0
Court of Appeal	11	1	0	0
Circuit Bench	71	12	1	4

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many vacancies for judicial appointments there were in the (a) House of Lords, (b) Court of Appeal and (c) High Court in each of the last three years. [100418]

Mr. Lock: From the information available the number of vacancies for judicial appointments in the House of Lords, Court of Appeal and the High Court for the past three years is as follows:

	House of Lords	Court of Appeal	High Court
1996	2	2(3)	9
1997	2	5	7
1998	2	2	5(2)

Note:
The figures in brackets represent additional appointments. In 1996 there were three additional appointments to the Court of Appeal. In 1998 there were two additional appointments to the High Court and in 1999 there was one additional appointment to the High Court. These appointments were additional in that they did not arise from vacancies caused by promotion or retirement.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when Sir Leonard Peach was commissioned to conduct his inquiry into the procedures for appointing judges and QCs; by what date he was asked to report; and when the Lord Chancellor expects to receive the report. [100446]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor announced on 27 July 1999 that he had appointed Sir Leonard Peach to provide a report on the operation of the appointments procedures. At that time Sir Leonard expected to report during the last quarter of the year. The Lord Chancellor expects to receive the report soon and for it to be published before Christmas.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to advertise for candidates for the eight new vacancies on the High Court Bench approved on 23 November. [100414]

Mr. Lock: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor does not advertise vacancies on the High Court Bench on an individual basis. However, the Lord Chancellor has placed advertisements indicating that he welcomes applications from practitioners who wish to put themselves forward for appointment to the High Court Bench and continues to welcome such applications.

In the light of the statutory instrument passed in the House of Commons on 23 November, my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor is considering if it is appropriate to place further advertisements in order to encourage suitably qualified and experienced Barristers and Solicitors to put themselves forward for appointment to the High Court.

"Paths to Justice"

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the research report, "Paths to Justice", published by the Nuffield Foundation, in respect of public confidence in the judiciary. [100445]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor and I are both very grateful to Professor Genn for undertaking the research in "Paths to Justice". The report reveals that the perception of judges is inconsistent with the true facts, as evidenced by the high level of satisfaction with judges which most court users report—a level of satisfaction which is remarkable, considering that in every court case there has to be a winner and a loser, and therefore a disappointed party. It is important that deserved public confidence in the judiciary is maintained.

Magistrates Courts (Costs)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the average cost per day of a trial in a Magistrates Court (a) at which a stipendiary magistrate presides and (b) before lay justices. [100315]

Jane Kennedy: The information requested is not yet available. The Government have commissioned research to assess the relative costs, effectiveness and other benefits/disadvantages of Stipendiary and lay magistrates, taking into account all related costs including those of other agencies.

HEALTH

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what motor mileage allowance rates his Department offers to (a) Ministers and (b) civil servants using their own vehicles for official business; and what has been the cost of each in each of the last five years. [98696]

Yvette Cooper: In the Department the current motor mileage allowance rates for Ministers and civil servants who use their own vehicles are 40 pence per mile for the first 4,000 miles in a financial year and 22.5 pence per mile for mileage in excess of 4,000 miles.

Ministers, when travelling on official business, may use a private car instead of an official car, and claim mileage allowance in the same circumstances and on the same terms as civil servants in the Department.

The cost of motor mileage allowance payments is available for each of the last three years only:

1998–99: £816,000

of which the following was paid to Ministers:

1996–97: £69

1998–99: £0

Alder Hey Children's Hospital

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will investigate claims that children's organs were removed following their deaths without informed parental consent, and retained by medical staff at Alder Hey Children's Hospital on Merseyside. [99402]

Mr. Denham: In October the former Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) announced he would be launching an investigation into the retention of organs, following inquiries by Alder Hey Hospital which had revealed that in a number of cases, other organs as well as hearts were retained from children who underwent post mortems. He asked the Chief Medical Officer to conduct an investigation to look into what happened not just at Alder Hey Hospital, but in the country generally and its implications for the National Health Service as a whole. This investigation is under way.

Nutrition

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what responsibility the Food Standards Agency will have for the health aspects of nutrition. [99282]

Yvette Cooper: The division of responsibilities for nutrition between the Food Standards Agency and Health departments is set out in chapter 5 of the White Paper "The Food Standards Agency: A Force for Change", copies of which are available in the Library.

The White paper states:

The Government propose that the agency will:

be responsible for monitoring and surveillance of the nutrient content of food and the nutrient content of the diet, provide authoritative factual information about the nutrient content of individual foods and advice on the diet as a whole, secure expert scientific advice on the relationship between diet, nutritional status and health to support the definition of a healthy diet and to inform policy from the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food and Nutrition Policy (COMA)[1], provide the definition of a balanced diet, based on COMA's[1] scientific advice, for subsequent use in health education material produced by other bodies, where appropriate, propose legislation relating to nutritional aspects of food, including labelling and claims, dietary supplements sold as food, fortified foods and functional foods, provide practical guidance in relation to nutritional aspects of the food chain, including production and catering, commission food and diet research appropriate to the functions of the agency, represent the United Kingdom in international negotiations on issues relating to nutritional aspects of food, formulate policy and provide advice to Ministers on these issues.

The agency will share with Health departments responsibility for:

providing the joint secretariat to the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food and Nutrition Policy (COMA)[1]. (COMA[1] will advise Health departments and the agency), surveillance of the nutritional status of people, defining the health education message on nutritional issues, taking account of both food and wider health issues, policy formulation and advice to Ministers on these issues, for example in relation to Saving Lives: Our Healthier Nation, and public health aspects of food fortification.

Health departments will retain responsibility for:

wider public health policy issues including conditions (such as cardiovascular disease, cancer, osteoporosis or obesity) where nutritional status is one of a number of risk factors, consideration of vulnerable groups and inequalities issues, health education on wider behavioural issues which may include but go beyond nutrition (such as smoking, drinking, physical activity), all links with the NHS and health professionals, breastfeeding promotion in the NHS, clinical nutrition and dietetics including hospital catering and nutritional therapy, dietary supplements which are controlled by the Medicines Act (through the Medicines Control Agency), health surveillance of the population, and international negotiations on health matters.

[1] The Scientific Advisory Committee on Nutrition (SACN) will be succeeding the current advisory Committee on Medical Aspects of Food and Nutrition Policy (COMA).

Mental Incapacity Bill

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, in the proposed Mental Incapacity Bill for England and Wales, nutrition and hydration by artificial means will be defined as medication. [99267]

Yvette Cooper: As outlined in my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor's Policy Statement: "Making Decisions—The Government's proposals for making decisions on behalf of mentally incapacitated adults", we have no plans to enshrine such a definition in statute law.

ME/CFS

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on his policy on the treatment of ME/CFS in young people and the principle of parental consent to their removal from their home for such treatment; [99453]

(2) if he will make a statement on the provision of specific treatment centres for ME/CFS and on the system of inspection for the centres. [99452]

Mr. Denham: The causes of chronic fatigue syndrome/myalgic encephalomyelitis are not fully understood, nor is there a generally agreed method of treatment. Treatment to relieve the wide variety of symptoms which patients can experience is, therefore, a matter for individual doctors to decide in consultation with their patients.

The National Health Service provides a considerable number of services to which people suffering from CFS/ME have access, and such patients are seen within a wide range of hospital specialities. The CFS/ME Working Group will produce guidance aimed at improving the quality of this care and treatment.

The Children's Group of the CFS/ME Working Group, which has been established to review management and practice in the field of CFS/ME with the aim of providing best practice guidance for professionals, patients and carers to improve the quality of care and treatment for people with CFS/ME, will, as the name suggests, focus on issues specific to children. This will include educational and social services issues as well as child specific research. It is also considering reviewing practice in paediatric clinics.

Consent of a young person who has reached the age of 16 to their own medical or surgical treatment is sufficient unless they are not competent to give valid consent, where the consent of a person with parental responsibility should be sought. Such power only extends until the person is 18. The refusal of treatment by a young person competent to give consent may be overridden by consent from a person with parental responsibility or the Courts, provided the treatment is in the young person's best interest. Where the young person is not competent to give consent and a person with parental responsibility refuses consent, the Courts can over-rule that refusal if to do so would be in the child's best interest.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what experiments are taking place on young patients suffering from ME/CFS; and if he will make a statement. [99450]

Mr. Denham: We are not aware of any experiments taking place on young patients with chronic fatigue syndrome/myalgic encephalomyelitis.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department is (a) undertaking and (b) funding into the causes of ME/CFS; and what assessment he has made of the prospects for the success of such research. [99449]

Mr. Denham: The Government fund health and medical research in a number of ways:

The Department funds research and development to support its work on policy development and evaluation in health and social care. The Department also manages the National Health Service research and development levy which is used to support research and development of relevance to the National Health Service in hospitals, general practice and other health care settings, and to fund the NHS research and development programme. In addition, the Medical Research Council (MRC)—which receives most of its income via grant-in-aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—funds medical research as part of the Government's funding of the science and engineering base.

The MRC has provided support for a Small Project Grant in the area of Chronic Fatigue Syndrome, undertaken by Dr. R. K. Morriss at the University of Manchester, entitled "The role of noradrenaline in the neuropsychological pathogenesis on the chronic fatigue syndrome". The total amount awarded was £37,241 and the study was concluded this year.

The NHS research and development programme is supporting the following projects:

Chronic fatigue syndrome after acute Q fever: a follow-up study of the 1989 outbreak cohort—Birmingham Heartlands Hospital, Birmingham

Should general practitioners manage chronic fatigue syndrome?—University of Hull

Family focused cognitive behavioural therapy for adolescents with chronic fatigue syndrome—King's College School of Medicine, London

Project details of work directly funded by the Department or supported through the NHS R&D levy can be found on the National Research Register (NRR).

Chelation Therapy

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those health authorities that finance the use of chelation therapy for patients. [99232]

Yvette Cooper: Information is not held centrally on the funding of this therapy by health authorities. Chelation therapy may be used in the treatment of a variety of diseases and is available in various forms.

Embryos (Disposal)

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the current arrangements for disposing of embryos. [99265]

Yvette Cooper: Section 17 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority Act 1990 provides that the person responsible in a licensed clinic must ensure that proper arrangements are made for the disposal of gametes or embryos that have been allowed to perish.

In its Code of Practice the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority provides that, where an embryo is no longer to be kept for treatment the centre should decide how it is allowed to perish and what is to happen to the perished material. The authority requires the procedure to be sensitively devised and described, and that it should be communicated to the people for whom the embryo was being stored if they so wish.

Carisolv Gel

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to make Carisolv gel available to NHS dental patients; and if he will make a statement. [99389]

Mr. Denham: Carisolv gel is available for use by dentists throughout the European Union and this includes its availability to National Health Service dental patients.

Pertussis Whole Cell Vaccine

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the large scale vaccine trials of the pertussis whole cell vaccine were carried out in Sweden and Germany; and if he will place a copy of the report of the trials in the Library. [99447]

Yvette Cooper: Large-scale clinical trials of acellular pertussis vaccines that include whole cell pertussis vaccines as a comparison group were conducted in Sweden between 1992 and 1996 and in Germany between 1991 and 1995. Findings from these clinical trials were published and the following references have been placed in the Library:

Cervical Screening

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will implement the recommendations of the NHS Health Technology report entitled "A Systematic Review of the Role of HPV Testing in the Cervical Screening Programme". [99750]

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment his Department has made of the NHS Health Technology report, "A Systematic Review of the Role of HPV Testing in the Cervical Screening Programme". [99720]

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce testing for the human papilloma virus for the triage of borderline smears, as recommended by the NHS Health Technology report entitled "A Systematic Review of the Role of HPV Testing in the Cervical Screening Programme". [100185]

Yvette Cooper: An outline proposal on pilot studies using human papilloma viruses testing as triage for mild and borderline cervical smears, as recommended in the National Health Service Health Technology Assessment report, will be discussed at the National Screening Committee's meeting in Belfast on 8 December. The National Screening Committee will advise Ministers in light of these discussions.

ChildLine

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to make additional funding available to ChildLine; and if he will make a statement. [99581]

Mr. Hutton: We greatly value the service that ChildLine provides to children in trouble and in danger. We have committed substantial support to the core operation of ChildLine through a grant under Section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968, totalling £542,500 over the three financial years 1999/2000–2001/02. ChildLine have also been awarded a Section 64 Grant of £150,000 over the three financial years 1999/2000–2001/02 for their special helpline for children in care.

Epilepsy

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average expenditure is per patient on the treatment of epilepsy. [99764]

Mr. Hutton: The information is not available in the format requested. However, information is available on the cost of epilepsy drugs.

The number of prescription items and the net ingredient cost for drugs used for the treatment of epilepsy and dispensed in the community in England in 1998 (the latest date that this information is available) was 6.1 million and £74.9 million respectively. The net ingredient cost is the basic cost of a drug and does not take account of discounts, dispensing costs, fees or prescription charges income.

Health Authority Funding

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the health authorities in England, showing in each case (a) the amount of money to which they would be entitled in 1999–2000 if every health authority were paid at capitation, (b) the actual amount allocated in 1999–2000, (c) the amount of money by which each authority is either above or below capitation, and (d) the percentage of each health authority's allocation which that capitation underpayment or overpayment represents, ranked by the percentage figures in (d). [99803]

Mr. Denham: The table shows, for 1999–2000, for each health authority: in column A, the amount to which they would be entitled if every health authority were paid at capitation, ie their weighted capitation target; in column B, the actual amount allocated; in column C, the amount by which each authority is above or below capitation, ie their distance from target; and in column D, the percentage distance from target.

[1] Since the announcement of allocations for 1999–2000, North West Anglia Health Authority, East Norfolk Health Authority and Cambridge and Huntingdon Health Authority have merged into two new health authorities, Norfolk Health Authority and Cambridgeshire Health Authority. It is not possible to provide data on a comparable basis for the new health authorities.

Long-term Care

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to respond to the recommendations contained in the Royal Commission report on long-term care for the elderly; and if he will make a statement. [99723]

Mr. Hutton: We are carefully considering the Royal Commission's proposals, the divergences of view within the Royal Commission and the comments that have been made by various organisations and individuals. We will make an announcement in due course.

Mental Health Services

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the total spending on mental health services in (a) 1999 and (b) 1997 for each health authority area. [99887]

Mr. Hutton: Over £2,648 million in 1996–97 and over £2,925 million in 1998–99 was spent purchasing secondary healthcare on mental illness in England.

The table shows the breakdown for each health authority area.

Primary Care

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on progress made on the setting up of (a) Primary Care Groups and (b) primary care trusts. [99869]

Mr. Denham: 481 Primary Care Groups have been successfully established. 83 per cent. have opted to take on a substantial commissioning role and are operating at level 2. PCGs have taken responsibility for £11 billion.

Hospital Bed Use

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects the inquiry into the use of hospital beds to report. [99992]

Mr. Denham: The National Beds Inquiry is nearing completion. Its findings will be published in due course.

Bicester Community Hospital

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of Bicester Community Hospital. [100283]

Mr. Denham: As part of the modernisation of community services across Oxfordshire, a brand new 30 bed community hospital is to be built at Bicester. The new hospital will replace the current hospital with a much needed facility, with an additional 18 beds to meet the health care needs of the local community.

Waiting Times (West Sussex)

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people had been waiting for 12 weeks or more for a first appointment with a consultant in the West Sussex Health Authority Area on (a) 1 April and (b) 1 October. [100480]

Mr. Denham: The number of people waiting for 13 weeks or more for outpatient appointments in the West Sussex Health Authority area is contained in the table.

Patients waiting for 13 weeks or more for first outpatient appointment

Age Concern

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he will take to prevent ageism in the NHS, with particular reference to the recent representations made by Age Concern. [100198]

Mr. Hutton: We welcome the recent Age Concern report which highlights this important issue.

Discrimination of any kind, whether it is on the basis of age, race or gender, is completely unacceptable in the National Health Service. Treatment should rest entirely on clinical need. We are determined to provide older people with care that meets their needs—fast, efficient and sensitive. The provision of first class care on the NHS is a priority for this Government. That is why we are developing the National Service Framework (NSF) for Older People. This, for the first time, will set national standards for the care of older people, driving up the quality and reducing the variations of that care. The NSF will be published next year. The development of the NSF has involved many groups, including the patients and carers themselves. However, until the NSF is in place, we will continue to improve and modernise the services we provide. Thus last year we extended the annual immunisation programme for influenza to ensure that everyone aged 75 and over can have the 'flu vaccine free of charge. Over the next three years we will be expanding cataract services to increase the number of cataract operations from 170,000 a year currently to 250,000 a year—this will benefit thousands of older people. From 1 April this year all people aged 60 and over are entitled to free eye tests regardless of income or health status.

Child Protection

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to bring into force each of the provisions in the Protection of Children Act 1999; and if he will make a statement. [100300]

Mr. Hutton: As I confirmed during the passage of this Act, it is the Government's firm intention to implement the provisions of the Protection of Children Act as soon as possible.

We will be consulting widely on draft regulations in the new year, and will clarify the dates for implementation at that stage.

Postnatal Depression

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to ensure that all antenatal clinics have in place a procedure for identifying mothers at risk of postnatal depression. [100098]

Yvette Cooper: "The Report on Confidential Enquiries into Maternal Deaths in the United Kingdom 1994–1996" recommended that the early identification of women at risk of postnatal mental illness or self harm should become part of routine practice. At the maternity booking stage, brief details should be taken about the presence or history of maternal psychiatric disorder, alcohol or substance abuse, severe social problems and previous self harm. Mechanisms should be in place to ensure effective psychiatric liaison as well as to provide appropriate support. The report's recommendations were widely circulated to health professionals in the National Health Service in November 1998.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list, by region, the number of psychiatric beds available in mother and baby units for the treatment of women suffering from postnatal depression; [100099]

(2) how many women were admitted to psychiatric hospitals and units as a result of postnatal depression by region, for each of the past five years: what proportion of those women were treated in (a) mother and baby units and (b) in general psychiatric wards. [100100]

Yvette Cooper: The information is not collected centrally in the form requested. However, there were an estimated 613 finished consultant episodes recorded with a primary diagnoses of puerperium (post natal depression occurring within six weeks of delivery) during 1996–97, the latest year for which information is available. A patient may, of course, have more than one episode of treatment during a year.

Children in Care

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he intends to take to improve the well-being of children in care. [99064]

Mr. Hutton: A major programme of action to improve services for children in the public care has been set out in the Government's Response to the Children's Safeguards Review: the launch of the three-year "Quality Protects" programme; and in the White Paper "Modernising Social Services". The "Quality Protects" programme set new national objectives to transform the management and delivery of children's social services. A special grant of £375 million over three years has been made available to support the changes.

The Government also believe that many young people living in and leaving care have not been getting a fair deal. The Children (Leaving Care) Bill, introduced in the House of Lords on 18 November, will change the system to give these young people the support they need and deserve in preparing for and leaving care.

TREASURY

South Korea

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to prevent IMF support for South Korea being used to subsidise South Korean shipyards; and if he will make a statement. [99844]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my predecessor as Economic Secretary gave him on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 807W. There is no evidence that IMF support has been used to subsidise the South Korean shipbuilding industry, and this year South Korea has made net repayments to the IMF.

The UK Government strongly support Korea's IMF programme, the benefits of which are now being felt as that country recovers from financial crisis. However, the Government fully acknowledge the necessity to monitor that the terms and conditions of the programme continue to be fully respected. This point was underlined by the Industry Council on 9 November in the context of a discussion of the European Commission's first monitoring report on the situation in the world shipbuilding market.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of the introduction of the national minimum wage on inflation. [99633]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Monetary Policy Committee is charged with setting interest rates to ensure the Government's inflation target of 2.5 per cent. is met, and hence the introduction of a National Minimum Wage is not expected to have any material effect on inflation.

Duty Free Sales

Mr. Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of the abolition of duty free sales within the countries of the European Union on employment in the UK. [99607]

Mr. Timms: In introducing the legislative framework for the duty free successor regime, the Government promised a post-implementation review after six months. Early next year we will carry out a properly structured evaluation exercise to assess the impact on UK industry.

Income Drawdown and Annuities

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the Inland Revenue to conclude its examination of income drawdown and annuities. [100022]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Inland Revenue has been conducting a review of the operation of income drawdown in personal pension schemes and an announcement will be made in due course if it is decided that any changes are required.

Incomes (North Staffordshire)

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the average gross weekly income was in (a) the North Staffordshire travel-to-work area and (b) Stoke-on-Trent for the last year for which data are available. [99878]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. George Stevenson, dated 29 November 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on average gross weekly income for the North Staffordshire travel-to-work area (TTWA) and Stoke-on-Trent.

Estimates of average gross income data for North Staffordshire TTWA and for Stoke-on-Trent, as discrete areas, are not available. The lowest regional breakdown of household income data published by the ONS is for annual gross household income per head by county. The latest published figures are for 1995 and were published in Table 9 of the article Regional Accounts 1995: part 2 in Economic Trends no. 535, June 1998. This publication is available in the House of Commons Library. Sub-regional estimates of household income in the future will be based on different geographies, owing largely to the reorganisation of local government throughout Great Britain. The first estimates on this basis will be published in the first half of 2000, and will include data for more recent years.

The county figures available relate to the income of the household sector, as defined for the purposes of national and regional accounts. In addition to private households, this includes charities, voluntary and other non-profit organisations, and quasi-corporations.

The published figures are normally presented in terms of total annual household income per head of population. The 1995 average household income per head estimate for the county of Staffordshire, converted to a weekly average, was £186.

Student Grants

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the payment of national insurance contributions within the student grant system. [100038]

Dawn Primarolo: There is no liability for National Insurance contributions in respect of student grants. I am not aware that any representations have been received on this issue.

Transport (Revenue)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the fuel duty increases in table B9 of the Pre-Budget report make provision for hypothecated revenue for transport. [100498]

Mr. Timms: No. I refer the hon. Member to paragraph B17 of the Pre-Budget Report which explains the assumptions behind table B9.

Air Passenger Duty

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer of exempting the Highlands and Islands of Scotland from air passenger duty. [100305]

Mr. Timms: Customs' preliminary estimate of the cost of an exemption for flights from airports in the Scottish Highlands and Islands is under 5 million, but the precise figure would depend on the exact scope of any exemption. Customs are consulting on this and a final decision will be announced in the Budget.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer of exempting Inverness from air passenger duty. [100306]

Mr. Timms: It is not possible to break down a figure for Inverness with any assurance at this stage. Fuller data will be compiled as part of the consultation announced in the Pre-Budget Report.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what discussions he has had with the European Commission on exempting the Highlands and Islands of Scotland from air passenger duty; [100309]

(2) what discussions he has had with the European Commission on exempting the Highlands and Islands of Scotland from air passenger duty. [100308]

Mr. Timms: The European Commission has been informed that the Government are consulting on introducing an exemption for flights from the Scottish Highlands and Islands, as part of a package of measures to amend air passenger duty announced in the Pre-Budget Report.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Estate

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee (1) if he will estimate construction expenditure on the Parliamentary Estate in each of the past five years; [100032]

(2) how much the refurbishment of the Parliamentary Estate has cost in each of the past five years; [100034]

(3) if he will estimate expenditure on Portcullis House (a) during the next year and (b) before the next comprehensive spending review; [100025]

(4) if he will provide a breakdown of expenditure on Portcullis House; [100024]

(5) if he will list the intended expenditure on the refurbishment of the Parliamentary Estate (a) during the next year and (b) before the next comprehensive spending review. [100026]

Sir Sydney Chapman: These are matters for the Director of Parliamentary Works; I have asked him to reply to the hon. Member.

PRIME MINISTER

EU Fundamental Rights Charter

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he has appointed a representative to serve on the body to draft a European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights, as agreed at the European Council in Tampere; and what guidance he plans to issue to that person. [99444]

The Prime Minister: Lord Goldsmith will be my representative on the Charter drafting body. The Government's view is that the charter should make the fundamental rights which already exist, and which are applicable at Union level, more visible to the Union's citizens. It should take the form of a political statement, rather than a legal text to be incorporated into the Treaties.

Kosovo

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had with (a) France and (b) Russia on the operations of KFOR designed to protect the remaining Serb populations in Kosovo. [99436]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 24 November 1999]: NATO Allies and Russia discuss all aspects of KFOR operations on a regular basis and Kosovo was discussed at the Ministerial Anglo/French Summit on 25 November.

Protection of the Kosovo Serbs and other minorities is one of KFOR's top priorities, with around half of KFOR manpower currently involved in minority protection duties. Security for all communities remains our central objective.

DEFENCE

Mental Incapacitants

Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the review of the information available on the chemical warfare mental incapacitants known as Agent 15. [100910]

Mr. Spellar: In accordance with the undertakings given by the then Secretary of State for Defence on 9 February 1998 and by my predecessor on 22 April 1998, a review of the research on glycollates (of which Agent 15 is an example) and related compounds carried out at CBD Porton Down has been completed. A copy of the unclassified summary of this review has been placed in the Library of the House. The report explains that Agent 15 has been used in animal studies at Porton Down, but not in any work involving humans. Research on related compounds (glycollates and benzilates) involving human volunteers found that all the observed effects of the compounds were resolved within four days.

A more extensive research programme involving human volunteers was undertaken at the time of the CBD research in the United States. Follow-up studies in 1980 led to the conclusion that subjects exposed to anticholinergic agents (glycollates) reported no differences in their current health status compared to control groups. However, the methods and the group sizes used were such that only large effects were likely to be uncovered.

There is no evidence that UK troops were exposed to Agent 15, nor that Iraq used Agent 15. There are therefore no plans for further research into this agent at this time.

Project Capital

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are employed on Project Capital. [100286]

Mr. Spellar: Following roll-out and proving of the Departmental Financial Management System, Project Capital was formally closed in October 1999. Accounting, in-year management and Planning and budgeting—using the Capital systems—are now largely integrated with teams working on cash management systems.

Clyde Base

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made as a result of the management review of the Clyde Base. [100287]

Mr. Spellar: Following a scoping study at the Clyde Base in 1997, Ministers decided to retain work in-house through a joint Management/Trades Union proposal to establish Neptune Services Direct, which is successfully delivering hotel and related services increasingly efficiently. In addition, a rationalisation programme was set in hand to optimise the use of resources and skills in the Engineering and Facilities Support departments.

These changes are still being implemented but, in producing a more effective and efficient organisation, some 161 service and 182 MOD civilian posts have been lost. Through a policy of employing casual staff and fixed term appointees, the civilianisation of some service posts, and the fact that a number of posts had been held vacant, the changes are being achieved without redundancies.

Departmental Land

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to ensure that his Department's land is not used by the US Government for purposes which breach international treaties signed by that Government. [99884]

Mr. Spellar: Her Majesty's Government retains legal possession of and control over all sites made available for use by the United States Visiting Forces. The interpretation of an international treaty is a matter for the parties to that treaty.

Kosovo

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what tests were applied to clear each target engaged by British forces according to international law during the Kosovo conflict from March to June. [98563]

Mr. Hoon: UK air operations were conducted in strict compliance with the requirements of international law, including the UK's obligations under international humanitarian law, and targeting decisions took the legal considerations fully into account.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total replacement value of the ordnance expended by British forces during the Kosovo crisis to the end of August. [98566]

Mr. Hoon: The indicative cost of ordnance consumed during the period of offensive operations in Kosovo is some £45 million. This is an estimate, based on a set of average historical prices for the ordnance in question, and does not represent actual expenditure. Final decisions on the replenishment of ordnance consumed during the campaign have yet to be taken.

Chinook HC2

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date DRA Boscombe Down carried out electron-magnetic interference testing during the airworthiness proving trials on Chinook HC2; and if recommendations were made as a result of that testing. [100144]

Mr. Spellar: A full electron-magnetic interference assessment of the Chinook Mk2 was completed by Boscombe Down in January 1994. Recommendations were made concerning the introduction and use in flight of UHF on-board transmitters and walk-on equipment, and High Intensity Radio Transmission Avoidance Areas (HIRTA) within the UK.

AWE Aldermaston

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many full-time equivalent MOD police officers were employed at AWE Aldermaston in each month from November 1998 to November 1999. [100682]

Mr. Spellar: I am withholding this information in accordance with exemption 1 (a) (national security) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what guidance he has issued to the MOD police in respect of overtime worked by officers at AWE Aldermaston. [100686]

Mr. Spellar: No specific guidance has been issued to the MOD police at AWE Aldermaston in respect of overtime. It is force policy to minimise the use of overtime commensurate with meeting the operational requirement. All overtime working is voluntary.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the average number of days sickness leave taken among MOD police officers at AWE Aldermaston in each month from November 1998 to November 1999. [100685]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is not collected in days, but rather in hours. The table records the average number of hours of sickness, per officer, per month at AWE Aldermaston.

Month	Average number of sickness hours, per officer, per day
November 1998	10.2
December 1998	9.6
January 1999	13.6
February 1999	10.4
March 1999	11.5
April 1999	10.4
May 1999	11.9
June 1999	12.5
July 1999	10.0
August 1999	10.5
September 1999	9.1
October 1999	11.6

Note:
The figures for November 1999 are not available at this time

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the average amount of overtime worked by MOD police officers at AWE Aldermaston in each month from November 1998 to November 1999. [100683]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is shown in the table.

Month	Overtime hours per officer/month
November 1998	38.0
December 1998	30.2
January 1999	31.7
February 1999	32.4
March 1999	40.4
April 1999	39.4
May 1999	38.0
June 1999	42.4
July 1999	38.9
August 1999	39.4
September 1999	42.9
October 1999	31.7

Note:
The figures for November 1999 are not available at this time

NATO

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions (a) the United Kingdom and (b) all other NATO countries have exercised a national veto on proposed actions during a NATO operation since 1989. [99466]

Mr. Hoon: Decisions at NATO are taken by consensus. During operations and deployments, procedures allow national commanders to satisfy themselves that a proposed course of action complies with the basis on which the operation was approved, consulting national authorities as required. Neither the UK nor NATO maintains records of how many times these procedures have been used since 1989.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Post Offices

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the principal activities of his Department and its agencies which provide business for (a) Crown post offices and (b) other post offices; if he will assess whether the level of business generated in each case is likely to increase or decrease over the next five years; and which new areas of business for post offices are likely to be developed by his Department and its agencies over the same period. [99551]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department and its agencies have no functions which directly provide business for (a) Crown post offices or (b) other post offices. It is not likely that this situation will change in the future. However, we have significant business with both Royal Mail and Parcelforce, who provide the bulk of our mail collection and delivery services.

Digital Television

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what projections his Department has made of the number of households with digital television in 2006 (a) with a digital licence fee supplement as proposed by the Independent Review Panel into the future funding of the BBC and (b) without such a supplement. [100046]

Janet Anderson: We do not have these specific figures at present. However, DCMS commissioned an independent report from Nera in 1998, which suggested between 13.8 million and 18.5 million households would have digital capability by 2008. The potential impact of a digital licence supplement on take up of digital television is something we are considering in reaching our conclusions on the independent review panel's recommendations. As part of that process, we will look at all the available evidence on this issue.

Recognised Sports

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what sports are recognised by the Sports Councils within the United Kingdom. [100292]

Kate Hoey: The Sports Councils do not 'recognise' sports, but there are 112 sports that are eligible for funding and other support. These are:

Aikido, American Football, Angling, Archery, Arm Wrestling, Association Football, Athletics, Australian Rules Football, Badminton, Ballooning, Baseball, Basketball, Baton Twirling, Biathlon, Bicycle Polo, Billiards and Snooker, Bobsleigh, Boccia, Bowls, Boxing, Camogie, Canoeing, Caving, Chinese Martial Arts, Cricket, Croquet, Crossbow, Curling, Cycling, Disability Sport, Dragon Boat Racing, Equestrian, Fencing, Fives, Flying, Gaelic Football, Gliding, Golf, Gymnastics, Handball, Hang/Para Gliding, Highland Games, Hockey, Horse Racing, Hovering, Hurling, Ice Hockey, Ice Skating, Jet Skiing, Ju Jitsu, Judo, Kabaddi, Karate, Kendo, Korfball, Lacrosse, Lawn Tennis, Life Saving, Luge, Modern Pentathlon, Motor Cycling, Motor Sports, Mountaineering, Movement, Dance and Fitness, Netball, Orienteering, Parachuting, Pentaque, Polo, Pony Trekking, Pool, Quoits, Racketball, Rackets, Racquetball, Rambling, Real Tennis, Roller Hockey, Roller Skating, Rounders, Rowing, Rugby League, Rugby Union, Sailing, Sand/Land Yachting, Shinty, Shooting, Skateboarding, Skiing, Skipping, Snowboarding, Softball, Sombo Wrestling, Squash, Skater/Street Hockey, Sub-Aqua, Surf Life Saving, Surfing, Swimming, Table Tennis, Taekwondo, Tang Soo Do, Tenpin Bowling, Trampolining, Triathlon, Tug Of War, Unihoc, Volleyball, Water Skiing, Weightlifting, Wrestling, Yoga.

Lottery Funding

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what has been the amount of funding given by the National Lottery to disabled projects for disabled people in England and Wales during the last 12 months. [100443]

Kate Hoey: National Lottery projects are designed to benefit all sections of society, including people with disabilities. Since November 1998, around £280 million has been awarded to over 4,000 projects designed primarily to benefit people with disabilities.

Royal Opera House

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what Government financial grants have been made available to the Royal Opera House modernisation programme. [100441]

Mr. Alan Howarth: No grants have been made directly from Government to the Royal Opera House for its redevelopment. The Arts Council's National Lottery capital programme awarded the Royal Opera House £78.5 million for the restoration, refurbishment and extension of the Covent Garden site.

Departmental Estate

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what his estimate is of the value of land, property and heritage assets (a) in Scotland, (b) in England and (c) in total (i) owned by or (ii) under the responsibility of his Department. [99827]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The Department is at present implementing resource accounting and values have been derived from audited accounting information. The first year of published resource accounts will be in respect of 1999–2000.

The Net Book Value of assets held by the Department as at the end of March 1999 was £40.398 million (including the Royal Parks Agency). This figure relates to land, property and heritage assets in England only as my Department does not hold any such assets in Scotland.

The Heritage Assets held by the Department are valued at nil. These assets include Trafalgar Square, Apsley House, part of Osborne House, Wellington Arch, Marble Arch and nine statues (and the Government Art Collection, which has some 11,500 items).

Bournemouth Sinfonietta

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport for what reasons the Bournemouth Sinfonietta's funding has been ended. [100791]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Arts Council announced on 13 October its plans for giving the subsidised orchestras a fresh start backed by at least £10 million to enable them to move to a more flexible way of working and to enable them to have scope to offer a more imaginative repertoire to audiences. The Council made it clear at the time of the announcement that they would be in immediate discussions with Bournemouth about a new model for their work. Out of those discussions has come the decision by the Bournemouth Orchestra's Board to close the Sinfonietta as a regrettable preliminary to securing the long-term future for orchestral provision in the South and South-West.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid Board

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what the Legal Aid Board's policy is on seeking possession of vacant properties when an outstanding debt to the Board is secured against the property. [100123]

Mr. Lock: The Legal Aid Board secures debts against property in a number of circumstances.

Where an assisted person wins his or her case but some costs are outstanding, section 16 of the Legal Aid Act 1988 allows the Board to recover them from the property that was in dispute, through the "statutory charge". Where the assisted person's home was in dispute, or the winnings in the case are to be used to purchase a home for the assisted person, enforcement can be postponed and the Board will register a charge against the home. In those circumstances the property in question is not vacant. Should it become vacant, the Board will expect the property to be sold and the statutory charge paid off immediately.

The other circumstances are: where the court has made a costs order in favour of an assisted person, and the Board is seeking costs from the other side; where the assisted person has failed to make the required contributions towards the cost of their legal aid; where a legal aid certificate has been revoked, in which case the full cost of the help given has to be repaid; and where an assisted person has been granted an emergency certificate but has not been given a full certificate. In all these circumstances the Board can secure debts owed to it on any property, including vacant property, and will be in the same position as any other secured creditor.

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the average length of time between debts to the Legal Aid Board being secured against domestic property and being settled. [100124]

Mr. Lock: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what the value is of debts to the Legal Aid Board that are secured against (a) domestic property and (b) vacant domestic property. [100125]

Mr. Lock: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. As at 31 March 1999, the principle value of all debts to the Legal Aid Board that are secured by way of the statutory charge was £206,792,000. The total value of other secured debts to the Board, in respect of liabilities such as unpaid contributions, costs owned under revoked certificates, or costs awards in favour of assisted persons, is not recorded centrally.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing Benefit

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what statistics are collected (a) nationally and (b) by region, on the time it takes to process housing benefit; [99865]

(2) which national organisation monitors and investigates performance in processing housing benefit claims within target periods. [99867]

Angela Eagle: The Audit Commission in England and Wales, and the Accounts Commission in Scotland, collect and publish data annually for all local authorities administering housing benefit. This includes data on the number of claims determined within 14 days. Data are also collected and monitored by this Department. The Benefit Fraud Inspectorate is responsible for reporting to the Secretary of State on the administration of housing benefit by local authorities.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to bring the housing benefit service within the Best Value Framework. [99868]

Angela Eagle: A comprehensive range of best value performance indicators for the delivery of housing benefit was included in the recent joint Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions and Audit Commission consultation exercise ("Performance Indicators for 2000–01"). Indicators will be finalised by the end of 1999 and will cover the key aspects of local authorities' performance in delivering housing benefit. We are committed to driving forward improvements in the benefit services authorities provide so that they are faster, more accurate and more secure while also achieving value for money and taking account of the views and needs of local people.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to introduce measures to reform housing benefit. [99011]

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the timetable for bringing forward his proposals for housing benefit reform. [99901]

Angela Eagle: We intend to publish a Housing Green Paper in due course. This will present proposals for housing benefit within the overall strategy for housing.

Students (Benefits)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what benefits are available to students who are (a) pregnant and (b) single mothers; [100121]

(2) what recent representations he has received on the incomes of students and their ineligibility to receive benefits; and if he will make a statement. [100036]

Angela Eagle: Most full time students are not eligible to claim income-related benefits—their primary source of financial support comes from the education system. However, certain students in vulnerable groups, for example lone parents or disabled students, can claim these benefits.

A full time student is not eligible to claim an income-related benefit on the grounds of her pregnancy. However, students who are also working and earning at least £66 a week may qualify for Statutory Maternity pay from her employer, or Maternity Allowance from the Benefits Agency.

If she or her partner were in receipt of Income Support, income based Jobseeker's Allowance, Working Families Tax Credit or the Disabled Person's Tax Credit she would be able to claim a Social Fund Maternity Grant payment.

During the last three months we have received a small number of letters concerning students, their incomes and benefits.

Departmental Estate

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what his estimate is of the value of land and property held by his core Department (a) in Scotland and (b) in total; [99820]

(2) what his estimate is of the value of land and property (a) in Scotland and (b) in total held by (i) the Benefits Agency (including freehold, leasehold and historical leasehold offices), (ii) the Child Support Agency, (iii) the War Pensions Agency, (iv) the IT Services Agency and (v) the Independent Statutory Bodies; and what is the total value of assets for each of these bodies. [99819]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 26 November 1999]: In early 1998 all of the Department's land and property throughout the UK, both freehold and leasehold, was transferred to the private sector under two separate Private Finance Initiative contracts. We now no longer own nor hold any land or property. Instead serviced office accommodation is purchased from our two private sector partners, Trillium and the Newcastle Estate Partnership.

Under the PRIME contract, assets related to the properties were transferred to Trillium. The Department, however, retains a relatively small amount of low value property related assets in the Newcastle Estate.

The total net book value of all fixed assets held by the Department's Executive Agencies at 31 March 1999 is as follows:

Benefits Agency	34,220,000
Child Support Agency	7,327,000
War Pensions Agency	1,035,000
Information Technology Services Agency	25,153,000

For the Department's Independent Statutory Bodies, valuation information is being developed as part of the implementation of resource accounting. This information is currently being audited. The first set of resource accounts will be published in respect of 1999–2000.

Inter-departmental Group (Poverty and Social Exclusion)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how frequently the inter-departmental group that met to advise on the report from his Department, "Opportunity for All, Tackling Poverty and Social Exclusion" (Cm 4455), will meet in future, with representatives of which Departments, under what terms of reference, and with what involvement of representatives of voluntary and community organisations. [100724]

Mr. Bayley: In preparing "Opportunity for All", our first annual report on its strategy for tackling poverty and social exclusion, all relevant Government Departments met frequently to discuss the report. We are currently considering the terms of reference and membership for the inter-departmental group that will steer the second report.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to allow people with severe and enduring mental illness, who have been discharged from hospital and whose circumstances remain unchanged, to claim Disability Living Allowance and severe disablement premium without having to complete any additional forms. [99877]

Mr. Bayley: Scope already exists for Disability Living Allowance (DLA) claimants discharged from hospital on a long-term or indefinite basis to have their benefit reinstated on a weekly basis, providing they notify the DLA unit of their discharge, and providing there is no change to their care and mobility needs. Reinstatement cannot however be automatic; much will depend on the circumstances of the individual case. For example, a person who has been discharged from hospital may have greater or lesser care needs than they had before they were admitted and this could alter the rate of benefit to which they are entitled.

We recognise the special problems that people with mental health problems face when dealing with the benefits system. We are currently looking at different ways of gathering information necessary to deal with claims for DLA that will place less reliance on lengthy forms, allow more face to face contact with claimants, and develop a system which is more sensitive to the needs of individual disabled people. As part of this, we have been working with organisations representing people with mental health problems to address particular concerns about DLA periodic inquiries. Discussions have been constructive, and are being taken forward in a revised approach, which we believe should lead to an improved service for such people.

Invalid Carer's Allowance

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many recipients of invalid carer's allowance are estimated to have earnings per week of (a) 0-£10, (b) £10-£20, (c) £20-£30, (d) £30-£40 and (e) £40-£50; and how many carers who would otherwise be entitled to invalid carer's allowance are estimated to have earnings per week of (i) £50-£60, (ii) £60-£70, (iii) £70-£80, (iv) £80-£90 and (v) £90-£100 or earnings in other ranges for which estimates are available. [99921]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available.

Pension Scheme Trustee Boards

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to improve the representation of pensioners on the trustee boards of pension schemes. [99999]

Mr. Rooker: We believe that member trustees add value to pension schemes, and want to increase their coverage.

Our priority is to ensure that schemes have member-nominated trustees, and that members have a fair say in determining the arrangements for appointing them.

The consultation document, "Strengthening the Pensions Framework", which was issued in December 1998, made a number of proposals on member-nominated trustees, including a proposal that large mature schemes should be required to reserve a place on the trustee board for a pensioner member. Responses showed widespread support for the principle of member trustees, but concern about the practical implications of some of the proposals, including that for a reserved place for a pensioner member in large mature schemes.

In the light of the concerns, we set up a working group with the pensions industry and other representative bodies to review the proposals. A further consultation document with revised proposals was issued on 7 October 1999.

The changes we are proposing do not require schemes to have a pensioner trustee, but will ensure that pensioners are given a fair say in the procedures.

Responses to the revised proposals were mostly very encouraging, and we plan to legislate in the forthcoming child support, pensions and social security Bill.

Personal Pension Schemes

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to allow unmarried members of personal pension schemes to buy annuities where the rate is determined on the member's life only. [99891]

Mr. Rooker: All members of personal pension schemes are already able to choose to purchase a single life annuity with their entire fund, provided that the pension contains no element of protected rights.

Members of appropriate personal pension schemes, which consist wholly or partly of protected rights, are required to purchase a joint life annuity with the protected rights element of the accumulated fund which accrued before 6 April 1997. Unmarried members may use all of the rights accrued from 6 April 1997 to purchase a single life annuity.

We are considering whether a further change should be made to the legislation in respect of the requirement to purchase a joint life annuity for pre-6 April 1997 protected rights.

National Benefit Fraud Hotline

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have called the National Benefit Fraud Hotline in each of the 12 weeks for which he has the most recent data. [100694]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

Numbers of people who have called the national benefit fraud hotline in the most recent 12 week period, 30 August-19 November 1999

Week commencing	Calls answered
30 August	2,311
6 September	2,902
13 September	2,669
20 September	2,619
27 September	2,470
4 October	2,371
11 October	2,445
18 October	2,336
25 October	2,139
1 November	2,749
8 November	3,060
15 November	4,367
Total	32,438

Note:
On occasion people call the hotline but ring off before the call has been answered. Over the 12 week period, 1,109 calls were lost in this way (3.3 per cent. of all calls made).

Child Support White Paper

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to respond to the report of the Social Security Select Committee, the 1999 Child Support White Paper [HC 798]. [101124]

Angela Eagle: The Government's response to the Committee's report has been laid before Parliament today, Cm 4536.

WALES

Birth Certificates

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales for what purposes his Department and its executive agencies require a birth certificate to be provided by (a) employees, (b) contractors and those applying for employment and contracts and (c) other persons. [99332]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My Department requires those applying for employment to provide either a birth certificate, passport, or driving licence in order to prove identify. Contractors, potential contractors, and other persons are not required to provide their birth certificates.

HEALTH

Gender Reassignment Surgery

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice his Department issues to health authorities who have a blanket policy not to offer gender reassignment surgery on the National Health Service. [98632]

Mr. Denham: Our advice is that each case should be considered on its individual merits.

Alder Hey Hospital

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Chief Medical Officer's investigation into the post-mortem removal and retention of organs at children's hospitals, with particular reference to Alder Hey, will be completed; and if it will be made public. [98625]

Mr. Denham: The Chief Medical Officer's investigation will look at what has happened not only at the Royal Liverpool Children's Hospital (Alder Hey) but in the country generally and at the implications for the National Health Service. He hopes to complete his investigation by summer 2000 and will publish the results.

Nurses National Register

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce a minimum time ban for registered nurses struck off the national register held by the UK Central Council for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting. [98471]

Mr. Hutton: Decisions on the length of time before which a practitioner who has been removed from the register may reapply are a matter for the United Kingdom Central Council for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting.

Emergency Services (Millennium Celebrations)

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the plans being made to cope with the expected extra demand placed on emergency services during the millennium celebrations. [99560]

Ms Stuart: Preparations for the millennium began well in advance. All National Health Service organisations, including Ambulance Trusts, were assessed as presenting no risk of material disruption to services due to the millennium bug. Ambulance services have detailed plans and robust contingency arrangements in place to cope with expected extra demand over this period.

Transplants (Waiting List)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in each health authority are awaiting (a) heart transplants and (b) other organ transplants; and if he will make a statement. [99763]

Mr. Denham: Copies of the information requested have been placed in the Library.

We are concerned about the shortage of organs for transplantation and that was why we launched the organ donor publicity campaign in October 1998, reinforced in February by a campaign targeting the south Asian community. We shall continue to build on these campaigns to encourage people to join the National Health Service organ donor register, to carry the donor card at all times and most importantly make their wishes known to their family and friends.

We shall be developing a further campaign to inform the medical profession about best practice in requesting organ donation.

Additionally, in line with the drive to improve the quality of care for all users of the NHS, we shall seek to ensure that best practice is adopted in all units involved in donation and transplantation. We shall also support best practice in live donation, which has increased significantly over the last few years.

Epilepsy

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements are in place in each health authority area to provide a specialised service to patients with epilepsy. [99759]

Mr. Hutton: The information is not available in the format requested. Regional specialised commissioning groups are accountable for ensuring that effective arrangements for commissioning specialised services are in place in each region, including those specialised services required for the treatment of complex epilepsy.

Under the present system it is, of course, for health authorities and primary care groups to plan and arrange the services available to people in their care. They are closest to the patients and best placed to respond sensitively to their needs.

The Clinical Standards Advisory Group (Epilepsy Committee) has undertaken a study to investigate standards of clinical care for, and access and availability of services to, patients with epilepsy. The aim of this research is to review the services that are currently available. We have recently received this report and are currently considering its conclusions and recommendations and the implications they have for epilepsy services and for the National Health Service as a whole. We hope to publish the report within the prescribed 90 days, together with the Government's response.

"Fit for the Future?"

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the research on which the consultation document, "Fit for the Future?", was based. [99850]

Mr. Hutton: Details of the reference material used by the Centre for Policy on Ageing (CPA) and the Advisory Group in formulating their proposals for national standards are set out in the consultation document, "Fit for the Future?", along with details of the CPA's consultation process and the membership of the Advisory Group.

Social Services (SSAs)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the standard spending assessment for social services in each health authority area in (a) the last year for which figures are available and (b) 1997. [99913]

Mr. Hutton: Information on standard spending assessments by health authority area are not available. Details of the standard spending assessment for social services in each local authority in 2000–01, the latest year for which figures are available, and 1997–98, are given in the table.

National Care Homes

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he proposes to announce his response to the Consultation Document on National Care Homes Standards. [99989]

Mr. Hutton: The consultation document "Fit for the Future?—National Required Standards for Residential and Nursing Homes for Older People" was issued for formal consultation nationally on 8 September. The consultation period ends on 21 January 2000.

We will carefully consider all the comments we receive before finalising any regulatory standards and the arrangements for implementing them.

Physiotherapy

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many physiotherapist posts are unfilled in the NHS at the latest date for which figures are available; and how many physiotherapists (a) left and (b) joined the NHS during the latest full year for which figures are available. [99995]

Mr. Denham: The available information is given in the tables. The Department's Recruitment, Retention and Vacancies survey collected data on the numbers of unfilled posts in NHS trusts in England as a 31 March 1999. Information is not collected centrally on the numbers of physiotherapists joining and leaving the NHS, but the annual non-medical workforce census gives total numbers of physiotherapists at 30 September each year.

Pharmaceutical Packaging

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what impact the EU directive on pharmaceutical packaging, which came into force on 1 January, has had on the availability and cost of generic drugs to the NHS. [99994]

Ms Stuart: Although it does not require them to do so, many manufacturers of generic medicines have decided in the light of European Community Directive 92/27, and other considerations, to change their production from bulk supplies to patient packs. It is likely that this change has contributed to recent problems in the availability of generic medicines and their increasing cost to the NHS. It is, however, only one factor and not, in our view, the most significant.

NHS Magazine

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost to public funds in the last year for which information is available of publishing NHS Magazine. [99894]

Mr. Denham: NHS Magazine was first published in June 1995. The net cost of publishing four issues of NHS Magazine in 1998 was £161,311.48. This averages a cost of £1.04 per copy.

Health Care Spending

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Government have a long-term target figure for the percentage of gross domestic product that it wishes to see devoted to health care spending. [100006]

Mr. Denham: No.

Patients Association

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funding his Department has provided to the Patients Association in each of the last five years. [99990]

Ms Stuart: The main source of Departmental funding for voluntary organisations is the Section 64 General Scheme of Grants. Over the last five years the Patients Association has received the following Section 64 funding:

1995–96	14,000
1996–97	6,000
1997–98	25,000
1998–99	20,000
1999–2000	15,000

NHS Consultants

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of serving NHS consultants intending to retire (a) before the age of 65 years and (b) before reaching the age of 60 years. [99888]

Mr. Denham: Information about the number of consultants in the National Health Service intending to retire is not collected centrally. For workforce planning purposes, we use data provided by the Medical Royal Colleges, where available.

A and E Waiting Times

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to establish a task force to monitor the number of patients who wait on trolleys for treatment in A and E departments. [99998]

Ms Stuart: Earlier this year we announced a £115 million programme to modernise, expand and update accident and emergency departments. At the same time we announced that we were setting up a team to spearhead improvements in services and to set standards of care in accident and emergency departments, including the care provided for people awaiting admission to hospital. The team is led by Mr. Mike Lambert, an experienced accident and emergency consultant, and draws upon the expertise of professionals in all relevant fields. Their report will be presented to Ministers next spring.

Primary Care Groups

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the (a) effect to date and (b) likely effect during the remainder of the current financial year of primary care group budget overspends on the prescribing patterns of those primary care groups. [99991]

Mr. Denham: Current pressures do not justify a reduction or withdrawal of services to patients. Primary Care Groups should monitor all aspects of their prescribing and continue their efforts to reduce wasteful and inappropriate prescribing.

Hospital Waiting Times

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are waiting for (a) 12, (b) 18 and (c) 24 months for hospital treatment; and how many people were waiting for hospital treatment on 1 March in each year from 1990 to 1999 in the North Staffordshire Hospital Trust area. [99881]

Mr. Denham: The following table contains data for 31 March figures each year. Data are only available from March 1994 for North Staffordshire Hospital Trust as it exists today. However, the table supplies data for North Staffordshire District Health Authority before this time. Please note that this information will not be directly comparable with later years as it may not cover exactly the same area as the current trust.

Voluntary Organisations

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the voluntary organisations which received section 64 financial support in 1998–99 and 1999–2000, indicating the amount of each award and the number of years each organisation has been funded through section 64. [100495]

Mr. Hutton: The available information has been placed in the Library.

Dental Services

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many vacant posts there are for Community Dental Service dentists; [100501]

(2) how many dentists have been employed in the Community Dental Service over each of the last five years; [100500]

(3) what was the budget for the Community Dental Service for each of the past five years. [100502]

Mr. Hutton: There is no overall community dental service (CDS) budget. The level of investment in the CDS is a matter for individual health authorities to decide in the light of local need and priorities. Funding comes from health authority baseline allocations. Information about spending on CDS, recruitment and vacancies are matters for health authorities and data are not collected centrally. Overall CDS workforce statistics are given in the table.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health where the new dental phone-and-go schemes will be based. [100503]

Mr. Hutton: Two phone-and-go dental access centres have already opened in Cornwall and Shropshire. A further six will begin to open from the autumn in Wolverhampton, Bromley, Gloucester, Swindon, Worcester, and Manchester. Expressions of interest for further dental access centres are currently being considered and an announcement will be made shortly. Those that are successful will be given financial support to help them work up a full business case.

Barnet General Hospital

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when phase 1B of the redevelopment of Barnet General Hospital will be open. [100217]

Mr. Denham: Work on Phase 1B development at Barnet Hospital is progressing well. The private finance initiative agreement states that construction work should be completed within 38 months of its signing, that is, by April 2002.

Health Trusts (Fundraising)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the advice he gave to health trusts on fundraising activities, indicating what controls he has put in place. [100138]

Mr. Denham: The Charity Commission, as the regulator of charities, is responsible for issuing guidance to trustees, including National Health Service trustees. It has issued specific guidance to NHS bodies in the form of a manual, "NHS Charities a Guide" which provides advice on fundraising.

Electro-convulsive Treatment

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish his Department's latest advice on electro-convulsive treatment. [100797]

Mr. Hutton: The Royal College of Psychiatrists has issued guidance on the use of electro-convulsive therapy. A joint letter from the Chief Medical Officer and the President of the Royal College of Psychiatrists in September 1998 was sent to all consultant psychiatrists, health authorities and NHS trusts indicating that it was expected that clinical governance arrangements would ensure compliance with this guidance in ECT clinics.

ECT is an effective treatment particularly for patients with very severe generally psychotic depression which is life threatening if left untreated. People who are this severely depressed may refuse or be unable to eat and drink, with a consequent high mortality, as well as being at very high risk of suicide. ECT produces a faster onset of therapeutic action in such cases than is the case with drug treatment.

ECT also has a more limited place in the treatment of other disorders such as mania and schizophrenia. Its role in these latter conditions is generally when drug treatments have proved ineffective or for some reason inadvisable.

Non-moulded Hearing Aids

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what rules cover the sale of non-moulded hearing aids in retail outlets. [98619]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 19 November 1999]: I have been asked to reply as the Minister responsible for the Hearing Aid Council Act 1968, which regulates the supply of hearing aids, whether moulded or non-moulded. The Act requires that the dispensers of hearing aids must be registered as such with the Hearing Aid Council in order to supply hearing aids. The standard of competence for registration of dispensers is contained in the Hearing Aid Council's Code of Practice, copies of which will be placed shortly in the Library of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Magistrates

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who has awarded the contract to conduct the research into stipendiary and lay magistrates by the Lord Chancellor's Department. [101120]

Mr. Straw: A contract was signed on 22 November on behalf of Professor Rod Morgan of the University of Bristol, who will lead a team consisting of colleagues in the Faculty of Law at the University of Bristol, researchers from Taylor Nelson Sofres (covering the fieldwork), and CRG Consultants (for the cost-benefit analysis).

The team will undertake research commissioned jointly by the Hone Office and the Lord Chancellor's Department, to assess the relative costs, effectiveness and other benefits or disadvantages of stipendiary and lay magistrates, taking into account all related costs including those of other agencies. It will be used to assess whether the current balance between the use of lay magistrates and stipendiaries is satisfactory; whether each set of magistrates is deployed in the most effective way; and the weight of arguments that are heard for and against the use of lay and stipendiary magistrates in particular circumstances.

The research is due to be completed in September 2000. The report will be published.

Policing Objectives

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what objectives he will be determining for policing in 2000–01. [101121]

Mr. Straw: The Police Act 1996 allows me to set objectives, or ministerial priorities, for policing. The objectives for 2000–01 are:

to reduce local problems of crime and disorder in partnership with local authorities, other local agencies and the public; and to increase trust and confidence in policing among minority ethnic communities.

I have reduced the number of priorities from four to two as I believe this helps focus attention on two key areas of policing—reducing crime and rising to the challenges of the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the achievements of staff in the immigration and nationality directorate over the past year. [101122]

Mrs. Roche: Staff in the immigration and nationality directorate (IND)—both at the ports and at headquarters—have faced greatly increased workloads during 1999 as a result of the large increase in the number of asylum applicants. Much has been achieved, but much more remains to be done and staff will face a continuing challenge next year. In addition, staff are now taking on new responsibilities to make asylum procedures operate more effectively.

I have, therefore, authorised a special payment of £150 for all staff, except members of the IND board. This recognises the extra duties and responsibilities of IND staff in this period of change.

Road Rage

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many attacks by motorists against other motorists have been reported during 1999; how many people have been charged as a result of such reports; and how many such people have been (a) sent to prison, (b) fined and (c) acquitted. [99527]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Incapacitant Sprays

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions incapacitant sprays have been used in each month in each Metropolitan Police division in the past 12 months; and what records are maintained of each use of the spray. [99601]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan Police Commissioner has provided the following information on the use of CS spray by borough operational command units (OCUs) for each quarter of the last 12 months.

The Commissioner tells me that a monthly breakdown for each borough OCU is not readily available.

Reasons for, and the circumstances of, each use of CS spray are recorded in the arresting officer's notes; if no arrest is made, a local record is kept. Each time CS spray is used, details are copied to the relevant Metropolitan Police policy branch and, in many cases, to OCU and area senior management.

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what rules, guidelines or other instructions are given to officers of the Metropolitan Police concerning the circumstances in which they may use incapacitant sprays; and what precautions officers must take to avoid danger to (a) members of the public, (b) the person being targeted and (c) fellow officers. [99602]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan Police Commissioner tells me that training in the use of CS spray for his officers is based on principles contained in the Association of Chief Police Officers guidelines on police use of incapacitant spray.

Metropolitan Police officers are taught that CS spray is a tactical option when the use of force is justified, but it must be used lawfully. Where any use of force is contemplated, officers are trained to take full account of the circumstances and any likely dangers before deciding which tactical option to use. Their training explains the effects of CS spray on the person being sprayed and on others; they are also trained in aftercare procedures for persons sprayed. Custody officers have specific guidance on how to deal with those arrested following the use of CS spray.

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints have been received in the last year concerning the use of incapacitant sprays by the Metropolitan Police; on how many occasions disciplinary action has been taken against officers for misuse or other incidents involving an incapacitant spray; how many officers charged with such an offence were disciplined; and what sanctions were applied. [99603]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan Police Commissioner tells me that between 1 November 1998 and 31 October 1999 there were 38 public complaints by members of the public concerning the use of incapacitant sprays. These complaints involved 41 specific allegations. Of these, 16 have been investigated and found to be unsubstantiated. The remaining 25 allegations are still being investigated.

No disciplinary action relating to the use of CS spray has been taken against any Metropolitan Police officer during the same 12-month period.

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date divisions of the Metropolitan police were issued with incapacitant spray; what type of spray is available to them; how many canisters have been purchased and at what cost; how many officers have been trained in the use of spray; how many hours of such training are set as the minimum training for an officer; and how many officers routinely carry canisters. [99604]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan police Commissioner tells me that the date of issue of CS spray varies between divisions because of the lead-in time necessary to train officers. All officers receive four hours initial training before being issued with CS spray; competence in its use is checked at least once a year thereafter. By March 1998, most divisional officers had been issued with CS spray.

The Metropolitan police do not record centrally the number of officers trained in the use of CS spray, nor the number who routinely carry it, but the Commissioner tells me that the majority of operational officers would routinely carry it.

The CS incapacitant spray issued by the Metropolitan police is manufactured by SAE Alsetex in France and supplied in the United Kingdom by Primetake Ltd. This spray contains a 5 per cent. solution of CS in the solvent MIBK (Methyl iso butyl ketone) and the propellant used is nitrogen. Since September 1997, the Metropolitan police has purchased 30,200 canisters at the cost of £196,000.

Euro 2000

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the total costs were of policing the England v Scotland Euro 2000 play-offs match at Wembley on 17 November. [99528]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan Police advise that the total cost for policing around Wembley Stadium and in Central London was £525,777. Policing costs inside the stadium were met by Wembley plc.

Officer Training

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what training is given to police officers on effecting an arrest on board a bus, and what factors must be taken into account by the arresting officers. [99605]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Police officer training is an operational matter for individual chief officers.

The Commissioner tells me that during Metropolitan police officers probationer continuation training, they receive a session on public transport disputes and legislation. This covers assaults on bus crews and the conduct of passengers. This complements training on issues such as the handling of assaults in public places, powers of arrest and public order offences.

Bus Routes (Crime)

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in the past year and in what circumstances police have been called to deal with incidents on buses in the police district covering Hackney; on how many occasions police have made an arrest; and what offences were alleged to have been committed by those arrested. [99600]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan Police Commissioner tells me that between 1 October 1998 and 1 October 1999, 283 allegations of crime on bus routes in Hackney borough were recorded. These break down as follows:

	Number
Theft (from the person)	116
Theft (other)	63
Violence against the person	51
Robbery	27
Indecent Assault	5
Other offences	21

The Commissioner tells me that statistics on the number of occasions the police have been called to deal with incidents on buses in Hackney borough, and related arrests, are not recorded specifically.

Human Fertilisation Act 1990

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been instigated under the Human Fertilisation Act 1990 on embryos experimented on in advance of 14 days. [99749]

Mr. Charles Clarke: From 1991 to 1998 inclusive, the Home Office court proceedings database shows no defendants proceeded against under the Act for this offence.

Marchioness Disaster

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers and boats were available to the Metropolitan Police Thames Division (a) at the time of the Marchioness disaster and (b) in 1999. [99623]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan Police Commissioner tells me that in 1989 there were 146 police officers attached to Thames Division, and 23 boats were deployed from five bases along the length of the River Thames. Today there are 89 police officers and 18 boats all operating out of central headquarters at Wapping, where activity is focused on river traffic monitoring, central London security patrol and emergency response. The fleet has been substantially modernised since 1989 and an additional two boats are due to be delivered before the end of the year. A more diverse range of specialist resources is also now available to Thames Division than in 1989, including digital marine radio, inflatable pathways and vessel tracking.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were granted indefinite leave to remain in the UK in 1998. [98565]

Mrs. Roche: The number of nationals of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia granted indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom in 1998 was 870. Other information on nationals from the former Yugoslavia was published in Table 6.1 of "Control of Immigration: Statistics, United Kingdom, 1998", a copy of which is in the Library.

Police Numbers (Hillingdon)

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what staffing levels will be in operation in each of the police stations within the Metropolitan Police Service Hillingdon division on (a) 25 December, (b) 26 December, (c) 31 December, (d) 1 January 2000 and (e) 2 January 2000. [99610]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan Police Commissioner tells me that planning is taking place to ensure there are sufficient officers on duty to meet the demands over the Millennium period. The planning process has taken into account the need to retain operational flexibility.

Police Act 1997

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress in the implementation of Part V of the Police Act 1997. [99597]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The project to set up the Criminal Records Bureau to implement Part V of the Police Act 1997 is being managed within the framework of a Public-Private Partnership. A business prospectus was issued on 8 October and a bidders conference was held on 14 October. Bids were received on 19 November and are under evaluation. I have been reviewing the timetable and delivery of the project and I shall announce the outcome shortly.

Burglar Alarms

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions his Department has had with the Association of Chief Police Officers over the problems caused by rogue burglar alarms in commercial properties. [100796]

Mr. Charles Clarke: None. I am not aware of any representations to the Home Office on that matter.

Representation of the People Bill

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) for what reason no regulatory impact study of the financial and other effects of the Representation of the People Bill has been issued by his Department in advance of the publication of the Bill; [100673]

(2) when his Department intends to issue a regulatory impact study of the financial and other effects of the Representation of the People Bill; [100674]

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the cost to (a) business and (b) other organisations of proposals in the Representation of the People Bill to limit the commercial availability of the electoral register; and for what reason no regulatory impact statement has been produced. [100399]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: A regulatory impact statement relating to the Representation of the People Bill was placed in the Library on 18 November to coincide with the Bill's introduction.

Electoral Register

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is his policy that use of the full electoral register by commercial and charitable groups should become a criminal offence. [100675]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Representation of the People Bill allows regulations to be made prescribing those persons who may purchase or be supplied with the full electoral register and for what purpose. Prohibitions or restrictions may be imposed as to the extent to which information from the full register may be used for purposes other than those for which it was supplied, and it can be made an offence to contravene those prohibitions or restrictions.

Eurodac Regulations

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what position will be taken by the Government when the European Commission's proposal to transfer to the Commission competence over the implementing provisions of the Eurodac Regulations is discussed at the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 2 and 3 December. [100798]

Mrs. Roche: A copy of an explanatory memorandum has been sent to the scrutiny committees setting out the Government's position on the draft regulation. A copy will be available in the Library of the House. On implementing powers, we will judge at the Council itself what is in the United Kingdom's best interests in the light of all the proposals then under discussion.

Passport Fees

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) of 24 November 1999, Official Report, column 125W, if he will place in the Library details of the options regarding passport fee levels which have been submitted for consideration. [100799]

Mrs. Roche: The options for the levels of passport fees are a matter for internal discussion and deliberation between Passport Agency officials and Ministers.

Gurpal Virdi

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how long was the last request by Gurpal Virdi for postponement of the Metropolitan Police discipline hearing; how long the postponement was; and whose availability caused the extra delay. [100031]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan Police Commissioner tells me that solicitors representing Sergeant Virdi sought an adjournment of the Metropolitan Police discipline hearing on or around 31 August 1999. The adjournment was sought to allow expert witnesses, acting for the defence, sufficient time to examine the evidence in the case.

Both parties have agreed the hearing should now start on 7 February 2000.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will authorise Gurpal Virdi to meet the police inspectorate before the resolution of the outstanding employment and discipline hearings involving the Metropolitan Police Service; [100029]

(2) if he will authorise the police inspectorate to meet Gurpal Virdi before the resolution of the outstanding employment and discipline hearings involving the Metropolitan Police Service. [100028]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Whether Sergeant Virdi meets a member of Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC) is a matter for them. I understand that HMIC, in order to avoid any suggestion of compromising proceedings, would not expect to meet a police officer engaged in disciplinary and employment tribunal proceedings until those proceedings, and any related appeals, were complete.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Metropolitan Police Service first received notice of the employment claim by Gurpal Virdi; and what the reasons have been for the delay in the tribunal hearing. [100030]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan Police Commissioner tells me that the originating application for the employment tribunal in Sergeant Gurpal Virdi's case was presented on 28 June 1998. The Metropolitan Police Service served notice of its intention to contest the matter.

The tribunal was made aware that there are outstanding disciplinary matters relating to Sergeant Virdi, which are linked to the employment claim. As evidence that will be used both by the defence and the prosecution in the disciplinary hearing will also be used at the employment tribunal, the tribunal cannot proceed until the disciplinary hearing is concluded.

The employment tribunal has been made aware of the mutually agreed revised date to commence the disciplinary hearing on 7 February 2000. The employment tribunal has set the date of 5 May 2000 for a directions hearing with the full hearing due to commence on 14 June 2000.

Mental Illness

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what work is being undertaken by his Department to assess the additional training and other costs if, as a result of the introduction of community treatment orders proposed in the consultation paper "Reform of the Mental Health Act 1983", the police are increasingly engaged in conveying people to hospital. [100720]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government's proposals for the review of the Mental Health Act 1983 were published for consultation in a Green Paper on 16 November. The proposals do not include any additional statutory responsibility for the police to convey people to hospital. However, we shall consider carefully any evidence the police service offers about the implications for them of any aspect of the proposals.

Fuel Duty

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the effect of the fuel duty escalator on the budgets of (a) the police, (b) the fire and rescue service and (c) the ambulance service. [100062]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Budgets for police forces and fire brigades are set locally by their respective police and fire authorities. These budgets reflect local decisions on the authorities' priorities and expenditure needs. It is not possible to discern whether or to what extent fuel price changes have been a factor in these decisions, but we have no evidence to suggest that they have been a consideration of any significance.

The ambulance service is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. However, I understand that the increased costs in fuel duty for the ambulance service since 1996–97 are estimated at £3.73 million. This amounts to less than 0.075 per cent. of hospital and community health services spending over the two years since 1997.

Pilot Election Schemes

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ensure that local authorities are able successfully to run pilot election schemes, as set out in the Representation of the People Bill, by March 2000. [100658]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We hope that it will be possible for local authorities to run the first pilot schemes at the local elections in May 2000, though this will depend on when the Bill receives Royal Assent.

The Home Office has issued a circular to all local authorities explaining how to apply to run a pilot scheme and has produced guidance on how to undertake an evaluation.

Firearms Surrender Compensation

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) for what reason the claim by Mr. R. Knappe of Ferndown, Dorset, for firearms surrender compensation in respect of firearms surrendered over two years ago has not yet been paid; [99455]

(2) how many claims for firearms surrender compensation have been received by the Firearms Compensation Section from Dorset Constabulary; how many have been completed; how many are still outstanding; and how many have been closed in error; [99451]

(3) how many claims for firearms surrender compensation are still outstanding; and on what date he expects all cases to be completed. [99456]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Home Office Firearms Compensation Section (FCS) received 1,428 compensation claims from the Dorset Police area, of which five were ineligible under the terms of the compensation schemes. As at 22 November, 1,403 claims had been completed and 20 remain outstanding, of which 18 are those where payment offers have been made to the claimants in question and are awaiting acceptance.

As at 22 November, a total of 994 claims remain outstanding, of which 795 are those where payment offers have been made to the claimants in question and are awaiting acceptance. It is not possible to predict exactly when all claims will be completed as this will depend on a number of factors outside our control, including, for example, the receipt of suitable evidence from claimants as to the value of their surrendered property, the outcome of an independent valuation where this is necessary, and claimants acceptance of the payment offers that have been or will be made to them.

The compensation claim made by Mr. Knappe of Ferndown, Dorset was received in the FCS on 26 August 1997. Payment of the Option A and B elements of the claim was made on 22 January 1998 and the case is recorded as having been completed at this point. The claim will be re-examined by the FCS in order to process the outstanding Option C element of the claim.

It is not possible to say how many claims may have been closed in error. They will come to light only when a claimant inquires about progress on a claim which is recorded as completed. Once identified, any such cases are dealt with promptly.

Serious Assault

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he gives to magistrates on the criteria for releasing persons on bail charged with a serious assault rather than remanding them in custody; and if he has any plans to review this guidance. [100347]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 29 November 1999]: Within the statutory framework laid down by Parliament, in the Bail Act 1976, the decision to grant bail is a matter of independent judicial discretion. For this reason, the Government do not issue guidance to magistrates. However, magistrates are trained to adopt a structured approach to decision making, taking into account a range of factors, including the nature and seriousness of the offence, the possible sentence and whether the defendant is likely to surrender to bail or commit offences while on bail.

Reserve Budget (Police)

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what recent advice the Audit Commission has given to police authorities on the appropriate proportion of their budget to be held in reserve; [100669]

(2) on the basis of the most recent information available, what proportion of total budget police authorities in the UK hold as reserves. [100668]

Mr. Charles Clarke: An Audit Commission report published in July 1999 reported that the average police fund balance in England and Wales (including earmarked and general reserves) at 31 March 1998 was £7.6 million, which represents 6.2 per cent. of average net operating expenditure. However, the level of reserves varies greatly between authorities.

The Audit Commission also reported that the level of general reserves—that is reserves other than earmarked reserves—is often a better indicator of the financial health of an authority. I attach information published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy (CIPFA), showing that at 31 March 1998 police authorities in England and Wales had general reserves totalling £181 million. This represents about 2.6 per cent. of net expenditure.

The Audit Commission noted that general reserves, or balances, ranging from 2 per cent. to 5 per cent. of net operating expenditure are typically seen as reasonable by auditors. CIPFA has issued advice to police authorities recommending that general reserves or balances should be within that range, depending on local circumstances. According to CIPFA figures, 12 police authorities had general reserves below 2 per cent. of net expenditure as at 31 March 1998.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Trade Agreements

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to review the effect of trade agreements to which the UK is a party on developing countries. [100423]

Mr. Foulkes: The EU is funding a Sustainability Impact Assessment by Manchester University of the next trade round currently underway in Seattle. The study is developing a methodology for sustainability impact assessment and will make a broad qualitative assessment of the next round. It will look at impacts for four groups of countries—the EU, developing countries, least developed countries and the world as a whole. The Government fully supports the EU's approach and will be consulting with the EU and the consultants as the work progresses. In addition, the UK is part funding a World Bank programme of research on trade and development, which will include some work on impact assessment.

The EU is currently negotiating new trade arrangements with the African, Caribbean and Pacific developing countries as part of the successor agreement to the Lomé IV Convention. The EU funded a consultancy study to investigate the effects of the proposed new arrangements. The results of the study were shared with EU member states and the ACP countries.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent representations she has received on the effect of trade agreements to which the UK is a party on developing countries. [100421]

Mr. Foulkes: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received representations from a variety of UK based development agencies and NGO organisations over the past few months. In October, she met with representatives of the British Overseas Aid Group. She gave a speech hosted by the Commonwealth Business Council on 3 November to over 100 NGOs entitled "Making the Next Trade Round Work for the World's Poor". I addressed the United Nations Environment and Development Committee conference "Seattle: A Challenge for Sustainable Development" on 18 November, a conference attended by most of the interested parties within the UK. I represent the Department for International Development (DFID) at the Government's regular meetings with the UK NGO Trade network.

In the preparatory process for the Seattle Ministerial Meeting which will be held this week all WTO members have had an opportunity to put their points across, including their concerns about existing agreements. We will be working to ensure that these comments are taken forward appropriately in the WTO.

Pakistan

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what aid programmes her Department is supporting in Pakistan; and what criteria she is adopting in determining which aid programmes to support. [99895]

Mr. Foulkes: Direct development assistance to the Government of Pakistan remains frozen following my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's announcement of 15 October. Through civil society channels we are continuing programmes that directly help the poor.

Our priorities include support for improved rural livelihoods, better basic education and health services and assistance to tackle child labour issues. We screen all proposed programmes to ensure they are poverty focused and take account of issues such as gender equality and environmental impact as a matter of course.

Private Aid

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what annual assessment her Department makes of private aid and development assistance to the developing world from the United Kingdom. [100051]

Mr. Foulkes: The Department for International Development reports annually, in our Departmental Report, on the progress of implementation of the Government's official development assistance strategy. Private or non-governmental development agencies are independent organisations, accountable to their own Boards, and to the public and others who provide their funds. We try to ensure, through regular meetings, consultations and monitoring, that there is synergy between the work undertaken by these organisations and the official development programme. We are also about to embark on Partnership Programme Agreements with major non-governmental development agencies which will set out shared objectives over a fixed time-period.

South Africa

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what estimates she has made of the effect of UK gold sales on employment in South Africa. [99609]

Clare Short: The world price of gold has been in decline for many years prior to the recent announcement of UK gold sales. The relatively modest size of UK gold sales is not sufficient to explain the fall in price of gold earlier this year. The price of gold has risen again since the second auction in September, and continues to fluctuate within a broad margin.

Employment in the gold mining sector in South Africa has fallen from around 385,000 in June 1995, to around 210,000 at present. South African mines are comparatively high cost producers—the present industry average in South Africa is about $230 per ounce, compared to about $100 in parts of South America—and their relative contribution to the South African economy has been in decline for decades. Our development co-operation supports South Africa's efforts at economic diversification and employment creation.

St. Helena

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement concerning progress made on the extension of the jetty to form a breakwater in Jamestown Harbour, St. Helena. [100119]

Mr. Foulkes: The St. Helena Government is presently finalising proposals for a Wharf Improvement Project, including construction of a breakwater. The bulk of the project is expected to be financed from the European Development Fund (EDF). We have advised both the European Commission and the St. Helena Government that we will support the project when it is considered by the EDF Committee. We are also considering the Department for International Development's proposed contribution to the project.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement concerning the breakdown of the RMS St. Helena and the future arrangements for transportation of goods and people to and from St. Helena, Ascension Island and the United Kingdom. [100118]

Mr. Foulkes: The RMS St. Helena suffered a failure of its starboard main engine on 5 November on its way from Cardiff to the south Atlantic. Technical investigation indicated major repairs were required. The ship is expected to be out of service until 10 February. The operators took immediate action to ensure RMS St. Helena's commitments could be met. Its cargo departed from Brest on 27 November and will arrive at St. Helena on 16 December. Parallel arrangements have been made for the delivery of cargo from Cape Town to arrive at St. Helena on 3 December. The schedule for an interim passenger service, with a first arrival date in St. Helena of 19 December, was published on 26 November.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will estimate the costs of consultants' reports for proposed schemes on the Island of St. Helena in each year since 1995. [100117]

Mr. Foulkes: The total value of consultancy contracts entered into for the provision of advice to the Government of St. Helena for each year since 1995 is as follows:

1995	88,104
1996	97,833
1997	400,490
1998	188,238
1999	46,522

These figures do not include the value of contracts entered into for the provision of practical support or for the implementation of projects, eg medical personnel, nurse and teacher training, and construction design/ supervision.

Chechnya

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what support her Department has given in the past six months to Chechnya by way of humanitarian aid. [100052]

Mr. Foulkes: The Government is deeply concerned about the humanitarian consequences of the conflict in the North Caucasus. We are in close touch with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and UN agencies about those displaced as a result of the conflict. We have contributed £0.5 million to the ICRC's appeal for the region. The UK has also contributed through its part of the 1.2 million euro earmarked by the European Community Humanitarian Office (ECHO); of this 1 million euro has been disbursed to UNHCR.

Background:

1. Precise information on the numbers displaced in the North Caucasus is difficult to obtain. The region is dangerous for expatriates.

2. But following western pressure a UN needs assessment team visited Dagestan and Ingushetia in early November. They reported that there are 185,000 IDPs from Chechnya in Ingushetia; 20,000 IDPs from Chechnya in other regions; and 18,000 IDPs within Dagestan. The team concluded "the humanitarian situation is very difficult and is likely to deteriorate unless humanitarian action is enhanced immediately".

3. We received an appeal from ICRC to which we contributed £0.5 million. We have now also received a UN inter-agency appeal which we are considering.

4. This reply is consistent with the draft reply to Lord Moynihan's question answered on 10 November.

India

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the humanitarian situation in Orissa. [99237]

Mr. Foulkes: The cyclone that hit Orissa on 29 August has caused widespread damage and suffering. Millions of people have been affected by the cyclone and its aftermath. Alongside the Government of India's own efforts, we have committed over £2.5 million for immediate relief. Much of this has been channelled through five UK-based non-governmental organisations (CARE, Christian Aid, Save the Children, Oxfam and Help Age International), which are working through Indian partner agencies to help the most seriously affected families. The International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies has received funding to provide food, as have various United Nations agencies such as UNICEF. A team from our Department concluded an on-the-spot assessment to guide our decisions on targeting the most needy areas and supporting the most effective agencies.

In the coming months we shall be looking at re-starting our development aid programme in Orissa, alongside the major rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts that will be required.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she expects the £10 million assistance to Sierra Leone announced by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to be available to improve health facilities in the Kambia region; and if she will make a statement. [100063]

Mr. Foulkes: The Department for International Development (DFID) is providing the Government of Sierra Leone with assistance for the implementation of the Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration (DDR) process for ex-combatants (comprising £3 million for logistical support and a £3.5 million contribution to the World Bank managed Multi Donor Trust Fund); over £1 million towards the cost of the Commonwealth Police Development Task Force; support to the Sierra Leone Ministry of Defence for security sector reform projects to help create a civilian structure to manage the armed forces (£1.7 million); the provision of a ferry boat (£0.9 million) and around £2.4 million for a range of non-governmental organisation activities to help the country cope with its humanitarian needs. DFID has also provided £5 million worth of emergency budget support.

A number of good governance projects, including assistance to help the country prepare for democratic elections in 2001, are presently under consideration. Also, a second tranche of budget support to help Sierra Leone clear its debt arrears to the international finance institutions is likely to be approved before the end of the year.

DFID does not have any plans at present for funding projects in the health sector. The European Commission is preparing a programme but its implementation will depend upon obtaining access to outlying districts, especially those such as Kambia which is controlled by rebel (RUF) forces who have not yet entered DDR.

IT Projects

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the information technology projects currently being undertaken by her Department and by agencies responsible to her Department, including (a) the start date, (b) the planned completion date, (c) the current expected completion date, (d) the planned costs and (e) the current estimated cost; and if she will make a statement. [99671]

Mr. Foulkes: The only significant current project in the Department for International Development (DFID) is the roll-out of Virtual Private Networks (VPNs) to provide on-line access to our major offices overseas. Work commenced in July 1999 and is scheduled for completion on time and within budget (£400,000) in early 2001. DFID systems are small scale and low risk. Our technical architectural values ensure appropriate use is made of packaged software and bespoke solutions. Our total annual IT budget is around £5.5 million. All IT projects have been delivered within 10 per cent. of estimates and implementation schedules.

DFID has a rolling programme for development of IT infrastructure and Corporate Business Systems. This will include two key corporate systems: a phased development of a Performance Reporting Information System for Management (PRISM), and a resource accounting and budgeting system (CODA). Development work will resume in early 2000.

Our plans for major IT projects in the future will include: the upgrade of desktop operating systems and applications suite, the upgrade of desktop hardware, the replacement of the Management Information System, an electronic document management system, and contract administration.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how often she meets her French counterpart; and if she will make a statement. [100049]

Mr. Foulkes: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State frequently meets the French Minister for Co-operation, both bilaterally and at international meetings such as the EU Development Council and World Bank/IMF Development Committee. Their last bilateral meeting was on 18 November and they plan to meet again on 9 December.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Care Costs (Children)

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the cost of hotel accommodation for children in care in the North and West Belfast Trust in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [99266]

Mr. George Howarth: During the last 12 months North and West Belfast Health and Social Services Trust has used hotel accommodation for one young person in its care at a cost of £975.

DNA Register

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are registered on the DNA Register in Northern Ireland. [100320]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 29 November 1999]: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Forensic Science Agency under its chief executive, Dr. Adams. I have asked him for a reply to be given.

Letter from R. W. Adams to Mr. Jeffrey Donaldson, dated 29 November 1999:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question on how many people are on the DNA Register. At the end of October 1999 the Northern Ireland DNA database held profiles of 11,137 people.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

New Deal

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many lone parents have been contacted under the New Deal in (a) Greater London and (b) Leaside District; how many have attended an initial interview; and what proportion has been successfully placed in the employment option. [99634]

	Greater London [1]	Leaside ES District
Number of lone parents who have received invitation letters	84,840	[2]—
Number of lone parents attending an initial interview	12,740	552
Number of lone parents agreeing to participate in NDLP	11,090	471
Number lone parents gaining jobs	2,280	66
As a proportion of the number agreeing to participate (percentage)	21	14

[1] Greater London is defined as the following ES Districts: Thameside; Southwark; Lambeth; West End; Hackney and City; Crawley; Romford; Edgware; Wembley; West London; Ealing; Thames Gateway; Wandsworth; Sutton, Merton and Kingston; Ilford; Leaside; Croydon and Bromley; Lewisham.

[2] Data on the number of lone parents contacted in Leaside ES District are not available. The combined figure for the number of NDLP letters issued in Leaside and Edgware ES Districts is 10,680.

British Teachers (European Schools)

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he plans to take to secure an extension of the length of contracts of British teachers working in the European Schools beyond the current nine-year maximum. [100064]

Mr. Wicks: None.

FE Colleges

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects to receive the report from the National Audit Office concerning the funding of further education colleges. [100245]

Mr. Wicks: The timing of the presentation of National Audit Office reports to Parliament is decided by the Comptroller and Auditor General.

TECs

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what level of provision each TEC has made for the severance packages of its chief executive. [100109]

Mr. Wicks: The information requested is not held centrally.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what level of liabilities are reported in the accounts of each of the 72 TECs for 1998–99. [100105]

Mr. Wicks: The following table gives the liabilities for each of the 72 TECs as reported in their 1998–99 audited statutory accounts.

1998–99 TEC statutory accounts

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what contingency plans he has prepared to deal with under-estimated liabilities in the same manner as reserves and assets upon the winding up of the TECs. [100107]

Mr. Wicks: As private companies, it is ultimately the responsibility of each TEC to ensure it assesses its liabilities accurately and that it has available sufficient funds to meet these. The Secretary of State has no obligation through the contract to meet any liabilities which cannot be met from a TEC's own resources. However, through its contract with the TEC, the Secretary of State has agreed to put in place arrangements to provide funds to meet the costs arising after 25 March 2001 in respect of those persons already participating under Work Based Training for Young People and Work Based Learning for Adults so that they can complete their individual training plans. Similar arrangements also exist for any non-discretionary activity directly funded by the Secretary of State.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he is taking to ensure that the level of liabilities reported in TEC accounts is accurate and based on a realistic appraisal of the future costs each is likely to incur. [100106]

Mr. Wicks: TEC statutory accounts are required under company law to be audited by the TECs' external auditors. As part of their work, the auditors will have to satisfy themselves that the level of liabilities reported are valid and that the accounts give a true and fair view of the finances of the TEC. Government Offices are also discussing transition plans with TECs which include a detailed assessment of the assets and liabilities of each TEC.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the moneys each of the TECs is contributing to the legal fund controlled by the TEC National Council is listed as liabilities in their audited statutory accounts 1998–99; and if they are liabilities upon the Secretary of State's funds. [100108]

Mr. Wicks: The latest available audited statutory accounts are for the year ended 28 March 1999 and as such precede the announcement of the White Paper "Learning to Succeed". They do not include any liabilities for contributions to a legal fund.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list expenditure by each TEC (a) since the publication of the White Paper, "Learning to Succeed-a New Framework for Post-16 Learning" in June 1999 and (b) in the 12 months preceding its publication. [99935]

Mr. Wicks: The following table shows a list of expenditure in the 12 months preceding the publication which has been taken from the audited statutory accounts for the year ended 28 March 1999. For the period since the publication (July to September 1999) the TECs management accounts, although not directly comparable, show total expenditure of £370 million.

Students (Fees)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the effect of the imposition of higher education tuition fees on student enrolments, broken down by (a) socio-economic class, (b) duration of course and (c) area of study. [99936]

Mr. Wicks: The Government believe the new arrangements for paying higher education tuition fees, in which students from lower income groups pay no fees, are fair and just. Students from the lower socio-economic groups have not been deterred from applying to enter higher education. Nor is there evidence that student choice, in terms of subject of study and length of course, has been affected.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the effect of the statutory restrictions on charging full-time students for the setting of fees for modules of instruction in higher education institutions. [99937]

Mr. Wicks: Allowing higher education institutions to charge top-up fees would restrict access to students from less well-off backgrounds and limit student choice. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear that any institution which charges, or announces its intention to charge, top-up fees could incur financial penalties. He is not aware of any evidence that this has had a detrimental effect on the ability of higher education institutions to run the courses they wish to provide.

Tennis Courts, Banstead Downs

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when his Department will inform Banstead Downs Lawn Tennis Club of its decision on the club's proposal to purchase land owned by Surrey County Council and lay new tennis courts. [99576]

Jacqui Smith: The Secretary of State has not yet made a final decision on Surrey County Council's application to sell an area of playing field to Banstead Downs Lawn Tennis Club. He has, however, indicated that he is minded to reject the application and the Council has been invited to comment. He will not make a final decision on this case until he has had the opportunity to consider further representations from the Council.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Road Safety

18. Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the impact on road safety of the introduction of 20 mph zones. [99026]

Mr. Mullin: Following their introduction in 1991, monitoring of the first 20 mph zones showed a significant reduction in accident casualties, particularly among cyclists and pedestrians. We legislated in the summer to allow local authorities to make 20 mph speed limits and 20 mph zones without the need to obtain the consent of the Secretary of State. It is too early to judge the effect of that on road safety.

Traffic Congestion

19. Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to alleviate traffic congestion problems in Dobwalls, south-east Cornwall. [99027]

Mr. Hill: Pending the outcome of the London to south Wales and south-west multi-modal study, the Highways Agency is looking at measures to relieve congestion and improve safety and has started a process of consultation to obtain local views on options.

Regional Development

20. Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the strategy for regional development in the north-west. [99028]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government are currently assessing the regional strategies of all eight regional development agencies following their handover to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister on 26 October. We aim to respond to the RDAs by the end of the year.

34. Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the impact of the regional development agency in the north-west. [99044]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The North-West Development Agency has already made a good start. It has established itself as a significant regional body with the capability of improving skills and competitiveness and attracting inward investment in the north-west.

Millennium Villages

21. Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his plans for further millennium villages. [99030]

Ms Armstrong: The Deputy Prime Minister announced in October that a further five millennium communities competitions would take place. We are currently reviewing the lessons learnt from the first two schemes. English Partnerships jointly with the RDAs are being asked to come forward, with the support and active involvement of local communities, with options on suitable sites/localities for the competitions by February 2000. We have also asked them to examine further the options for delivering the competitive process and to present proposals within the same timeframe. We aim to announce the next millennium communities site in the spring of 2000.

We are also considering the findings of a research report commissioned by the Department earlier this year to create a framework to evaluate and measure millennium communities and other developments. This will be published in the new year.

We plan to disseminate the research widely and to promote a debate on its findings, including its proposals for a sustainability framework. We will also be disseminating the lessons learnt from the first two millennium communities so far.

Transatlantic Air Routes (Heathrow)

22. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to make an announcement regarding increasing the number of transatlantic air routes from Heathrow airport. [99031]

Mr. Mullin: The UK Government are keen to liberalise air services arrangements between the United Kingdom and the United States, but we need to ensure that we do this in a way which is balanced and which enables UK airlines to compete on fair terms.

Clean Fuels

23. Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to encourage the use of cleaner fuels. [99032]

30. Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to promote less polluting types of fuel. [99040]

Ms Beverley Hughes: We have already introduced fiscal incentives to encourage the use of ultra-low-sulphur diesel, which now makes up the vast majority of diesel supplied in this country, and road fuel gases. We will continue to promote the use of cleaner alterative fuels through the Powershift Programme and, through active participation in European programmes, to improve the environmental performance of conventional fuels. We will continue to look for opportunities for cost-effective ways to promote all cleaner fuels.

Rail Safety

24. Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to introduce legislation on maximum passenger numbers in railway carriages for safety reasons. [99033]

Mr. Hill: I have no plans for such legislation.

The Health and Safety Executive, which advises the Government on all rail safety matters, regard this issue as primarily one of passenger comfort, not safety.

Train operators must meet overcrowding standards laid down by the shadow Strategic Rail Authority for passenger comfort.

Local Services

25. Valerie Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of best value on the provision of local services to the public. [99034]

Ms Armstrong: An interim evaluation of the 40 best value pilot authorities, carried out by Warwick Business School, was published on 22 November. All the authorities found the best value framework more challenging than they had expected. After only 12 months work there have been real examples of improved services and cost savings, and real engagement with local people.

A3 (Hindhead)

26. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to visit the A3 at Hindhead to discuss environmental safety and economic issues. [99035]

Ms Armstrong: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Transport met the right hon. Member on 13 September, when they discussed all the principal issues associated with the problems on A3 at Hindhead. He undertook to visit the area when his diary permitted.

Ofwat

27. Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what effect pricing levels set by Ofwat for 2000–05 will have on the cost of services to consumers. [99037]

Mr. Mullin: On 25 November the Director General of Water Services announced his decisions on price limits for water and sewerage services for the period 2000–05. I have arranged for my hon. Friend to receive a copy of the Director General's decision.

Integrated Transport Strategy

28. Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how he intends to proceed with his plans for an integrated transport strategy; and if he will make a statement. [99038]

Mr. Hill: Our integrated transport strategy is already delivering results, including 1,800 new or enhanced rural bus services in England, and significant growth in the number of people travelling by train. Our Transport Bill will contain measures that will enable us to build on these achievements, providing more choice and improving everyone's quality of life.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

29. Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how the Government plan to strengthen the protection of sites of special scientific interest. [99039]

Mr. Mullin: The Government issued "A Framework for Action" in August, setting out proposals for improving the protection of SSSIs.

It was announced in the Queen's Speech on 17 November 1999, Official Report, columns 4–7 that the Countryside Amenity and Conservation Bill would be included in the legislative programme for this Session.

Rail Stations

31. Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he is taking to encourage the refurbishment of rail stations. [99041]

Mr. Hill: Railtrack is committed to completing its nationwide station regeneration programme by 2001. Station operators also have obligations under their franchise agreement to meet a number of basic standards, such as cleanliness and lighting, within 18 months of taking over the franchise; and within three years, further obligations in respect of public communications systems and waiting accommodation.

Dumping

32. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers he has to prevent the dumping in rural areas of worn-out tractors and other agricultural vehicles. [99042]

Mr. Mullin: The Secretary of State has no such powers.

London Underground

33. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the operation of London Underground's current safety regime. [99043]

Mr. Hill: Safety is, and remains, the top priority for London Underground Ltd. (LUL). The Railway (Safety Case) Regulations 1994 require London Underground to prepare a safety case setting out its approach to safety management.

The most recent version of this safety case was accepted by HM railway inspectorate on 14 September 1999 and LUL's performance against it will be subject to HMRI monitoring and review.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what central Government support the Tube will continue to receive in 2000–01 and 2001–02; and what continuing support he estimates will be required in subsequent years. [99571]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 24 November 1999]: London Transport (LT) have been allocated Government support of £248.7 million for 2000–01. This figure does not include money earmarked for residual expenditure on the Jubilee Line Extension.

Some of this funding will be transferred to the Mayor in July next year, when Transport for London (TFL) assumes responsibility for LT activities other than the Underground.

Levels of Government support for the Underground in 2001–02 and thereafter have not yet been determined. They will depend on whether and on what terms Public-Private Partnership (PPP) contracts are let; decisions on the level of Government funding to be taken following the 2000 spending review; and decisions on funding and fares made by the Mayor for London.

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what performance targets have been set arising from projected expenditure of £1,190 million on the Piccadilly line and (b) £900 million on the Victoria line of the London Underground over the next 15 years; and if he will make a statement. [99638]

Mr. Hill: The figures quoted were London Underground's indicative estimates of the likely cost of achieving the performance specification to be set out in the PPP contracts. In fact, it will be the responsibility of the Underground's private sector partners to determine the actual level of investment required to deliver the improved performance we want.

Details of the performance targets have yet to be finalised, but they will require improvements in capability, availability, ambience and asset condition. This will enable London Underground to provide passengers with faster, more reliable and more comfortable journeys.

New Deal for Communities

35. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the progress of the New Deal for Communities in Sheffield. [99045]

Ms Armstrong: I am delighted that Sheffield is one of the 22 areas eligible to put forward proposals for the transformation of a deprived neighbourhood under the second round of the New Deal for Communities. I will ensure that local people, businesses and organisations get the support they need to deliver real equality of opportunity and choice in that neighbourhood.

Peat Working Group

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made by the Peat Working Group. [100993]

Mr. Raynsford: The Peat Working Group, which has been reviewing the adequacy of existing planning policies and guidance on the extraction and use of peat since 1997, has published a report of its work today.

I am grateful to the Peat Working Group for providing this factual assessment of the complex and wide-ranging issues surrounding peat extraction and the use of growing media in horticulture and gardening.

This Government are committed to ensuring that there is adequate protection for our habitats and wildlife. We are already looking very carefully at the risk of damage caused by peat extraction to sites of national and international importance.

The group considers that existing Government policy is sufficient to safeguard areas of existing conservation or archaeological value from future proposals for peat working sites. But a number of active sites granted planning permission before their conservation value was recognised continue to be worked, despite their designation or identification as sites of national or international importance.

We are currently looking at options for bringing forward reviews of consents on Natura 2000 sites. In addition, we have also asked English Nature to look closely at the effects of all planning permissions, not just those affecting peat bogs, on sites of special scientific interest (SSSIs).

However, it is clear from the group's work that despite continuing improvements in the quality and marketing of alternatives, there continues to be a strong demand for peat as a growing medium, particularly by the amateur gardener and the professional horticulture sector. I welcome the suggestions made by the working group about how sales of alternative materials for growing plants could be increased, and we shall now be considering how to take this forward.

A copy of the report has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Bellwin Scheme (Floods)

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will provide financial assistance to Worcester City Council under the Bellwin scheme for costs incurred following the severe flooding in the area between 27 October and 3 November 1998. [101102]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I am satisfied that financial assistance under the Bellwin scheme is justified in the case of Worcester City Council given the exceptional nature of the floods and the damage caused. A scheme will, therefore, be established under section 155 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989. Grant has generally been paid to authorities at a rate of 85 per cent. of their eligible expenditure above a threshold. However, a Bellwin scheme was activated for Worcester as a result of the 1998 Easter floods. Since Worcester have already spent over their threshold for 1998–99 in dealing with that emergency, it seems reasonable that they should not have to do so in dealing with a second incident in the same financial year. I therefore propose to waive the threshold.

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will provide financial assistance to Herefordshire District Council under the Bellwin scheme for costs incurred following the severe flooding in the area on three occasions during 1998–99. [101103]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I am satisfied that financial assistance under the Bellwin scheme is justified in the case of Herefordshire District Council given the exceptional nature of the floods and the damage caused. A scheme will, therefore, be established under section 155 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989. Grant will be paid to the authority to cover 85 per cent. of the eligible costs above a threshold which have been incurred by the authority in dealing with the flooding.

Aviation Safety

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends to publish the Government's reply to the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee's report into aviation safety published on 21 July. [101123]

Mr. Mullin: The Government have laid before the House today a Command Paper—4539—which is a consolidated response on behalf of the Government and of the Civil Aviation Authority (CAA) to the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee's Fourteenth Report, titled "Aviation Safety", published on 21 July 1999.

The Government welcome the "Aviation Safety" report, which covered a wide-ranging and detailed examination of aviation safety issues by the Committee. We note that the evidence the Committee received showed that the United Kingdom has an excellent safety record, particularly in the commercial aviation sector. The Committee seeks reassurance that all necessary steps are being taken to maintain that record in the face of the challenges presented by a dynamic and growing industry, in which the UK is a world leader. The Government and the CAA agree that the current high standard of aviation safety in the United Kingdom must be maintained and, where possible, improved. We fully recognise that aviation safety requires constant vigilance by regulators and the regulated alike.

The Committee makes 29 recommendations, some to the Government, some to the CAA, and others to both. Both we and the CAA have considered the recommendations fully and carefully and they are dealt with in turn, and in detail, in the Command Paper.

Telecommunications Masts

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to review the current legislation relating to telecommunications masts. [99311]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 23 November 1999]: The installation of any telecommunications mast in a National Park, an Area of Outstanding Natural Beauty, a conservation area, a Site of Special Scientific Interest and the Broads, or a mast of more than 15 metres in height elsewhere, is subject to a full planning application. In other cases, licensed telecommunications code system operators are authorised under Part 24 of Schedule 2 to the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995 (GPDO) to install masts of up to 15 metres in height. This is subject to a prior approval procedure, under which the local planning authority has the opportunity to say whether it wishes to approve details of the siting and appearance of the installation.

These GPDO provisions were amended earlier this year by SI 1999 No. 1661. We have no current plans to make further changes to the GPDO in respect of telecommunication masts.

The Government are aware of public concern about mobile phone systems and health and has set up an independent expert group to advise on possible risks to public health. The group, chaired by Sir William Stewart FRS, FRSE, is currently holding open meetings around the UK to take views.

Dry Stone Walls

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what proposals he has to protect dry stone walls in areas of outstanding natural beauty and conservation; and if he will make a statement; [99531]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of dry stone walls which have been removed from upland country over the last (a) five and (b) 10 years. [99530]

Mr. Mullin: This information is not available. However, the Countryside Survey 1990 estimated that the total length of dry stone walls in upland areas of Great Britain in 1990 was 99,710 km, which represented a reduction in length of 13 per cent. since 1984.

The most appropriate way of tackling the loss of dry stone walls is by encouraging their restoration and maintenance. Grants are currently available in England under the Countryside Stewardship and Environmentally Sensitive Areas schemes operated by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Before taking decisions on any legislative protection, we shall need to take account of the possible impact of any regulatory proposals, as well as the results of the Countryside Survey 2000, which will provide up-to-date estimates of the changes in length and condition of dry stone walls.

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent discussions he has had with (a) the Peak District and (b) the North Yorkshire national parks about the destruction of dry stone walls. [99532]

Mr. Mullin: The destruction of dry stone walls has not been raised in recent discussions held with the Peak District or North Yorkshire national parks.

GM Oilseed Rape (Royston)

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when genetically modified winter oilseed rape was planted at Summerhouse Farm, Royston, Hertfordshire, under consent 98/R19/18; and if he will publish the opinion of the farm-scale evaluations scientific steering committee on the relevance of the planting to biodiversity. [99537]

Mr. Mullin: The genetically modified winter oilseed rape planted at Summerhouse Farm, Royston, Hertfordshire, under consent 98/R19/18, was planted between 19 August and 14 September 1999. The trial is for research and development purposes by the consent holder AgrEvo and consists of a number of small field plots each approximately 20 square metres. It is not a field scale release and is not subject to any consideration by the farm-scale evaluations scientific steering committee.

Post Offices

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the principal activities of his Department and its agencies which provide business for (a) Crown post offices and (b) other post offices; if he will assess whether the level of business generated in each case is likely to increase or decrease over the next five years; and which new areas of business for post offices are likely to be developed by his Department and its agencies over the same period. [99558]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The information is as follows:

General activities

My Department uses the Royal Mail for postal services. The level of business is likely to be affected by the increased use of the internet and e-mail.

Driver Vehicle Licensing Agency

The DVLA collects vehicle excise duty through 4,000 post offices in Great Britain—of these 584 are Crown Offices. All 18,500 post offices issue licence savings stamps, application forms and information leaflets. Trials are to be introduced under the current contract with Post Office Counters Ltd. to improve service levels and DVLA and POCL are discussing the possibility of introducing an over the counter application form and identification checking service. POCL will be invited to bid when the contract is re-tendered in 2002.

Vehicle Inspectorate

The Inspectorate, through the DVLA contract, uses the post office network for relicensing vehicles by checking the validity of MOT certificates. The Inspectorate is developing an MOT computerisation project and is exploring ways in which the post office can support the project. This may reduce the level of special deliveries made by the post office on behalf of the Inspectorate.

Ward Boundaries

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what criteria the Local Government Boundary Commission must follow in the creation of local authority ward boundaries. [99762]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Local Government Commission's statutory criteria for electoral reviews are to secure effective and convenient local government and to reflect the interests and identities of local communities. They must also take into account statutory rules which include that the number of local government electors shall be, as nearly as may be, the same in every ward of the district; that every ward of a parish with a parish council shall lie wholly within a single ward of the district; and have regard to the desirability of fixing boundaries which are and will remain easily identifiable.

Red Routes

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to extend priority red routes (a) in London and (b) to other cities. [100070]

Mr. Hill: There are no plans to extend red routes in London. From July 2000, the red route network will be replaced by the GLA road network and will become the responsibility of the Mayor. Elsewhere, it is primarily for local authorities to use their existing traffic management powers to control parking effectively and give appropriate priority to buses. We look to them to so do, in the context of developing their local transport plans and bus strategies.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what assessment he has made of the effect of priority red routes in London on carbon dioxide emissions; [100069]

(2) what assessment he has made of the effect of priority red routes on the number of accidents on (a) red routes and (b) other roads; [100071]

(3) what assessment he has made of the effect of priority red routes on local air quality in each London borough; [100068]

(4) what assessment he has made of the effect of priority red routes, in each London borough, on (a) the volume of motorised traffic and (b) traffic speeds on (i) red routes and (ii) other roads. [100067]

Mr. Hill: The Traffic Director for London monitors the effects of the traffic management measures on the red route network (the network) as a whole (not individually by borough) to determine the performance of the network. Reports on these are published annually. His latest report shows:

(a) traffic volumes have not changed on the network during the period of implementation;

(b)(i) depending on time of day, average journey speeds on the network were between 17.0 and 22.9 mph in 1998. This is a considerable improvement on the journey speeds of between 14.3 and 18.4 mph in 1994 before red route implementation commenced;

(b)(ii) The Traffic Director does not monitor journey speeds off the network.

The Traffic Director for London maintains a record of traffic conditions on red routes from which it is possible to gain a better understanding of the changes in emissions from road vehicles. He does not directly monitor air quality but uses the collected data to model emissions. Between 1995–97 the model shows between 3 per cent. and 5 per cent. less carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons emissions on implemented sections of the red route compared with non-implemented sections.

According to the model used by the Traffic Director for London between 1995–97, emissions of carbon dioxide on the network were approximately 2 per cent. less where red route measures had been implemented in comparison with those sections of the network that had not yet been implemented.

The Traffic Director for London monitors accidents at the end of each year. His current data on accidents show that the number of personal injury accidents on the network has reduced by 8.8 per cent. compared with a 0.5 per cent. reduction on other roads in London.

Railway Accidents

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the railway accidents in each year between 1989 and 1999, giving the numbers of fatalities and those injured in each accident. [100188]

Mr. Hill: The information is not available in the form requested.

Comprehensive statistics relating to all railway accidents in Great Britain can be found in the Health and Safety Executive's HM Chief Inspector of Railways' Annual Reports on Railway Safety. Latest statistics for 1998–99 are due to be published on 2 December. These figures include an analysis of the number of train accidents, by causation, and the total number of fatalities and injuries each year. The analysis of fatalities and injuries is by type of accident and identity of the person involved, e.g. passenger, member of railway staff. Arrangements are being made for copies of the Annual Report to be available in the House Libraries once published. Copies of previous Annual Reports are already in the House Libraries.

Bus Services (Regulation)

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to introduce regulation for bus services. [99866]

Mr. Hill: We will be including measures in the forthcoming Transport Bill to fulfil our manifesto commitment to the proper regulation of buses at the local level. We expect to make a further announcement shortly.

Railway Maintenance Staff

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each year since 1979 for which figures are available the number of maintenance staff who were (a) killed and (b) injured on the railway network. [100058]

Mr. Hill: The information is not available in the detail requested, although there are statistics on the total number of railway staff killed and injured in the period in question, as set out in the table. "Railway staff" includes all rail workers (drivers, station staff etc.) as well as maintenance staff.

Track Identification

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will assess the advantages and disadvantages in terms of rail safety of changing the system of track identification from the current up and down system to numbering each track. [100060]

Mr. Hill: The convention adopted for identifying railway tracks varies from location to location and is the result of historic custom and practice. While it may seem attractive to impose a rationalised uniform system of identification, the risks involved in the transition could outweigh the benefits of the change. Safe operation of the railway often depends on drivers, signallers and other workers correctly identifying tracks; acquiring the necessary knowledge of the geography and layout of the railway is an important part of ensuring their competence. Change to weil-established names could well increase the probability of errors.

Victorian Parks

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to take action to improve the state of Victorian parks in Britain, in response to the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee's report of Session 1998–99 on Town and Country Parks (HC 477). [100281]

Ms Beverley Hughes: We welcome the recent report from the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee on Town and Country Parks. We share the Committee's concern about the quality and future of Victorian parks. We will publish our full response to the report in the new year.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what are the Government's carbon dioxide emission targets for (a) 2011, (b) 2012, (c) 2014, (d) 2016, (e) 2018 and (f) 2020. [100481]

Mr. Hill: Following Kyoto in 1997, the UK has a target to reduce a basket of 6 greenhouse gases, including carbon dioxide, by 12.5 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2008–12. The Government also have a domestic goal to cut emissions of carbon dioxide by 20 per cent. by 2010. The Kyoto protocol requires international discussions about targets beyond 2012 to begin by 2005 at the latest.

The Government will shortly be publishing a draft UK climate change programme for consultation. The draft programme will recognise that Kyoto is only the start of the process and that greater cuts in emissions will be needed over time. It will therefore set out our policies and measures directed at our current commitments, but also to help prepare the UK for more challenging targets in the future.

Gipsy Caravans

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how many gipsy caravans were counted in each local authority area in the January and July counts of (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999; and how many of those caravans were parked on unauthorised sites; [100485]

(2) what is his current estimate of the number of (a) gipsy caravans and (b) other travellers' vehicles in England. [100486]

Mr. Mullin: The figures for the latest five counts of gipsy caravans broken down by local authority are routinely placed in the Libraries of both Houses as soon as they become available. They include details of the numbers of gipsy caravans on authorised (public and private) sites and on unauthorised sites in every local authority area. Figures for January 1997 to January 1999 are included in the table which was published in May this year, and the figures for July 1997 to July 1999 are included in the table which was published in October this year.

At the time of the count of gipsy caravans in July this year, there was a total of 13,399 gipsy caravans on authorised (public and private) sites and on unauthorised sites in England. Gipsies are defined in legislation as "persons of nomadic habit of life, whatever their race or origin".

The Department does not keep records of the number of vehicles belonging to other travellers who do not fall within that definition.

Correspondence

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will reply to the letter of 26 July from the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire on behalf of his constituent Mrs. Montgomery. [100400]

Ms Armstrong: We have no record of receiving the right hon. Members' letter dated 26 July. If he would like to forward a further copy it will be dealt with promptly.

Westminster Underground

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when Westminster underground station will be open to Jubilee Line services. [100438]

Mr. Hill: London Transport aim to open the Jubilee Line station at Westminster shortly before Christmas. It is, however, a very deep and highly complex station, being constructed on an extremely constricted site. LT cannot therefore guarantee the opening date at present. By early December it should be possible to be more precise.

Farm-based Tourism

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent guidance he has issued to planning authorities with regard to farm-based tourism and other farm diversification projects; and when such guidance was issued. [100274]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Planning Policy Guidance (PPG) note 7 on the Countryside recognises the importance of farm-based diversification in a changing rural economy and gives guidance on development related to agriculture and to farm diversification, including tourism. The guidance takes account of the research report "Planning for Rural Diversification", published in 1995, which was accompanied by a good practice guide.

Rating Revaluation

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to ensure that, during the revaluation of non-domestic properties from 1 April 2000, unqualified rating advisers are not able to conduct business. [100268]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Non-domestic ratepayers must remain free to engage the services of anyone they wish. However, they should be aware that unscrupulous operators are active in this field and may not offer a fully professional service.

Members of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors (RICS), the Incorporated Society of Valuers and Auctioneers (ISVA) and the Institute of Revenues Rating and Valuation (IRRV), are regulated by rules of professional conduct designed to protect the public from misconduct, and are required to hold adequate professional indemnity insurance.

Before employing a rating adviser who is not a member of one of these bodies, ratepayers should satisfy themselves that he or she has the necessary knowledge and experience, as well as appropriate indemnity insurance.

My Department will be strongly reinforcing this message in the run up to the revaluation. It will be included in the information that we intend should be sent to all ratepayers early next year.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how agreements entered into by trade associations with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions for the purpose of securing 80 per cent. climate change levy discount will be enforced against members of such trade associations. [100460]

Mr. Mullin: The agreements are not intended to be legally binding upon members of trade associations or any other entities which the associations may represent. The agreements are a mechanism by which, if environmental targets are met, a reduction in the climate change levy will be made. It is this incentive which will deliver the necessary environmental outcome in the public interest.

Local Government (Finance)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those local authorities which have negative housing subsidy; and if he will set out in respect of each authority the sum being transferred this year from the Housing Revenue Account to the General Fund and the value of the transfer as expressed in Band D Council Tax per taxpayer. [100318]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 29 November 1999]: The latest information we have on the authorities that are expected to be in "negative housing subsidy" for 1999–2000 is shown in the table.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to review the local authority capping system in relation to housing benefit. [100093]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 29 November 1999]: My Department will be consulting shortly on the detail of the proposals for changes in the housing revenue account subsidy regime. Consideration of the outcome of that exercise will be required before any decisions are taken. It is too early to say what the impact of any changes will be.

Local Government (Structure)

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he next plans to review the structure of local government in England; and if he will make a statement. [100787]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward) on 1 November 1999, Official Report, column 12W.

Agricultural Land

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to protect high-grade agricultural land from development; and if he will make a statement. [100578]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government's Planning Policy Guidance (PPG) note 7 on the countryside gives detailed advice on development affecting agricultural land. Local planning authorities should take account of the quality of any agricultural land that would be lost through development proposals, both when preparing their development plans and when considering planning applications.

Planning Policy Guidance

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the response to the consultation on the revised draft PPG 3 on Housing; and when he expects to publish the new guidance. [100577]

Ms Beverley Hughes: My Department received over 600 responses to the consultation on the draft new PPG3 on Housing, in addition to a report from the Environment, Transport and the Regional Affairs Committee. The final version of PPG3 will be published in the New Year.

Council Housing

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to change the rules and financial arrangements of the large-scale voluntary transfer scheme for council houses; and if he will make a statement. [100096]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 29 November 1999]: We have recently proposed several changes to the rules and financial arrangements of the large-scale voluntary transfer programme. Details are set out below:

proposals to help authorities whose capital receipt after transfer would be insufficient to cover all of their housing debt; moving away from the current system of running an annual programme to one which gives authorities greater flexibility; changes to the way in which the LSVT levy is calculated.

In addition, we recently announced that authorities may capitalise the cost of higher rent expenditure for up to three years after transfer, thereby reducing the cost to their general fund.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his policy on large-scale voluntary transfer of council houses; what assistance his Department gives to councils considering such a scheme; and if he will make a statement. [100094]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 29 November 1999]: We are keen for local authorities to pursue transfer where it is clearly part of their housing strategy and will improve the living conditions of tenants and the service they receive. However, authorities are under no compulsion to transfer their stock. My Department publishes guidance for local authorities which are considering transferring their stock.

Out-of-town Shopping

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on Government policy on out-of-town shopping development. [99023]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government's policy on out-of-town shopping development was set out in our response to the House of Commons Environment Committee report on shopping centres in July 1997 [CMND 3729], in which we reaffirmed our commitment to planning policy guidance note 6 (PPG6) on town centres and retail developments, and was subsequently reiterated in the Opposition Day debate on 24 June 1999, Official Report, columns 1350–56, and in further evidence to the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee on 27 October this year.

Carbon Dioxide

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has had from the IEA Greenhouse Gas Research and Development Programme on the technology of carbon dioxide capture and sequestration. [99442]

Mr. Meacher: The Government help to fund the IEA Greenhouse Gas R&D Programme under contract with the DTI. DETR receives all reports produced under this contract.

DETR also commissioned the IEA Greenhouse Gas R&D Programme to contribute to a report on carbon sequestration submitted to the Panel on Sustainable Development.

British Railways Board

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with the British Railways Board concerning the planned disposal of the board's land holdings. [100679]

Mr. Hill: In July last year the Government announced a suspension of sales of British Rail property pending a review of it by the BR Board. Following the review, the Government have agreed with the Chairman of the BR Board (now part of the shadow Strategic Rail Authority) the lifting of the sales suspension and the introduction of new marketing procedures for the disposal of its land holdings which will give priority to transport use. BR's "Marketing Process" document which gives further details is available in the House Library.

Railtrack (Advertising Revenue)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the arrangements whereby Railtrack receives revenue from advertising hoardings which were previously in the ownership of British Rail. [100680]

Mr. Hill: This is a commercial matter for Railtrack.

Environment Agency

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the results of the current consultation upon the performance of the Environment Agency. [100142]

Mr. Mullin: My Department is not currently consulting upon the performance of the Environment Agency.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals the Government have for the future of the Environment Agency. [100143]

Mr. Mullin: As part of the Government's programme of regular five-yearly financial management and policy reviews of non-departmental public bodies, my Department will be conducting a thorough review of the Environment Agency next year, in conjunction with MAFF and the National Assembly for Wales.

Trains (Bicycle Facilities)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent discussions he has had with the train operating companies about facilities for bicycles on trains. [100693]

Mr. Hill: The Secretary of State has not held discussions with the train operating companies about facilities for bicycles on trains. On 29 September he issued the Franchising Director with new Instructions and Guidance (copy in the House Library) which ask him to promote the use of bicycles by seeking the provision of reasonable facilities on board new rolling stock and at stations. The Franchising Director's staff hold discussions about bicycle provision with train operating companies whenever new rolling stock is ordered.

Information Technology

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what are the (a) costs and (b) time scales of IT projects which are being undertaken by his Department; if he will list the (i) start date, (ii) planned completion date, (iii) expected completion date, (iv) planned cost and (v) current estimated cost of these projects; and if he will make a statement. [100795]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 22 November 1999, Official Report, column 21W. The information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ferry Services (Passenger Registration)

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what representations he has received in relation to the introduction of full passenger registration systems on small ferry services; [98659]

(2) what assessment he has made of how small ferry services will meet full passenger registration regulations. [98660]

Mr. Hill: Following political agreement to the EC Directive 98/41, a working group was set up with representatives of all sectors of the passenger ship industry to discuss how the Directive could be implemented. The industry urged flexibility, and the UK regulations were accordingly drafted to allow operators the freedom to determine the particular arrangements to be used for counting and registration, provided that those arrangements comply with the terms of the Directive.

My Department also formally consulted the industry on the draft regulations, which would transpose the Directive into UK law. Representations were received from the following in response to the consultation exercise, and were taken into account before the national regulations were made on 30 June 1999:

British Ports Association
Caledonian MacBrayne
Central Scotland Passenger Vessel Association
Chamber of Shipping
Confederation of Passenger Transport
NUMAST
National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers
Orkney Islands Council
Passenger Shipping Association Road Haulage Association
Seafrance
Shetland Islands Council
South Coast Passenger Vessel Operators Association
The UK Major Ports Group Ltd.
Waverley Excursions Ltd.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the financial implications of the full passenger registration system for small ferry companies. [98661]

Mr. Hill: Most small ferry companies are unaffected because they do not operate in waters to which the directive applies the registration system. A compliance cost assessment was prepared while directive 98/41 was being negotiated. The estimated total cost to those British shipping lines and ports affected was around £6 million for the initial capital cost of implementation, with annual revenue of around £2.5 million. These estimates were based on information provided by the shipping industry. Copies of the compliance cost assessment are in the House Library.

Capper Pass and Son Ltd.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps the Health and Safety Executive has taken to ensure that the medical records of former employees of Capper Pass and Son Ltd., working at the Capper Pass smelting plant, were retained by their parent company Rio Tinto. [100104]

Mr. Prescott: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) has not been able to identify any specific communication in its files with Capper Pass concerning the retention of medical records around the time when the Capper Pass smelter closed in 1991. The HSE doctor who dealt with Capper Pass at that time no longer works for HSE.

Duties are placed on employers in specific legislation controlling the use of lead and ionising radiation to retain certain records, and to retain certain health-related information under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations 1989. HSE inspectors do not routinely follow up the retention of records every time premises close.

In recent months, due to problems concerning release of the records to representatives of former employees of Capper Pass, HSE staff have communicated with Rio Tinto plc about the retention and ownership of the records. I have corresponded with Rio Tinto senior staff and have been assured that Rio Tinto's senior occupational physician is arranging for relevant medical files to be released to those acting for former employees as soon as practicable.

Motor Vehicles (Pollution)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures the Government are taking to limit pollution from motor vehicles. [99018]

Mr. Hill: The UK has played a central role in the development of tighter European vehicle emission and fuel quality standards. On a domestic level, we are encouraging the use of cleaner vehicles through fiscal incentives, the work of the cleaner vehicles task force and the Powershift programme. These measures are expected to reduce significantly the emissions from road vehicles over the next few years.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Representation of the People Bill

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment his Department has made of the effects on e-commerce and user verification of the proposals restricting access to the electoral register contained in the Representation of the People Bill. [100672]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have been asked to reply.

A regulatory impact statement relating to the Representation of the People Bill was placed in the Library on 18 November to coincide with the Bill's introduction.

Fireworks

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many reports he has received in each of the last five years of accidents caused by unsafe fireworks; and if he will make a statement. [99296]

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people have sustained injuries as a result of accidents involving fireworks in 1999. [100604]

Dr. Howells: Figures on the numbers and types of injuries caused by fireworks and treated at hospital Accident and Emergency units in England, Scotland and Wales during the four week period covering the run-up to 5 November and a few days afterwards are as follows:

	Figures
1997	908
1996	1,233
1995	1,530
1994	1,574

The statistics do not indicate whether the injury was due to a firework malfunctioning or to misuse.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many accidents involving fireworks have been recorded in the last 12 months. [99288]

Dr. Howells: Because injuries from fireworks are concentrated in the period around 5 November, the statistics of the Home Accident Surveillance System do not provide a reliable picture of injury levels. Accordingly, my Department conducts a census of injuries requiring treatment at a hospital A & E department in England, Scotland or Wales during the four week period covering the run-up to 5 November and a few days afterwards. The results for the census for the 1999 season are not yet available but I shall publish them before spring 2000.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received in the last 12 months on the sale of fireworks. [99287]

Dr. Howells: I have received a total of 224 representations on fireworks safety matters, comprised of 104 letters from Parliamentary colleagues, 13 Parliamentary questions and 107 letters from the public.

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to prevent the display of fireworks for sale until 27 December. [100608]

Dr. Howells: Following discussions with my Department, the British Pyrotechnists' Association has agreed that it will advise retailers that fireworks should be displayed for sale only from 27 December. I welcome and support the agreement because I want to avoid the possibility of people buying fireworks and storing them over the Christmas period.

Arms Exports

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the applications made for licences to export (a) military explosives or additives and (b) equipment for the production of military explosives to (i) India, (ii) the Republic of Korea, (iii) Pakistan or (iv) Singapore, indicating their outcome in each case. [99744]

Dr. Howells: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible, and place a copy of that letter in the Library of the House.

Export Licences

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many export licences for the sale of (a) BAe Hawks, (b) Alvis Scorpion vehicles and (c) Tactica water cannons have been issued in 1999. [99300]

Dr. Howells: The entry in the relevant legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating; the export of "aircraft", unmanned airborne vehicles, aero-engines and "aircraft" equipment, related "goods" and components, specially designed or modified for military use is controlled under ML10; the export of ground vehicles and components thereof specially designed or modified for military use is controlled under ML6, water cannon under PL5001 and other ground vehicles under PL5031. The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated and the following results were obtained. Between 1 January 1999 and 12 November 1999, 1,850 Standard Individual Export Licences (SIELs) and 84 Open Individual Export Licences (OIELs) were issued covering the export of goods with the relevant ratings. Individual licences may cover a range of goods with various ratings and where this is so the licence is included in the Table in the total for all of the relevant ratings.

Individual licences issued between 1 January 1999 and 12 November 1999 covering the export of goods with the relevant ratings

Rating	Number of SIELs issued covering goods with this rating	Number of OIELs issued covering goods with this rating
ML6	270	19
ML10	1,527	62

It would entail disproportionate cost to establish which, if any of these licences covered the export of the particular types of equipment concerned, and make any subsequent inquiries necessary under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Information on export licensing decisions in 1999, including details of the military equipment licensed, will be set out in the 1999 Annual Report on Strategic Export Controls, which will be published in due course.

This information should be considered in light of the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) on 27 July 1999, Official Report, columns 307W-08W.

Copies of all Open General Export Licences valid at any time during the period are in the Library of the House.

Consumer Products (Environmental Impact)

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) pursuant to the report by the Select Committee on the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs on Reducing the Environmental Impact of Consumer Products (HC149), what further regulatory measures he intends to take in respect of on-pack claims about the environmental impact of products; [100040]

(2) what assessment he has made of the conclusions of the report by the National Consumer Council entitled, The Green Claims Code: Is it Working? (reference PD53/B2/99). [100039]

Dr. Howells: In the White Paper "Modern Markets: Confident Consumers" (Cm4410) published in July we said that we would explore the extent to which the Director General of Fair Trading's powers under the Control of Misleading Advertisements Regulations could be used more effectively to combat misleading on-pack environmental claims. My Department and the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions are doing this with the trading standards service and the Office of Fair Trading (OFT). OFT is currently investigating a range of claims with a view to taking appropriate action and is using, among other sources of information, the results of the NCC shopping survey.

I was encouraged to note that the NCC report recognises that there have already been improvements in a number of sectors in the short period between publication of the Green Claims Code and the NCC's research and I understand that the OFT's initial work has revealed that there has been some further improvement since.

Renewable Energy

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure that renewable energy will not be disadvantaged under the new electricity trading arrangements. [100456]

Mrs. Liddell: DTI and Ofgem published jointly in October a Conclusions document on the New Electricity Trading Arrangements following wide consultation with the renewables generators and others. Significant steps have been taken to improve the ability of renewables generators to operate effectively and these are described in the document. The objective of the new arrangements is to establish a level playing field for all types of generation, including that from renewable sources.

The Government remain strongly committed to encouraging generation of electricity from renewable sources. I expect to announce shortly how support for renewable generation will be managed in future.

Corporate Assets

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the current value of land and property (i) in Scotland, (ii) in the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas and (iv) in total within the responsibility of (a) the Design Council, (b) the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, (c) ACAS, (d) UKAEA, (e) the National Consumers Council, (f) the Gas Consumers Council and (g) other executive non-departmental public bodies. [99817]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The net book value of land and buildings held by the UKAEA as at 31 March 1999 was: (i) £2.6 million in Scotland, (ii) £83.5 million in the United Kingdom and (iii) nil overseas.

The Design Council, the Competition Commission (previously the Monopolies and Mergers Commission), ACAS, the National Consumers Council, the Gas Consumers Council and other executive non-departmental public bodies (other than the Research Councils) do not own land or property but rent or lease accommodation to meet their requirements.

Values for the land and property of the seven science Research councils are published in their Annual Accounts and the latest DTI Annual Expenditure Plans Report (Cm4211). As expenditure from the Science Budget is deemed to be for the benefit of the UK as a whole, data are not collected in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportion cost.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the estimated value of land and property (i) in Scotland, (ii) in the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas and (iv) in total within the responsibility of (a) the National Weights and Measures Laboratory, (b) the Insolvency Service, (c) the Radiocommunications Agency, (d) the Employment Tribunals Service, (e) Companies House and (f) the Patent Office; and if he will further estimate the value of (1) plant and machinery, (2) vehicles, (3) office equipment and machinery, (4) telecommunications equipment, (5) computer equipment and systems, (6) furniture and fittings and (7) other assets for each of these bodies. [99818]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 26 November 1999]: Values for the assets of my Department's Executive Agencies, including land and property, can be found in their Annual Reports and Accounts, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. Assets are broken down into broad categories as appropriate for each Agency. The breakdown of this information into the categories requested could be done only at disproportionate cost. Land and property in the United Kingdom owned by these bodies as of 31 March 1999 had a net book value of £36,679,000, of which the value of land and property in Scotland was £824,000. No DTI Agency owns land or property overseas.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the value of land and property in (i) Scotland, (ii) the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas and (iv) total within the responsibility of (a) Magnox Electric plc, (b) British Nuclear Fuels plc, (c) the Post Office, (d) British Coal. [99814]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 26 November 1999]: Magnox Electric plc merged with BNFL plc in 1997–98. The net book value of land and buildings of the Group as at 31 March, as included in the 1998–99 Report and Accounts, was £2,072 million. The net book value of land and buildings held by the Post Office as at 28 March, as included in its 1998–99 Report and Accounts, was £1,579 million. The geographical analysis requested could be provided only for these bodies at disproportionate cost.

British Coal has transferred its remaining land and property to the Coal authority, an executive non-departmental public body. The net book value of land and property owned by the Coal Authority as at 31 March 1999 was (i) £3.5 million in Scotland, (ii) £16.1 million in the United Kingdom and (iii) nil overseas.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate (a) the current value of land and buildings (including freehold, historic leasehold, and leasehold interests) in (i) Scotland, (ii) the UK, (iii) overseas and (iv) in total, and (b) the value of (1) office machinery and equipment, (2) telecommunications equipment, (3) computer equipment, (4) furniture and fittings, (5) scientific equipment, (6) heritage assets, (7) intangible assets, (8) long term debtors and (9) shareholdings held by his Department. [99659]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The estimate of the value of land and buildings held by this Department is:

(i) Scotland	717,000
(ii) UK	25,657,000
(iii) Overseas	0
(iv) Total	25,657,000

The value of the other categories of assets requested are:

(1) Office Machinery and Equipment	236,000
(2) Telecommunications Equipment	89,000
(3) Computer Equipment	3,090,000
(4) Furniture and Fittings	3,127,000
(5) Scientific Equipment	14,767,000
(6) Heritage Assets	0
(7) Intangible Assets	0
(8) Long-term debtors	12,770,000
(9) Shareholdings:
Historic Cost	32,668,000
Market Value	29,701,000

The figures supplied for (i) to (iv), and (1) to (7) are based on current cost net book values as at 31 March 1999, after allowing for depreciation. The estimates for land and buildings include freehold and historic leasehold property but do not include buildings occupied under operating leases. Shareholdings for which no markets exists are shown at historic cost; other shareholdings are shown at market price as at 31 march 1999.

Measurement Conversion

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the conversion of measurement from imperial to metric will be finally concluded; and if he will make a statement. [99853]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 26 November 1999]: Under legislation made in 1994, goods sold loose by weight—mainly fresh food—must be priced and weighed in grams and kilograms after 31 December 1999. This change will complete the metrication programme for units of measurement that are used for trade within the meaning of the Weights and Measures Act 1985.

E-commerce

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he plans to accept the proposed Article 15 of the draft Brussels Regulation on e-commerce and Article 13 of the Regulation in their current form. [100303]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 29 November 1999]: The Commission's proposals seem to go further than member states envisaged when they reviewed the Brussels Convention on jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments. We are actively discussing the implications with the Commission and other member states and we are consulting business and consumer organisations. We aim to finalise our negotiating position shortly. It is vital to accelerate the contribution of e-commerce to economic growth in the EU by agreeing as soon as possible on a legislative framework which gives maximum confidence to everyone engaged in buying and selling on-line.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to change the home country principle contained in the draft e-commerce directive to amend private international law; and what plans he has to seek changes in the use of private international law to remove barriers to the completion of the EU internal market. [100304]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 29 November 1999]: We have no plans to seek to change the country of origin in the draft e-commerce directive. In a case where rules of private international law would adversely affect the freedom to provide information society services in the internal market, the country of origin principle would take precedence. We support this general approach and the proposed exceptions to it, such as for contractual obligations concerning certain consumer contracts. As regards rules of private international law, the Government are considering the Commission's proposals to convert the Brussels Convention, concerning choice of jurisdiction, into a Community Regulation. A revision of the Rome Convention, concerning applicable law, may begin next year.

Private Recruitment Industry

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many cases have been reported to his Department of individuals who remain unemployed as a result of temp-to-perm arrangements operating within the private recruitment industry. [100302]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 29 November 1999]: There is no obligation to report such cases to my Department and we do not maintain a systematic record of those cases coming to our attention.

National Health Service Patient Data

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Health on making National Health Service patient data available to industry for the purposes of research. [99757]

Mr. Byers: I have not had any discussions with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on this matter.

Maternity Leave

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many homes in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire will benefit from the increase in maternity leave under the Employment Relations Act 1999 and its associated regulations; and if he will make a statement. [100598]

Mr. Alan Johnson: No information is available at this level of geographical detail. However, nationally 2.8 million female employees under 40 could benefit from the increase in statutory maternity leave should they become pregnant, and 1 million from the wider entitlement to additional maternity leave should they become pregnant. In the West Midlands there are 256,000 female employees under 40 who would benefit from the increase in statutory maternity leave should they become pregnant and 82,000 who would benefit from the wider entitlement to additional maternity leave should they become pregnant.

Ice Cream Industry

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive the Competition Commission's report into the ice cream industry; and if he will publish his Department's response. [100678]

Mr. Byers: The Competition Commission report on impulse ice cream was delivered on 21 September. The report, and any decisions made on it, will be published as soon as practicable.

Carbon Emissions

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the potential of photovoltaics to reduce carbon emissions. [99029]

Mrs. Liddell: The technical potential for building integrated PV in the UK is currently estimated at 15 terrawatt hours (TWh), which represents less than 5 per cent. of current electricity consumption. The potential savings in CO2 emissions if all this resource could be utilised, which is unlikely for practical, economic and environmental reasons, would amount to some 7 million tonnes per year.

The average cost of electricity from building integrated PV is currently around six times that of electricity generated from conventional fuels, and is unlikely to decrease sufficiently over the next ten years to make more than a small contribution to the carbon emission reductions necessary by 2012. The current annual generating capacity of installed PV in the UK is some 0.5 gigawatt hours (GWh).

However, in the longer term, PV has the potential to make a significant contribution to carbon savings. The DTI has been supporting a programme of research, development and demonstration of the technology in the UK for several years and, together with support from the European Union, a number of major examples on building intergrated photovoltaics are now operating.

Miners (Health Claims)

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the claims received from ex-miners in Scotland for chronic bronchitis and emphysema have been fully processed; and how many claimants have died before their claims were fully processed. [100270]

Mrs. Liddell: As at 22 November, the Department had made 133 full and final payments to Scottish ex-miners, totalling some £218,000. Prior to the signing of the Handling Agreement for England and Wales on 24 September, we had commenced discussions with Scottish solicitors to adapt the Agreement to take into consideration the differences between English and Welsh, and Scottish law. The Department expects to sign an agreement with Scottish solicitors shortly and this will enable the number of offers to increase.

As at 24 November IRISC, the Department's claims handler, had been informed of 217 claims where the date of death recorded occurred since their date of claim.

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) miners and (b) retired miners have died before receiving full compensation payments from public funds for chronic respiratory diseases in the last 12 months. [99856]

Mrs. Liddell: As at 24 November IRISC, the Department's claims handler, had been informed of 1,896 claims where the date of death recorded occurred in the last 12 months. One of these claims was in respect of a currently employed minor. It is not known how many of these claims would have qualified for full compensation under the Handling Agreement concluded on 24 September 1999.

The contract to carry out the medical assessments of live and deceased claims which will form the basis for paying full compensation where appropriate was let on 5 October. Where claims are progressed by an estate or dependant they will be assessed under the Handling Agreement.

WTO Seattle Round

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received on export subsidies to developing countries in relation to the forthcoming World Trade Organisation Round. [100422]

Mr. Caborn: I have received a large number of representations about this issue in the run up to the WTO Ministerial meeting in Seattle, particularly in relation to agricultural trade. I have made clear my support for a substantial reduction in these trade distorting subsidies as part of a new Trade Round.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to raise the issue of zero tariffs for developing countries at the World Trade Organisation Conference in Seattle. [100425]

Mr. Caborn: At Seattle, I shall be pressing for other industrialised countries to support the proposal agreed within the EU to provide duty-free access for essentially all products from the least developed countries no later than the end of the new Round of negotiations (2003). More generally, the Government will continue to call for zero tariffs to be applied to all goods from the least developed countries, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister promised in his speech at Mansion House on 22 November.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received relating to the position adopted by the European Union on the labelling of genetically modified foods in advance of the World Trade Organisation Conference in Seattle. [100424]

Mr. Caborn: I have received a number of representations on the subject of labelling of genetically modified food and on other aspects of labelling, both in writing and when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have met representatives of the civil society in person, in advance of the World Trade Organisation conference in Seattle on 29 November-3 December.

The Government share the EU objective to seek clarification of the terms of the WTO Agreement as concerns labelling, so that it is clear that labelling requirements can be used as a means of responding to consumer demands for information, where appropriate and without placing excessive burdens on, and unfairly restricting, export opportunities for our trading partners. On the specific question of genetically modified food, the Government are committed to labelling where there are measurable differences between GM and non-GM products, to allow consumers to make informed choices.

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations the Government will make at the WTO Ministerial Meeting in Seattle to other industrialised countries concerning the implementation of agreements to reduce trade barriers to developing countries; and if he will make a statement. [100813]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I will urge others to join the UK and EU in indicating strong support for the implementation of agreements to reduce trade barriers to developing countries, both in respect of those commitments entered into as part of the Uruguay Round, and in respect of new initiatives, such as the EU proposal that all industrialised countries should agree to provide duty-free access for essentially all goods from the Least Developed Countries no later than the end of the next round of negotiations (2003).

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will raise the matter of labour standards in developing countries at the Seattle Conference of the World Trade Organisation. [100426]

Mr. Caborn: The Government are firmly committed to securing the EU proposals on trade and labour, including the creation of a Joint ILO/WTO Standing Working Forum on trade, globalisation and labour issues.

Intellectual Property Agreement

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about the World Trade Organisation's Trade-Related Intellectual Property Agreement. [100427]

Mr. Caborn: Ministers and officials have received many representations about the WTO's TRIPS agreement. Many of these have been supportive of that Agreement and its implementation in view of its importance to encourage investment. Some have questioned whether parts of the Agreement might be detrimental to development interests. We have given assurances that there is much flexibility in the TRIPS agreement to allow for development interests to be taken into account.

Cause-related Marketing

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received in relation to cause-related marketing techniques; and if he will introduce legislative provisions to prevent the abuse of such techniques. [99391]

Dr. Howells: I have not received any representations about cause-related marketing and I have no plans to introduce additional regulation in this area, which is already subject to general legal controls on, for example, misleading advertisements, and to the codes of practice overseen by the Advertising Standards Authority and the broadcast regulators.

Third World Debt

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list by country the value of the outstanding debts on (a) United Kingdom aid loans and (b) loans guaranteed by the British Government through the Export Credits Guarantee Department, showing separately the amount that is classified as (i) pre-cut-off date and (ii) post-cut-off date, for each of the countries defined by the World Bank as developing countries. [100020]

Mr. Caborn: From the information available, Annexe A shows the value of outstanding amounts in respect of United Kingdom aid loans and Annexe B the outstanding value of unrecovered claims under guarantees issued through the Export Credits Guarantee Department to Developing Markets. The ECGD data are divided into amounts paid as claims which remain outstanding but which have been officially rescheduled, and claims paid that are not yet subject to a rescheduling agreement. All the amounts that have been rescheduled are in respect of pre-cut-off business, but amounts outstanding which are not subject to rescheduling are likely to include both pre and post cut off amounts. ECGD is not readily able to split these data on a pre and post cut off basis.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Falklands

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will request a contribution from Argentina towards the cost of clearing landmines in the Falkland Islands. [R] [100016]

Mr. Battle: In December 1993, the Argentine Government offered to meet the cost of clearing landmines in the Falkland Islands. We welcomed this offer and sought to explore it further.

During President Menem's visit to the UK in October 1998, we agreed as a first step to work with Argentina to evaluate the feasibility and cost of clearing the landmines still present in the Falkland Islands. Work on a Memorandum of Understanding setting out how this feasibility study will be carried out is under way. Both Governments reaffirmed their commitment to co-operate on mine clearance in the Joint Statement of 14 July 1999.

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his estimate is of the number of Argentine landmines remaining in the Falklands Islands. [R] [100015]

Mr. Battle: The Ministry of Defence estimate that around 16,600 mines remain in the Falkland Islands. The Argentine armed forces laid 127 minefields on the Falklands in 1982. MOD estimate that 18,000 mines of all types were laid, including 14,000 anti-personnel mines. British forces carried out some clearance immediately after the conflict, lifting about 1,400 mines, but stopped after several injuries to those involved. The remaining 101 minefields are marked and fenced, and therefore not an immediate hazard. The garrison conduct a public campaign to warn of the dangers. They make regular patrols and destroy mines which become exposed on the surface of the ground. The Argentines have given us their minefield records.

The Argentine Government offered to assist with their clearance, and during President Menem's visit to the UK in October 1998 we agreed, as a first step, to work with Argentina to evaluate the feasibility and cost of clearing them. Work on a Memorandum of Understanding on how this study will be carried out is under way. Both Governments restated their commitment to co-operate on mine clearance in the Joint Statement of 14 July 1999.

We are fully committed to the Ottawa Convention, which requires us to clear all anti-personnel mines from the Falkland Islands within 10 years of entry, unless we can show good reasons why an extension should be granted. Such reasons may include humanitarian, environmental and technical considerations. Mine clearance in the Falkland Islands is both difficult and dangerous and we shall be keeping these points in mind.

Corporate Assets

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current estimated value of assets relating to (a) Wilton Park Executive Agency and (b) the British Council (i) in Scotland, (ii) in the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas and (iv) in total. [99784]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The value of assets relating to the Wilton Park Executive Agency is £1,270,000. The current estimated values of the British Council's assets are £652,000 in Scotland, £8,170,000 in the rest of the United Kingdom (not including the figure for Scotland) and £83,633,000 overseas. The total value of the British Council's assets is £92,455,000.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his estimate is of the value of (a) vehicles, (b) equipment, (c) IT, (d) corporate systems, (e) departmental systems, (f) overseas systems, (g) communications, (h) technical security equipment and (i) heritable assets in (i) Scotland, (ii) the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas and (iv) in total. [99786]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The FCO has no fixed assets in Scotland. Value information for the FCO's fixed assets is being developed as part of the implementation of resource accounting. This information is currently being audited. The first set of resource accounts will be published in respect of 1999–2000.

Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the planned date of publication of the proposed White Paper on the forthcoming intergovernmental conference; which departments are involved in drafting it; if it will identify the issues which the Government (a) does and (b) does not want included in the agenda for the IGC; and if it will guarantee that extensions of qualified majority voting in specified areas will not be approved by the Government. [100279]

Mr. Vaz: We intend to publish the White Paper early next year, before formal IGC negotiations begin. The paper will be drafted by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, in consultation with other Departments. It will set out our position on all major issues expected to be discussed at the intergovernmental conference, including the possible extension of qualified majority voting.

Your Britain Your Europe

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out (a) the itinerary for his proposed five-day Your Britain Your Europe tour, (b) the aims of the tour, (c) the cost to the public of the tour and (d) what funds have been made available from the European Commission for the tour. [100280]

Mr. Vaz: The aim of the Your Britain Your Europe roadshow is to promote the benefits of the UK's membership of the EU to the people of Britain.

The costs of the roadshow are estimated at £60,000, plus accommodation and travel. No funds have been made available from the European Commission for the roadshow.

The itinerary is as follows:

Departmental Estate

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will estimate the current value of land and property (a) in Scotland, (b) in the United Kingdom and (c) overseas allocated to his core Department, including Chevening. [99836]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The FCO has no land or property in Scotland. Value information for the FCO's estate in the UK and overseas is being developed as part of the implementation of resource accounting. This information is currently being audited. The first set of resource accounts will be published in respect of 1999–2000. Chevening is owned and administered by the Chevening Estate Trust. It does not form part of the FCO's estate.

International Criminal Court

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what timetable he proposes for the publication of the draft legislation on the International Criminal Court. [100180]

Mr. Hain: Draft legislation to enable ratification of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court will be published as soon as practicable in the course of this Parliamentary session.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which interested parties will be consulted about the draft legislation on the International Criminal Court; and if he will make a statement. [100181]

Mr. Hain: After publication of the draft legislation to ratify the International Criminal Court Statute, all Parliamentarians, organisations and individuals interested in the International Criminal Court will be given an opportunity to comment.

Export Licence (ACORD)

Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the approval of an export licence for the supply of one Bedford truck to ACORD. [100909]

Mr. Hain: Following consultations with this Department and the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Trade and Industry recently issued a licence for the export of one military rated, ex-MOD Bedford truck to ACORD, a relief organisation in the Sudan. The truck will be used to distribute seed and other humanitarian aid to help alleviate the suffering in Sudan. This decision does not affect the Government's continued support for the EU Common Position on the export of arms, munitions and military equipment to Sudan.

Kosovo

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the decision was taken to withdraw the OSCE verifiers from Kosovo in March. [98558]

Mr. Vaz: The decision to withdraw the OSCE verifiers from Kosovo was made by the OSCE Chairman-in-Office, Norwegian Foreign Minister Knut Vollebaek, on 19 March.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when, and in what form, he received the application that the OSCE verifiers were unable to do their job owing to the escalating violence in Kosovo before 19 March. [98559]

Mr. Vaz: The decision to withdraw the OSCE verifiers was made in Vienna on 19 March by the OSCE Chairman-in-Office following a full meeting of the Contact Group plus the then OSCE Troika (Austria, Poland) under the chairmanship of Norway, as Chairman-in-Office.

The decision to withdraw the OSCE verifiers was made in the light of the failed negotiations in Paris and, in particular, the deteriorating situation on the ground in Kosovo caused by the Serbian military offensive.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the number of Kosovo Serbs killed in Kosovo (a) since 11 June and (b) between 23 March and 10 June. [98567]

Mr. Vaz: There have been 124 reported murders of Kosovo Serbs between KFOR's deployment on 12 June and mid-October.

There are no figures available for the number of Kosovo Serbs killed in Kosovo between 23 March 1999 and 11 June 1999, ie in the period prior to KFOR's deployment.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the number of Kosovo Albanians killed in Kosovo between (a) 23 March and 10 June, (b) 1 January and 22 March and (c) since 11 June. [98568]

Mr. Vaz: We estimate that at least 10,000 Kosovo Albanian civilians were killed between June 1998 and 12 June 1999. Of these, we estimate that around 500 were killed before 20 March 1999.

There have been 135 reported murders of Kosovo Albanians between KFOR's deployment on 12 June and mid-October.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made on improving access to Kosovo through the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. [100326]

Mr. Vaz: Significant delays continue to be encountered by traffic, including humanitarian aid convoys, at the major crossing point on the Kosovo/Macedonian border at Blace. The United Nations interim administration in Kosovo has set up a task force to take matters forward and negotiations continue with the Macedonian Government to relieve the bottleneck at the border.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what forum, and in what form, the Greek Government agreed there was a legal base for military action against Yugoslavia between March and June 1999. [98560]

Mr. Vaz: The then Secretary-General of NATO announced on 23 March that he had directed the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe to initiate air operations in the Former Republic of Yugoslavia. The Secretary-General noted that his decision had been taken after extensive consultations with all the Allies, including Greece.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the legal basis for NATO's military action in Yugoslavia between March and June 1999. [98561]

Mr. Vaz: The Government have set out the position on a number of occasions. This is that cases have arisen (as in Northern Iraq in 1991) when, in the light of all the circumstances, a limited use of force was justifiable in support of purposes laid down by the Security Council, but without the Council's express authorisation, when that was the only means to avert an immediate and overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe. Such cases would in the nature of things be exceptional and would depend on an objective assessment of the factual circumstances at the time, and on the terms of the relevant decisions of the Security Council bearing on the situation in question.

In the case of Kosovo, NATO took the view in March of this year, given the circumstances at the time, that the use of force was the only route left to avert a humanitarian catastrophe.

Policy Document No. 148 (1986)

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the status of Foreign Office Policy Document No. 148 (1986). [98562]

Mr. Vaz: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) on 22 November 1999, Official Report, column 18W.

IT Projects

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the information technology projects currently being undertaken by his Department and by agencies responsible to his Department, including (a) the start date, (b) the planned completion date, (c) the current expected completion date, (d) the planned costs and (e) the current estimated cost; and if he will make a statement. [99672]

Mr. Battle: The FCO has under way the following IT projects:

FIRECREST—an infrastructure project to provide modern, easy to use office automation systems throughout the FCO, at home and overseas.

GTP—an integrated and managed Global Telecommunications service, being procured under PFI principles. The costs shown cover procurement only. The projected costs of FCO communications over 10 years are estimated to be £238 million.

FORTRESS—to provide desk officers with electronic delivery and access to intelligence material.

VIP—to provide an integrated visa entry clearance for Posts.

POAC—to provide a replacement accounting system for Posts.

PASSPORTS—to provide modern machine readable passport systems at major consular Posts.

PAY—to contract a replacement payroll bureau service.

INTRANET—to provide Posts and FCO UK with an Intranet.

CDB—to provide a database for Commercial Officers at Posts.

DSP—to provide Diplomatic Service Procedures in electronic form to Posts and Home Departments.

Research Studies

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the title of research studies, audits and surveys (a) being undertaken and (b) commissioned by his Department for completion within (i) 1999 and (ii) 2000, stating in each case whether and when the results are due to be published. [99674]

Mr. Hain: The information requested is not centrally recorded and covers such a wide range of activity that a comprehensive list could be compiled only at disproportionate cost. Research studies commissioned and published in 1999 or intended for publication in 2000 include:

In addition, unclassified versions of some of the papers prepared by the FCO's Research Analysts in recent years will be placed on the FCO's website next year.

Audits and surveys in 1999 include the regular series of internal audits conducted by the FCO's Internal Audit department in accordance with Treasury requirements. Reports of internal audits are sent to the National Audit Office, but the details are not routinely published because to do so could harm the effective management and operations of the public service.

Departmental Reports

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the titles of departmental reports being prepared with a view to publication in (a) 1999 and (b) 2000, stating in each case the planned date of publication. [99673]

Mr. Hain: Consistent with current Whitehall-wide practice, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's annual Department reports are published 21 days after the spring Budget:

(a) On 30 March 1999, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office published "Foreign and Commonwealth Office—The Government's Expenditure Plans 1999–2000 to 2001–02" (CM 4209)

(b) In Spring 2000, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office will publish "Foreign and Commonwealth Office—The Government's Expenditure Plans 2000–01 to 2001–02". It is not possible to specify the exact publication date until the date of the spring Budget has been decided.

Strategic Export Control

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide quantification of exports in the next issue of the Strategic Export Control Annual Report. [100506]

Mr. Hain: We will consider the format and content of future reports in light of responses to the first two Annual Reports, taking into account in particular the eventual report of the Joint Inquiry being carried out by the House of Commons Foreign Affairs, Defence, Trade and Industry and International Development Committees.

Macedonia

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications he has received from citizens of the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia for visas to visit the United Kingdom in each of the past three years. [100323]

Mr. Vaz: The information requested is not collected centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the development of the United Kingdom's relations with the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia since the conclusion of the war in Kosovo. [100325]

Mr. Vaz: We warmly welcomed the support given by the Macedonian Government and people during the Kosovo crisis, and we continue to work to strengthen our bilateral relations. We also welcome the opportunities provided for closer co-operation through the Stability Pact and look forward to an early start on negotiations for a Stabilisation and Association Agreement between Macedonia and the European Union. We have encouraged the Macedonian Government in their preparation of a NATO Membership Action Plan.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to allow the British Embassy in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to issue visitors visas for the United Kingdom. [100324]

Mr. Vaz: The British Embassy in Skopje will begin accepting applications for visitor visas as soon as new purpose-built premises are ready. On present plans this is likely to be around the middle of 2000.

Diplomatic Missions (Visas)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which British diplomatic missions in Europe are not allowed to issue visas to visit the United Kingdom. [100321]

Mr. Vaz: The following British diplomatic posts in Europe do not offer an entry clearance service:

Country	Post
France	Bordeaux
	Lille
	Lyon
	Marseille
	Strasbourg
Germany	Frankfurt
	Hamburg
	Munich
	Stuttgart
Greece	Corfu

No entry clearance service is available in the following countries to which non-resident British diplomatic missions are accredited:

Andorra

Moldova

Monaco

San Marino.

Angola

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent progress has been made in inhibiting the use of diamond sales for funding the war in Angola. [100671]

Mr. Hain: UN Security Council resolution 1173 of 12 June 1998 imposed a ban on the direct or indirect import from Angola of all diamonds not controlled through the Certificate of Origin regime of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation of Angola (GURN). The aim was to cut off diamond revenues to UNITA, and so reduce their ability to fund continued fighting. Following the adoption of the resolution, the Government amended the Open General Import Licence to prohibit the import into the UK of diamonds exported from Angola not accompanied by a GURN Certificate or Origin. The ban is implemented in the Overseas Territories through the Angola (United Nations Sanctions) (Dependent Territories) Order 1998.

This corrects information in a previous written answer to my hon. Friend on how the UK implements its obligations under resolution 1173 with regard to the import of diamonds—3 November 1999, Official Report, column 189W. I would like to take this opportunity to apologise to my hon. Friend for that error.

UN Security Council resolution 1237 of 7 May 1999 established a panel of experts to investigate alleged violations of the sanctions against UNITA, in support of the work on the UN Angola Sanctions Committee. Panel members are paying a series of visits to the region, and will report on how sanctions in relation to UNITA diamonds can be implemented and enforced more effectively.

We welcomed the announcement by De Beers on 5 October that they will no longer purchase any Angolan diamonds, and will urge their clients to adopt a similar policy. In this task I want to see full co-operation from trading centres such as New York, Antwerp and Tel Aviv and also from other diamond companies to follow De Beers' lead. This is vital to disabling UNITA's murderous war effort.

TREASURY

Annual Migration (South-East)

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the annual net migration into the south-east region from each of the other regions of England. [99036]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Crispin Blunt, dated 30 November 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question about the estimated net annual migration into the South East Region from each of the other regions of England.

The latest figures available relate to 1998. The attached table shows the inflow, outflow and balance for migration into and out of the South East with respect to each of the other regions of England.

The estimates of internal population movements are based on the movement of NHS doctors' patients between the former Family Health Services Authority Areas. They should not be regarded as a perfect measure of migration as there is variation in the delay between a person moving and registering with a new doctor. Additionally, some moves may not result in a re-registration: for example, individuals may migrate again before registering with a doctor. Conversely, there may be others who move and re-register several times a year.

Winter Deaths

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many deaths of (a) people aged 60 to 74 years, (b) people aged 75 to 84 years, (c) people aged over 85 years and (d) in total, in England and Wales, were attributed wholly or partly to hypothermia in 1998. [100478]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Eddie O'Hara, dated 30 November 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking how many deaths were attributed wholly or partly to hypothermia in 1998.

The information requested is given in the table below.

Deaths attributed to Hypothermia, England and Wales, 1998

	60–74	75–84	85+	All ages
Hypothermia	72	115	111	352

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people died in England and Wales in winter 1998–99 (a) aged 60 to 74 years, (b) aged 75 to 84 years, (c) aged over 85 years and (d) in total; and what was the average number of deaths in winter in each category over the last 10-year period. [100479]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Eddie O'Hara, dated 30 November 1995:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking how many people died in England and Wales in winter 1998–99.

The information requested is given in the table below, using the standard ONS definition of winter being December to March.

Winter deaths, England and Wales

Age	Winter 1998–99	Average 1993–94 to 1997–98
60–74	51,750	55,759
75–84	72,557	70,261
85+	69,888	60,423
All ages	216,653	209,171

Figures for monthly deaths are only readily available from 1993 onwards. Deaths are only averaged therefore for the five winters from 1993–94 to 1997–98.

Cigarette Consumption

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what proportion of family expenditure in each income decile of households is represented by cigarette consumption; [99908]

(2) what proportion of expenditure of different types of households in the lowest income decile goes on cigarette consumption. [99910]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. David Willetts, dated 30 November 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary questions on cigarette consumption.

The Family Expenditure Survey shows the proportion of family expenditure in each income decile in 1998–99 as follows:

Gross income decile group	Percentage of total expenditure on cigarettes
Lowest ten per cent.	3
Second decile group	3
Third decile group	3
Fourth decile group	2
Fifth decile group	2
Sixth decile group	2
Seventh decile group	2
Eighth decile group	1
Ninth decile group	1
Highest ten per cent.	1

Source:
Family Expenditure Survey 1998–99

The Family Expenditure Survey shows the proportion of expenditure of different types of households in the lowest income decile that goes on cigarette consumption in 1998–99 as follows:

Household composition	Percentage of total expenditure on cigarettes
One or two persons retired	2
One person not retired	3
One adult with one or more children	4

Source:
Family Expenditure Survey 1998–99

There are few non-retired households with two or more adults in the lowest income decile, so sample numbers are too small to provide the percentage for such households.

Like all estimates from sample surveys, these figures are subject to sampling variability.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the effect on the post-tax distribution of income, by decile, of the increases in tobacco duty in the budgets of 1997, 1998 and 1999 combined. [99909]

Dawn Primarolo: Information on tobacco expenditure by income decile is available in table 1.3 of the Office for National Statistics annual publication "Family Spending".

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list (a) capital spending under the PFI in each year since 1997 and (b) planned spending for the next three years, for each Department; and if he will estimate the impact on revenue to the Government of these PFI projects for each of the next three years for each Government Department. [100848]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Treasury is currently updating the information sought as part of its normal bi-yearly reporting of information on PFI contracts. I expect this information to be published in the first half of December.

Office for National Statistics

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to publish the new framework document for the Office for National Statistics. [100731]

Miss Melanie Johnson: As stated in the recent White Paper, "Building Trust in Statistics" (Cm 4412), the Government intend to publish a Framework for National Statistics as soon as possible.

House Prices

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what policy options are available to him to dampen house price increases. [100575]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The abolition of MIRAS from next April, higher rates of stamp duty for properties over £250,000, and the Government's new macro-economic framework will contribute to stability in the housing market.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) inquiries have been received by the Working Families Tax Credit Inquiry Line and (b) successful claims for working families tax credit have been made by residents of Pendle. [100626]

Dawn Primarolo: The response line for the Working Families Tax Credit and the Disabled Persons Tax Credit had handled 762,000 inquiries up to the 24 November. Reliable estimates for the numbers in receipt of the Working Families Tax Credit in Pendle are not yet available.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of recipients of the working families tax credit who are benefiting from the child care tax credit. [100670]

Dawn Primarolo: It is estimated that 224,000 claims for Working Families Tax Credit were granted during October. Of these, it is provisionally estimated that about 26,000 are in receipt of the child care tax credit.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many families in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire will benefit from the working families tax credit; by how much; and if he will make a statement. [100590]

Dawn Primarolo: Reliable estimates for the numbers in receipt of the Working Families Tax Credit in Shrewsbury and Atcham and in Shropshire county are not yet available. It is estimated that in 2000–01 for the UK as a whole, the first full year of the Working Families Tax Credit, about 1.4 million families will enjoy the more generous help provided by the new scheme. Families in receipt of the credit will receive on average £24 a week more than they would on Family Credit.

Bio-diesel

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to give tax incentives to those producing bio-diesel from (a) rape seed oil and (b) recycled waste edible oils; and if he will make a statement. [100243]

Mr. Timms: There are no such plans. At this time, particularly with the success of the introduction of ultra low sulphur diesel to the UK market, the case for a tax incentive for bio-diesel remains uncertain.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to reduce duty on bio-diesel produced through the recycling of waste edible oils to the same level as on other environmentally-friendly fuels; and if he will make a statement. [100242]

Mr. Timms: There are no such plans. There is little information available to support the case for a duty reduction to the same level as road fuel gas, the only other fuel that has a duty rate less than that on ultra low sulphur diesel.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what plans he has to encourage production of bio-diesel; and if he will make a statement; [100244]

(2) if he will maintain duty on bio-diesel at the same level as that on mineral diesel; and if he will make a statement. [100222]

Mr. Timms: There are no plans to change the current duty arrangements for bio-diesel. The environmental benefits of cleaner diesel fuel are well understood and the UK has taken a lead internationally by encouraging the production of ultra low sulphur diesel. It is not clear that encouraging the production of bio-diesel would add measurably to the benefits already enjoyed.

Third World Debt

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to forgive the export credit guarantee debt of the world's poorest countries. [100053]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The terms of the deal agreed at the G7 Summit in Cologne and subsequently ratified by the IMF/World Bank Annual Meetings provides for the forgiveness of 90 per cent. or more of the commercial debts of 41 of the world's poorest countries. Since the Annual Meetings, the Government have said that they are prepared, on a case-by-case basis, where necessary, to go beyond 90 per cent., possibly up to 100 per cent. debt forgiveness where debt relief will finance poverty reduction.

IR35

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the responses to the Inland Revenue's consultation upon IR35, listing those (a) for and (b) against the proposals. [100141]

Dawn Primarolo: Many of those who have commented on our proposals have acknowledged that there is a real problem with avoidance of tax and National Insurance Contributions using personal service companies, and that the Government is right to tackle it.

We did not issue a formal consultation document, and those who sent in responses would not have expected their views to be published, so we do not intend to do so. However, some of the representative bodies who did take part in consultation have published their own responses, for example, on the internet.

Tax Avoidance

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the Government's strategy in respect of tax avoidance. [100140]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government's strategy for tackling tax avoidance is to target legislation at a range of avoidance schemes whose exploitation is reducing tax revenues. Each of the last three Finance Acts has contained important measures to close loopholes and reduce the opportunity for tax avoidance. Further legislation will be introduced in next year's Finance Bill to counter avoidance based on capital gains tax gifts relief. The Government are committed to creating a fairer tax system. Artificial and contrived tax avoidance schemes undermine fairness, at the expense of those who do not indulge in them.

CABINET OFFICE

Equality

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on the Government's approach to equality issues. [100810]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Government are working to transform Britain into a society which is inclusive and prosperous. Eliminating unjustified discrimination wherever it exists and making equality of opportunity a reality for all is at the heart of the Government's agenda. Equality of opportunity is not only inherently right, it is also essential for Britain's future economic and social success. Much has been achieved in the last two years. But we are not complacent. A lot remains to be done. We will continue to act to stamp out discrimination, remove barriers and improve the position of groups facing disadvantage and discrimination in employment, public life and public service delivery. We will ensure that the right legislative framework and institutional arrangements are in place and that information, guidance and other support is available to challenge discrimination and deliver fair treatment to allow everyone to develop and contribute to their full potential. That is to the benefit of all—individuals, communities, business—in a healthy, modern, diverse society.

We will avoid unnecessary and burdensome regulation and will promote, encourage and support progress through non-legislative means. However, we will legislate where necessary or desirable when legislative time permits. In doing so, we will be governed by the principles of improving consistency between the protection afforded to different groups by different legislation, modernising enforcement powers, and by the need for the public sector to lead by example.

As explained in our response to the Better Regulation Task Force Review of Anti-discrimination Legislation, we will where practicable harmonise the provisions of the Race Relations Act 1976, the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 and align the equality commissions' powers. This will significantly extend discrimination law coverage and strengthen the powers of the Equal Opportunities Commission (EOC) and the Commission for Racial Equality (CRE) to match those of the Disability Rights Commission (DRC). We will legislate to remove barriers to the equality commissions working together on common issues and to enable them to produce joint guidance.

We are modernising Government. Not only will we continue to tackle discrimination in all institutions, we will champion equality in every sense and at every level. Public bodies must take the lead in promoting equal opportunities and the Government will put this obligation in legislation as soon as Parliamentary time permits. Together with our commitment to implement the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry action plan, this will help ensure public institutions and services are free from discriminatory procedures and practices and should improve the position of disadvantaged groups, both as employees and users of public services. This will not in any way replace or supersede the existing statutory arrangements in Northern Ireland where there is already a duty on the public sector to promote equality of opportunity. We will be looking at, and learning from, the operation of the law in Northern Ireland. We will also build on existing mainstreaming and appraisal guidance to ensure that policies are inclusive, and take full account of the needs and experience of all those likely to be affected by them, and of the impact on particular groups in society.

We will continue to take action to meet our commitment to remove the under-representation of women, members of minority ethnic groups and disabled people on public bodies; and to meet the challenging targets set for representation of these groups in the Civil Service.

The Race Relations (Amendment) Bill announced in the Queen's speech, will extend the Race Relations Act to public functions not previously covered, such as law enforcement and immigration. It will implement, and go beyond, one of the Lawrence Inquiry Report recommendations by making it unlawful for public authorities generally to discriminate in the exercise of their functions. This is an important step in the Government's efforts to ensure that the public sector sets the pace in the drive towards equality; and we will extend it to the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 when legislative time permits.

The gender pay gap is indefensible. We will support further action to address this and to achieve greater choice of career, of working patterns and a better balance between work and home responsibilities that will benefit both businesses and individuals.

We intend to launch a campaign to promote employment policies which help people balance work and life delivered through partnership with employers. Fairness at Work measures are improving parental and maternity leave, and allowing time off for emergencies. The National Childcare Strategy, Working Families Tax Credit, Childcare Tax Credit and the National Minimum Wage are all bringing benefits and removing barriers for women and men. We will consult on changes to Tribunal procedures to speed up and simplify equal pay claims.

The Disability Discrimination Act 1995 lags behind sex and race legislation in the protection it provides for disabled people. The establishment of a Disability Rights Commission, in April 2000, will address one of the Act's major weaknesses but there are other gaps in coverage. The Disability Rights Task Force, which has been looking at securing comprehensive rights for disabled people, will report shortly. The Government will carefully consider its recommendations. But we are committed to improving the rights of disabled people. Where appropriate legislative opportunities arise, we shall use them to pursue this commitment.

Further legislation is not enough in itself. Changing negative attitudes towards disability, and indeed all forms of discrimination, is crucially important. We shall continue with our campaign to address the lack of knowledge of disability issues and raise awareness among service providers' of their duties to improve access for disabled people.

We are certain that a great deal of progress can be made through the provision of information and guidance to ensure awareness of rights and responsibilities. The Government have already produced a Code of Practice on discrimination in employment based on age and proposes, in conjunction with the EOC, preparing a Code of Practice on discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. Evaluation of the effectiveness of this Code and consideration of developments in other areas will inform any future decision on the need for legislation.

The Government are alive to the concerns that have been expressed about the issue of religious discrimination, and to the case for it to be made subject to the law. However, this issue raises many difficult, sensitive and complex questions. We have commissioned research to try to assess the current scale and nature of religious discrimination, and the extent to which it overlaps with racial discrimination, in mainland Britain. The results, due in autumn 2000, will help to inform our thinking about the appropriate response.

Clarification of the law and advice will be provided in a number of areas to encourage the adoption of good practice. There will be a code of practice on discrimination against volunteers, guidance on positive action to tackle under-representation of women and ethnic minorities, and guidance on sexual harassment at work. In particular, we are looking at ways of giving small businesses better access to coherent information and advice about equality issues. We are planning to pilot a new joined-up service next year.

Overall, therefore, we intend to combat discrimination across a broad front, using both legislative and non-legislative means as appropriate, and with the public sector taking the lead. To this end, the Government will introduce legislation as soon as Parliamentary time allows, following a targeted consultation exercise in the first half of 2000; and will press ahead with the non-legislative measures outlined above. Our efforts to combat discrimination are already making an impact and will, in conjunction with new actions, continue to yield results making Britain a better place to live and work for all.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Animal Feed

Mr. Thompson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions have taken place between the Government and SEAC in relation to the use of pigmeat and bonemeal in the feed of other farm animals. [99260]

Ms Quin [holding answer 25 November 1999]: At its meeting on 3 June 1999, SEAC considered a paper prepared by the Meat and Livestock Commission on this subject but concluded that this would not be the right time to relax the ban on feeding pig MBM to other farm animals. My right hon. Friend the Minister asked SEAC to look again at this matter at its meeting on 29 November.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the result of the Veterinary Products Committee's meeting of 18 November in respect of recommended policy towards the suspension of the authorisation of Zinc Bacitracin for use in animal feed. [98550]

Ms Quin [holding answer 23 November 1999]: Alpharma SA submitted papers which included new evidence and an assessment of the public health implications of the EU suspension of the authorisation of zinc bacitracin as an antimicrobial growth promoter. The Veterinary Products Committee agreed to consider these papers at its December meeting and, if appropriate, to offer advice to Ministers which would assist in future discussions on whether or not the EU suspension should be withdrawn or made permanent.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the advantages and disadvantages of the suspension of the use of zinc bacitracin in animal feed, including its effect on the use of therapeutic antibiotics used in human medicine in animals; and if he will make a statement. [98444]

Ms Quin: Council Regulation (EC) No 2821/98 prohibited the use of bacitracin zinc and three other antibiotic growth promoters. The reasons underlying the Regulation were set out in full in the recitals and included an explanation that bacitracin zinc is used in human medicine and that it could be used for the treatment of vancomycin resistant enterococci in humans. The prohibition has been introduced as a protective measure taken as a precaution.

The Government's support of the ban was guided by advice from the independent Veterinary Products Committee (VPC) and the Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Microbiological Safety of Food (ACMSF). Reports from both Committees have been published. The advantage of the ban on bacitracin zinc is that it helps to minimise the risk of the development of resistant strains of bacteria, with the disadvantage that it may add to the costs of poultry production. Three other antibiotic growth promoters are authorised for use in poultry in the EU. Other antibiotics may be used therapeutically under veterinary supervision and their use will depend on the disease condition of a particular flock. There are no figures available on the quantities of therapeutic antibiotics used in farming since the introduction of the ban.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his assessment of the suspension of the use of zinc bacitracin in animal feed on the use of therapeutic antibiotics of importance in human medicine in animals. [98447]

Ms Quin: The suspension of the use of bacitracin as a growth promoter is unlikely to have had a significant effect on the use of antimicrobials of importance in human medicine as other antimicrobial growth promoters are available for use in poultry production.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice the Government have received from the British Veterinary Poultry Association on consequences for public health of the suspension of the use of zinc bacitracin in animal feed. [98446]

Ms Quin: The Veterinary Medicines Directorate has received a number of letters from the Chairman of the Medicines Working Group of the British Veterinary Poultry Association (BVPA) about the ban on four antibiotic growth promoters. The BVPA's Working Group supported moves to reduce reliance on these products, but sought time before the ban took effect to allow access to appropriate, properly evaluated alternative products. The Government successfully argued for a six-month delay in the imposition of a ban. Three substances—flavophospholipol, avilomycin, and salinomycin—are now authorised in the EU for use as growth promoters in poultry.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effect of the suspension of the use of zinc bacitracin on the use of amoxycillin and penicillin in poultry. [98443]

Ms Quin: Bacitracin zinc was permitted for use throughout the European Union as a growth promoter in poultry. Its use, and that of three other antibiotic growth promoters, was prohibited from 1 July this year by Council Regulation (EC) No. 2821/98. The Government supported the ban on the basis of advice from their independent scientific advisory committees. Producers were allowed six months between the Council Regulation and the implementation of the ban to adapt their production systems. Four other antimicrobial growth promoters are still authorised for use in the EU.

Amoxycillin and penicillin are not permitted for use as growth promoters but may be used, under veterinary supervision, for the treatment of poultry disease. There are no figures available to quantify whether there has been a change in the use of these therapeutic antimicrobials since the ban.

Departmental Estate

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the current value of (i) plant and equipment, (ii) IT equipment, (iii) IT systems, (iv) office equipment, (v) scientific and laboratory equipment, (vi) furniture and fittings, (vii) vehicles, (viii) vessels and (ix) investments and the total for his Department. [99648]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The value of assets of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food as at 31 March 1999 were:

Assets	£000
Plant and Equipment	0
IT Equipment and Systems	46,445
Office Equipment	3,336
Scientific and Lab Equipment	13,808
Furniture and Fittings	5,694
Vehicles	4,356
Vessels	4,907
Investments	1,080
Total	79,626

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the current estimated value of land and property in (a) Scotland, (b) the UK, (c) overseas and (d) in total held by his Department in the form of (i) headquarters and regional offices, (ii) laboratories, (iii) farms, (iv) buffer depots and (v) other offices, including breakdowns for historic leasehold properties and long leasehold properties. [99663]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The Ministry owns no land outside the United Kingdom. Capital valuations as at 31 March 1999 for Ministry land and property in Scotland and the United Kingdom are shown in the table. However, valuations for the separate categories of accommodation in Scotland are not given. The Ministry owns only three properties in Scotland, all of which are surplus to requirements and awaiting disposal. The individual valuations are, therefore, commercially sensitive.

Corporate Assets

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the current value of land and property (a) in Scotland, (b) in the United Kingdom, (c) overseas and (d) in total within the responsibility of (i) Covent Garden Market Authority, (ii) Food from Britain, (iii) Horticultural Research International, (iv) the Meat and Livestock Commission, (v) Sea Fish Industry Authority, (vi) Royal Botanic Gardens (Kew) and (vii) the Intervention Board; and what is the value of (1) plant and equipment, (2) IT equipment and systems, (3) office equipment, (4) scientific and laboratory equipment, (5) fittings and furniture and (6) vehicles for each of these bodies and for any other non-departmental public bodies within his responsibility. [99783]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The information requested is not held centrally in the form required and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

New Variant CJD

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the published references to the scientific, medical and agricultural research which indicate that new variant CJD in humans is caused by eating meat derived from BSE-infected cows. [99925]

Ms Quin [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The association between BSE and variant CJD (vCJD) has been discussed in a number of published articles. Details of those of particular significance are as follows:

1. Will R. G., Ironside-Zeidler M., Cousens S. N., Estibeiro K., Alperovitch A., Poser S., Pocchiari M., Hofman A., Smith P. G. "A new variant of Creutzfeldt Jakob disease in the UK". Lancet 1996, 347/9006, P921–925.
2. Bruce M. E., Will R. G., Ironside J. W., McConnell I. D., Suttie A., McCardle L., Chree A., Hope J., Birkett C., Cousens S., Fraser H., Bostock C. J. "Transmissions to mice indicate that 'new variant' CJD is caused by the BSE agent". Nature 1997, 389 (6650), P498–501.
3. Collinge J., Sidle K. C. L., Meads J., Ironside J., Hill A. F. "Molecular analysis of prion strain variation and the etiology of new variant CJD". Nature, 1996, 383, P685–690.
4. Lasmezas C. I., Deslys J. P., Demaimay R., Adjou K., Lamoury F., Robain O., Ironside J., Hauw J. J., Court L., Dormont D. "Experimental transmission of bovine spongiform encephalopathy to macaques". Travaux Scientifiques Des Chercheurs Du Service De Sante Des Armees 0 (18), 1997, P123–124.
5. Will R. "New variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease". Biomedicine-Pharmacotherapy, 1999, 53, NI, Feb, P9–13.

The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee (SEAC), the independent expert group that advises the Government on all aspects of transmissible spongiform encephalopathies, regularly reviews relevant published articles. The committee has concluded that the results of experiments reported in these articles provide convincing evidence that the agent which causes vCJD is the same as that which causes BSE.

Industrial Fishing

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has for the reduction of industrial fishing in the North Sea. [99746]

Mr. Morley: I expect to see shortly Commission proposals reflecting the advice given in June by the International Council for the Exploration of the Seas on the need for a closure of the sandeel fishery in the Firth of Forth.

TACs

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what total allowable catches are recommended by ICES for (a) pout and (b) sand eels; and what were the catches of these fish in each of the last two years. [99755]

Mr. Morley: ICES has not made specific recommendations on the size of the total allowable catch for pout and sandeels in 2000, but has advised that the level of stocks can sustain the continuation of current fishing mortality. ICES estimates North Sea landings in the last two years as follows.

Thousand tonnes

	Norway pout	Sandeels
1997	201	1,140
1998	75	993

Sea Defences (East Sussex)

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to change the level of spending on sea defences in East Sussex. [99717]

Mr. Morley: I have no plans to change the level of spending on sea defences in East Sussex. This Government announced an increase of £23 million in Ministry funding for flood and coastal defence over this and the next two years as part of its Comprehensive Spending Review. Applications from operating authorities for Ministry funding will continue to be considered against established technical, economic and environmental criteria, and within a national priority scoring system.

French Meat

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to ensure that the sale of meat produced by illegal means, with particular reference to the use of human sewage or animal sludge, is declared illegal and that such meat is unavailable for circulation throughout the European Union. [99506]

Ms Quin [holding answer 24 November 1999]: We are advised that, on the basis of available information, there are no public health grounds for banning French or other meat with regard to human or animal sludge in animal feed. The UK fully supports the Commission actions to see that rules are commonly interpreted and properly enforced.

Meat Labelling

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what guidance his Department has issued to meat producers on the labelling of meat products for sale (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) overseas. [99721]

Ms Quin: We are currently consulting interested parties on guidance aimed at ensuring that country of origin markings on all food labels, including meat products, do not mislead consumers about the true origin of the ingredients that have been used. The guidance relates to UK food labelling requirements, which themselves derive from European rules. We would therefore expect a similar approach to that set out in the guidance to be adopted for the sale of meat products overseas.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will request that the European Commission allows the country of origin labelling required for British beef sold in Europe to contain a promotional message. [99747]

Ms Quin: Under Council Regulation 820/97, it is permissible but not obligatory for British beef sold in Europe to be labelled by country or region of origin. Operators are free to label beef with a promotional message (e.g. other indications as regards quality) if they so wish, subject to the provisions of that Regulation.

Food Safety

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to increase consumer confidence over food safety. [99631]

Ms Quin: The Government has already taken a number of measures to improve consumer confidence in food safety though greater openness and transparency, putting consumers first and giving them the information to make informed judgments. Following the passage of the Food Standards Act 1999, this work will be carried forward by the Food Standards Agency, when it begins work next Spring.

Pesticides

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many pesticides have been banned from use in the United Kingdom by his Department since May 1997. [99524]

Ms Quin: Pesticide products may have their approvals revoked for a number of reasons. Since May 1997,929 pesticide products involving 229 active substances have had their approvals completely revoked. The reason for the vast majority of these revocations was as a result of a commercial decision by the approval holder not to continue marketing the products in question.

Business Advice Service

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of his Department's Business Advice Service. [99212]

Mr. Morley: My Department currently operates a Business Advice Service for exporters in our sectors, in close liaison with British Trade International. This service is run directly by my Department through its International Relations and Export Promotion Division for agriculture and fisheries goods and services, while for processed food and drink it is entrusted to a non-Departmental Public Body, Food From Britain.

Both operations were recently subjected to separate external reviews of their efficiency and effectiveness. I am happy to say that in both cases over three-quarters of the business users surveyed expressed complete satisfaction with the service, and well over half the users surveyed confirmed that their export performance has already improved as a result.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many statutory notices have been issued under Article 18 of the Welfare of Animals (Transport) Order 1997. [99290]

Mr. Morley: 1,168 Notices were recorded between 1 October 1997 and 19 November 1999. These notices were served for infringements of the Order and to facilitate the legal transport of unfit animals for treatment or slaughter. It is not possible to split the figure between these two purposes.

Covent Garden Market

Mr. Lüff: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his Department's policy towards the disposal of Covent Garden market; and what plans he has to bring forward legislation to permit this disposal. [99462]

Ms Quin: We shall bring forward legislation concerning the disposal of New Covent Garden Market when Parliamentary time permits.

Pig Farming

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what forecasts he has made for the economic prospects of the pig farming sector over the coming year. [98579]

Ms Quin: Despite being some 15 per cent. higher than at this time last year, UK market prices for pigs remain below break-even levels. Expected reductions in production in other Member States should help stabilise the market, although prices do not seem likely to improve significantly in the near future.

Beef Bans

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what negotiations he has had with (a) Bulgaria, (b) Latvia, (c) Lithuania, (d) Malta, (e) Romania and (f) Slovakia over lifting their bans on British beef; and if he will make a statement. [98738]

Ms Quin: The UK has approached the authorities in the six listed countries as part of a concerted campaign to lobby non-EU countries to lift their import bans, where they exist, or to agree the necessary export certification. This follows up, and builds upon, earlier approaches to key potential markets, which included Malta and Slovakia. Malta has said that they are currently maintaining their ban on the import of British beef. The other five countries listed have not so far formally responded to our approaches.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what negotiations he has had with (a) Poland, (b) Hungary, (c) the Czech Republic, (d) Estonia, (e) Slovenia and (f) Cyprus over lifting their bans on British beef; and if he will make a statement. [98737]

Ms Quin: The UK has approached the authorities in the six listed countries as part of a concerted campaign to lobby non-EU countries to lift their import bans, where they exist, or to agree the necessary export certification. This follows up, and builds upon, earlier approaches to key potential markets, which included Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic and Cyprus. Cyprus has said that it will permit the import of British beef. Estonia has said they are currently maintaining their ban on the import of British beef. The other four countries listed have not so far formally responded to our approaches.

Turkey Imports

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the numbers of overseas produced turkeys that will be imported into the UK during the Christmas period. [98451]

Ms Quin: Forecasts of turkey imports for the Christmas period are not produced. However, imports of fresh and frozen whole turkeys into the United Kingdom totalled between 8,000 and 10,000 tonnes in the fourth quarters of the last three years. In addition, imports of turkey cuts, which are not subject to the same level of seasonality, totalled between 5,000 and 6,000 tonnes in the same quarters.

Pig Industry

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress he has made in obtaining approval from (a) the European Union and (b) the Treasury for financial assistance to the pig industry with regard to the extra costs of offal disposal resulting from the BSE problem in cattle. [99047]

Ms Quin: In discussions with the European Commission, it was clear that there would be considerable difficulties in devising a scheme to meet the cost of pig offal disposal which complied with state aid rules. Until there is a proposal which could prove acceptable to the European Commission, there is no basis for seeking additional funding.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what recent representations he has made to (a) the European Commission and (b) the Council of Ministers on the subject of the British pig industry; [100689]

(2) what recent discussions he has held with (a) the European Commission and (b) the Council of Ministers on support for the British pig industry in respect of costs of BSE. [100691]

Ms Quin: My right hon. Friend the Minister wrote to Commissioner Fischler on 20 October urging him to reopen the Aids to Private Storage scheme and reinstate the special refund on exports of fresh and frozen carcase meat and cuts to Russia. Officials in the Department have also discussed with the European Commission the costs faced by British pig producers because of BSE and the possibility of introducing a pig offal disposal scheme. In addition, officials attend the monthly Pigmeat Management Committee meeting, chaired by the Commission, which looks at all aspects of the situation in the EU pigmeat market. The Council of Agriculture Ministers discussed the crisis in the pig sector at its meeting on 15 November.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the National Pig Association; and if he will publish the outcomes of those discussions. [100688]

Ms Quin: My right hon. Friend the Minister met representatives of the National Pig Association on 5 October and a joint communiqué was issued following the meeting. I will be meeting the National Pig Association on 6 December, when I hope to discuss issues surrounding the current state of the UK pig industry.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what meetings his Department has held with representatives of the European Parliament concerning the pig industry. [100692]

Ms Quin: Although no such meetings have been held we have kept interested MEPs informed of the situation in the pig sector by correspondence and telephone briefings.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has held with the Council of Ministers concerning pigmeat food aid exports to Russia. [100690]

Ms Quin: The subject of exports to Russia under the food aid programme was raised in the Pigmeat Management Committee meeting on 10 November. The European Commission made clear its aim of opening tendering procedures shortly for the 42,000 tonnes of pigmeat left outstanding from the earlier exercise. Discussions in the Agriculture Council have been on the Russian food aid programme as a whole rather than on specific commodities.

Badger Culling

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress in the Randomised Badger Culling trial. [98736]

Ms Quin: Five of the ten triplets proposed for the trial have been announced so far. Culling operations have taken place in two triplets. Survey work has been completed in one further triplet and has been started in the others. We expect to announce one more triplet before the end of 1999, and the remainder next year.

Farm Woodland

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reasons there have been delays in payments under the farm woodland premium scheme; when he expects payments to resume; and if he will make a statement. [100695]

Mr. Morley: Claims for payments this year under the farm woodland premium scheme have been, and continue to be, processed. Up to Friday 26 November, in England, 4,038 payments have been made out of 5,061 claims received (nearly 80 per cent.). All outstanding claims are being processed as quickly as possible with the aim of clearing all acceptable claims before the end of the year.

Farm-based Tourism

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what studies he has (a) initiated and (b) received concerning the obstacles to developing farm-based tourism; what action he is taking as a result of these studies; and what funds are available to him to support such action. [100271]

Mr. Morley: No such studies have been initiated by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The Government's Tourism Strategy, "Tomorrow's Tourism", launched earlier this year, recognises tourism's role in maintaining the viability of farm businesses. The European Council Rural Development Regulation (1257/1999), which applies from 2000, enables member states to support projects to encourage tourist and craft activities, among other things. A decision on the implementation of the Regulation will be made shortly.

Written Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much his Department has spent on civil servants' transport in each of the last two years. [98704]

Mr. Ingram: All travel undertaken by civil servants complies with the requirements of the Civil Service Management Code (Home Civil Service) or the Northern Ireland Civil Service Staff Handbook.

Spend for the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments was £15.512 million in 1997–98 and £17.029 million in 1998–99.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what motor mileage allowance rates his Department offers to (a) ministers and (b) civil servants using their own vehicles for official business; and what has been the cost of each in each of the last five years. [98705]

Mr. Ingram: When travelling on official business, Ministers may use a private car instead of an official car, and claim mileage allowance in the same circumstances and on the same terms as civil servants in the Department.

For the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments the information is as follows:

Motor mileage rate with effect from 6 April 1997

	Up to 4,000 miles	Over 4,000 miles
Cars with engine capacity:
Up to 1,500 cc pence per mile	35	20 (19)[1]
1,501–2,000 cc pence per mile	45	25 (23)[1]
over 2,000 cc pence per mile	53	36 (32)[1]

[1] Northern Ireland Office rate

Expenditure

(b) Civil servants
1994–95	[1]10,084
1995–96	[2]10,482
1996–97	10,760
1997–98	10,435
1998–99	10,909

[1] Includes a pro rata figure of £2.727 million for the Department of Agriculture based on records for 9 months, and excludes a figure for the Department of Finance and Personnel, who could provide information only at disproportionate cost.

[2] Includes an estimated figure of £829,971 for the Department of Economic Development.

RUC (Sovereign Awards)

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many RUC Officers who have held the position of (a) Divisional Commander of Traffic Branch, (b) Head of Traffic Branch and (c) Head of Traffic Policy Branch since 1969 (i) have and (ii) have not been given Sovereign Awards. [100272]

Mr. Ingram: Since 1969, eight officers have held the position of Divisional Commander Traffic, six have received sovereign awards. Three officers have served as Head of Traffic Policy, one has received an award. Eleven Officers have been Head of Traffic Regions, two have received an award. It should be noted that not all of the officers received their sovereign awards while holding positions in Traffic Branch.

Mr. David Adams

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what cost was incurred by Strathclyde Police when investigating the treatment of Mr. David Adams in Castlereagh. [100110]

Mr. Ingram: The cost was £52,850.08.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Judges

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Lord Chancellor received the report of Sir Len Peach on procedures for appointing judges; and when he proposes to publish it. [100299]

Jane Kennedy: I refer my hon. Friend to the written answer I gave him on 29 November 1999, Official Report, column 63W.

Asylum and Immigration Appeals

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many asylum and immigration appeals were heard without the Home Office case being presented in (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000 to date; and if he will make a statement. [100489]

Jane Kennedy: These statistics are not collected.

Public Trust Office

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to require the Public Trust Office to charge patients only for work actually carried out on that patient's behalf; and if he will make a statement. [100709]

Jane Kennedy: The issue of fees and charges for the services provided by the Public Trust Office was one of a number of points considered by Ann Chant CB as part of her Quinquennial Review of the Agency. She recommended the abolition of the current system of cross-subsidy between the wealthier and less well-off clients. The Lord Chancellor wishes to explore all of the Review's recommendations in detail before deciding how best to proceed, and will be making a statement in February.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Bishops

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, pursuant to his answer of 23 November 1999, Official Report, column 59W, on how many occasions since 1 May 1997, the Commissioners have been informed of instances where paid commitments involved time which would otherwise have been spent on episcopal responsibilities; and on how many of these occasions a sum was deducted from the stipend. [100505]

Mr. Stuart Bell: The Commissioners have not been informed of any instances where a Bishop has undertaken paid commitments involving time which would otherwise have been spent on episcopal responsibilities. Bishops are not required to inform the Commissioners of paid commitments undertaken during their own time.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Golf Courses

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many golf courses have been completed in the UK in each of the last 10 years; what proportion of those are courses offering open access to the public; what financial support was given to assist the provision of such facilities; and if he will make a statement. [99637]

Kate Hoey: Information on the number of golf courses which have been completed in the last 10 years is not held centrally.

However, since the National Lottery began in 1995, Sport England's Lottery fund has made 34 capital awards for golf totalling £8,232,056, contributing towards total project costs of £21,140,875. It is a condition of Lottery awards for sports facilities that they must have open access to the public.

Corporate Assets

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what his estimate is of the value of land and property (i) in Scotland, (ii) in England and (iii) in total within the responsibility of (a) the British Museum (including assets in course of construction), (b) the Wallace Collection and (c) the Horniman Public Museum and Public Park Trust; and what is the total value of other assets held by these bodies; [99830]

(2) what his estimate is of the value of land and property (a) in Scotland, (b) in England and (c) in total held by (i) the Imperial War Museum, (ii) the Museum of London, (iii) the Museum of Science and Industry, (iv) the National Gallery, (v) the National Maritime Museum, (vi) National Museums and Galleries on Merseyside, (vii) the Science Museum, (viii) the National Portrait Gallery, (ix) the Natural History Museum, (x) the Museums and Galleries Commission, (xi) the Tate Gallery, (xii) the Victoria and Albert Museum, (xiii) the British Tourist Authority, (xiv) the English Tourist Board, (xv) the British Library, (xvi) the English Sports Council, (xvii) the UK Sports Council, (xviii) the Arts Council of England, (xix) the Crafts Council, (xx) the British Film Institute, (xxi) the National Film and Television School, (xxii) the Millennium Commission, (xxiii) the National Lotteries Charity Board, (xxiv) English Heritage, (xxv) the Royal Armouries and (xxvi) the Royal Commission on the Historical Monuments of England; and what is the value of other assets held by these bodies. [99825]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 26 November 1999]: All 29 sponsored bodies include in the notes to their annual accounts the estimated net book value of the fixed assets they hold which is broken down into separate categories, i.e. land and buildings, fixtures and fittings, motor vehicles, etc where applicable. The annual accounts for most of these bodies are laid before Parliament and the information is available in the Libraries of the House. There are three exceptions which are (i) the Crafts Council, (ii) the British Film Institute and (iii) the National Film and Television School.

The net book value of total assets held by these bodies is as follows:

	Freehold land and buildings	Long/short leasehold property	Other	Total
Crafts Council (as at 31 March 1999)	0	980,398	502,016	1,482,414
British Film Institute (31 March 1999)	20,800,000	22,887,000	1,664,000	45,351,000
NFTS (as at 31 December 1998)	2,954,977	0	6,083,311	9,043,288

The only body which has assets held in Scotland is the National Lottery Charities Board to the value of £0.2 million.

All other assets are held by the bodies are in England with the exception of the following:

(i) The British Tourist Authority which holds assets with a net book value of £314,000 overseas which comprises land and buildings of £25,000 and other assets of £289,000.

(ii) Sport England (formerly the English Sports Council) which holds land and buildings to the value of £3.1 million in Wales.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Refurbishment Costs

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chairman of the Catering Committee if he will estimate the total cost of the new kitchens in the Parliamentary Estate during (a) the past two years and (b) the next year. [100033]

Mr. Dennis Turner: This is a matter for the Director of Parliamentary Works; I have asked him to reply to the hon. Member.

Theft

Mr. Ashton: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee how many cases of theft have been reported to the police and security services in the Commons and the Lords for each of the past five years; how many prosecutions have been made; and what proportion of these reports were from staff. [101037]

Mrs. Roe: This is a matter for the Serjeant at Arms; I have asked him to write to the hon. Member.

DEFENCE

Recruitment (Fiji)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what he estimates the cost of the British Army recruitment programme in Fiji was in the last financial year. [100754]

Mr. Spellar: The cost in the current financial year of the Army selection visit to Fiji currently under way is estimated to be some £104,000.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the second round of interviews for Fijian applicants to the British Army will take place. [100755]

Mr. Spellar: There are currently no plans to repeat the Army selection visit to Fiji once the current backlog of applications is dealt with.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many interviews for Fijian applicants to the British Army have taken place in the last three weeks; and if he will make a statement. [100753]

Mr. Spellar: As at 26 November, a total of 400 Fijian nationals had been through the selection process in Fiji. Of these, 200 were successful and will be called forward to the UK over the next three months to undergo the final stages in the process before starting training. A further 78 applications have been deferred for various reasons, but the applicants have the opportunity to resolve the cause of their deferment before the end of the selection visit.

Gurkhas

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will recruit more Gurkhas into the British Army to bring the force up to operational strength. [100429]

Mr. Spellar: It is already planned that to alleviate under-manning we have extended the Gurkha Reinforcement Companies and are introducing a second Gurkha Engineer Squadron and a second Gurkha Signals Squadron. There are 3,500 Gurkhas serving with the British Army and this represents the optimum to alleviate under-manning in the short term while taking account of excess manpower when we revert to full manning.

Atomic Weapons Establishment

Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress in selecting a contractor to manage and operate the Atomic Weapons Establishment from 1 April 2000. [101282]

Mr. Hoon: I am pleased to announce that following the completion of negotiations a contract will be awarded today to AWE Management Ltd. (comprising SERCo Defence Support, British Nuclear Fuels plc and Lockheed Martin Corporation). The two unsuccessful consortiums have been informed. The AWE workforce and trade unions will be told of the outcome today.

The principal features of the contract are:

The contract, commencing on 1 April 2000, is for an initial period of 10 years with an option to extend to a 25 year term with an injection of private capital. The value of the initial contract is some £2.2 billion.

The delivery of the UK's nuclear warhead programme, as outlined in the Strategic Defence Review, will not be affected by the change in contractor.

The AWE sites and all assets remain in Government ownership. Appropriate safeguards have been established to protect sensitive UK information and to maintain the UK's independence in nuclear matters.

The safety of the public, the AWE workforce and the environment remain of paramount importance. Aldermaston and Burghfield will continue as nuclear licensed sites and subject to independent regulation by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate (NII) and the Environment Agency (EA). The MOD Compliance Officer will also retain the authority and responsibility to cancel the contract and to instruct the contractor to cease operations if there is a serious breach of the MOD's requirements.

Notice Periods (Navy)

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to alter the current notice periods for Officers, RN Ratings and RM Other Ranks applying to leave the Naval Service. [101313]

Mr. Spellar: A common notice period of 12 months will be introduced for Officers, RN Ratings and RM Other Ranks who wish to leave the Naval Service from 1 June 2000. This will represent a significant improvement to the terms of service of personnel in the Naval Service. Currently, Officers who apply to retire voluntarily must wait for up to 15 months to leave the Service. RN Ratings and RM Other Ranks are required to provide 18 month's notice.

As a consequence of this change, the minimum period of service on the trained strength by RN Ratings and RM Other Ranks, following completion of initial training, will be reduced from 4 years to $3\frac{1}{2}$ years from 1 June 2000.

Officers, RN Ratings and RM Other Ranks who submit notice applications on or before 31 May 2000 will remain subject to existing notice periods. However, personnel may apply on an individual basis for these to be adjusted so that no more than 12 months are served from 1 June 2000.

Administration of Oaths

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the rules governing the conduct of officers who take, or administer to other officers, (a) religious, (b) sectarian and (c) other oaths while serving in HM armed forces. [100174]

Mr. Spellar: The regulations governing the conduct of officers who take, or administer oaths to other officers are as follows:

(a) Religious

Service Chaplains do not take an oath specifically for the Chaplain's Branch. No oath is taken if a Serviceman converts to a different religion while in service.

(b) Sectarian

Sectarian oaths form no part of Service life and would not be tolerated.

(c) Other

Courts Martial

Members of a court-martial shall take an oath or affirm. In addition, evidence given by witnesses before a court martial shall be given after an oath of affirmation in accordance with the following regulations:

(i) Naval Court Martial Rules—Section 60 of the Naval Discipline Act (NDA) 1957.

(ii) Section 93 of the Army Act (AA) 1955.

(iii) Section 93 of the Air Force Act (AFA) 1955.

Summary Dealing

(i) Evidence on oath or affirmation—Naval Summary Discipline Regulations 1997, Regulation 12, written under sections 43, 52E and 52 of the NDA 57.

(ii) This does not apply to officers in the Army.

(iii) Under Rule 17 of The Investigation and Summary Dealing (RAF) Regulations 1997, evidence heard before a Commanding Officer is taken on oath.

Boards of Inquiry

(i) No oath is taken by members of the RN or RM when subject to the NDA. However, an individual may be warned, and if thought to be lying, then this would constitute an offence under the NDA 57.

(ii) Under Section 135 of the AA 55, the Board of Inquiry (Army) Rules 1956, evidence before a Board of Inquiry is taken on oath.

(iii) Under Section 135 of the AFA 55 and the Board of Inquiry Rules, evidence before a Board of Inquiry is taken on oath.

Affidavits

(i) In the case of RN officers and RM officers when subject to the NDA, the Book of Regulations 11, App 3—Emergency Laws (Miscellaneous Provision) Act 1953 "An Act to empower certain persons subject to the Naval Discipline Act to take affidavits and declarations outside the UK" covers affidavits taken outside of the UK.

(ii) Under Section 204 of the AA 55, when serving overseas, officers above the rank of Major and Army Legal Services officers above Captain, may take affidavits and declarations.

(iii) Under Section 204 of the AFA 55, when serving overseas, officers above certain rank, and officers in the Legal Branch of the RAF May take affidavits and declarations.

Attestation

(i) Officers in the RN or RM when subject to the NDA do not swear an oath.

(ii) Entrants to the Royal Military Academy Sandhurst (RMAS) who are enlisted as officer cadets, are attested into the Army in the same way as soldiers and use the same oath. The procedures for this are included in the AA 55 (Part 1)(Regular Army) Regulations 1992.

(iii) Non-graduate officer entrants to Initial Officer Training are enlisted as officer cadets and are attested into the RAF in the same way as airmen, and use the same oath, under Section 2 of the AFA 55. Graduate officer entrants are invited to make a voluntary oath of allegiance in the same form as the oath of attestation.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Driving Tests

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to introduce the possibility of requiring people to re-take driving tests as a way of improving driving standards. [98599]

Mr. Hill: The Government do not consider that the regular retesting of all drivers would deliver significant road safety benefits. In the case of drivers who are found guilty of driving offences, courts already have powers to require those drivers who offend to undergo a retest, which for serious offences involves an extended length test. The Road Safety Strategy will address the adequacy of these powers.

EU Environmental Directives

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of EU environmental directives in (a) Southampton, (b) Newcastle, (c) Hull, (d) Sheffield, (e) Manchester, (f) Rotherham, (g) Dover, (h) Bristol, (i) Bath, (j) Sunderland, (k) Birmingham and (l) Leicester. [98576]

Mr. Mullin: The majority of Environmental Directives are implemented on a national basis and have objectives which go beyond local authority, regional and even national boundaries. Information is not collated in such a manner as to yield a measure of impact of EU environmental Directives on specific towns and cities. The environmental benefits will however be felt in these localities in terms of improved air and water quality and other environmental improvements.

Regulatory impact assessments are carried out from the earliest stages of development of a proposal within the European Commission, through to the adoption of all Directives. This includes a review of the costs and benefits of various options for giving effect to EC legislation including those which do not involve UK legislation. This involves full public consultation where appropriate. The review continues, when necessary, during the process of transposition.

Seaham Regeneration Scheme

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made in respect of the funding application for the Seaham Regeneration Scheme; and if he will make a statement. [99207]

Ms Beverley Hughes: My officials met with English Partnerships and One North East on 3 and 22 November to discuss their proposal for the regeneration of Seaham Town Centre. Discussions on the funding application are continuing.

A404(M)

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will announce his Department's decision on the funding of noise mitigation measures along the A404(M). [99233]

Mr. Hill: The A404(M) meets the initial sift criteria for noise mitigation measures announced by the former Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), on 22 March 1999, Official Report, columns 50–51W. Along with a number of other qualifying sites, it is being examined in further detail to establish whether additional mitigation measures can be justified.

Although our investigations into the A404(M) are almost complete, noise mitigation will need to await the outcome of the detailed studies into the other sites that met the sift criteria to ensure that priority is given to the most deserving cases.

Ruddy Duck

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the population of ruddy duck in the United Kingdom. [99599]

Mr. Meacher: The latest Wetland Bird Survey 1997–98, estimates the United Kingdom ruddy duck population at 3,585.

Waste Management

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish the Government's strategy for waste management. [99611]

Mr. Mullin: The Government published for consultation their draft waste strategy for England and Wales, "A Way With Waste", on 30 June 1999. Similar draft strategies have been produced in Northern Ireland and Scotland.

The Government intend to publish the waste strategy for England early next year as a Command Paper. Responsibility for taking this matter forward in Wales is a matter for the National Assembly. It has yet to be decided whether a separate strategy will be produced for Wales, or whether a joint strategy is preferred.

Housing Investment

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the outcome, by region, of the review of the General Needs Index for Housing Investment, indicating what percentage increase each region will receive in 2000–01; and if he will make a statement on the impact on (a) the constituency of Heywood and Middleton and (b) Rochdale Metropolitan Borough. [99861]

Mr. Mullin: The Generalised Needs Index (GNI) used in the allocation of housing capital resources to local authorities reflects the relative need for housing capital expenditure in each local authority. The index was the subject of a review this year; details of the outcome of the review, which was conducted in conjunction with the Local Authority Associations, the National Housing Federation and the Housing Corporation, are available in the Library of the House. The regional shares of the revised index to be used in the allocation of 2000–01 resources are set out in the table, alongside the 1999–2000 index shares.

Region	2000–01 (percentage)	1999–2000 (percentage)	Difference (+/-)
North East	6.4	6.4	—
Yorkshire and the Humber	9.9	10.1	–0.2
East Midlands	6.8	6.1	+0.7
Eastern	7.1	6.6	+0.5
London	30.0	30.5	–0.5
South East	8.8	8.4	+0.3
South West	5.6	5.8	–0.1
West Midlands	11.2	10.7	+0.6
North West	14.1	15.5	–1.4
England	100.0	100.0	—

The index shares for the two years are not directly comparable because there were separate Capital Receipts Initiative and private sector renovation grant allocations for 1999–2000 which were allocated using different indices. These allocations are being combined with the main housing allocation from 2000–01 (the "single housing capital pot") to provide local authorities with more freedom in planning the composition of their capital programme.

The resources available for allocation for 2000–01 (just over £2 billion) are around 50 per cent. up on 1999–2000. The introduction of the single housing capital pot and the changes to the GNI mean that the regional increases vary between around 40 per cent. and 65 per cent. Allocations for individual local authorities, which are based 50 per cent. on the GNI and 50 per cent. on authorities' performance on housing, will be announced in the first half of December.

Rochdale's 2000–01 GNI share (0.46 per cent. of England) has fallen by slightly more (13 per cent.) than the region as a whole (down 9 per cent.); corresponding figures for parliamentary constituencies are not available. The main reasons for the fall in Rochdale's index share, like those for the region as a whole, are the updating of the private sector stock condition indicator from 1991 to 1996 English House Conditions Survey data (which shows a significant improvement in the general condition of occupied private sector stock and a reduction in the number of households eligible for a renovation grant); the extension of this indicator to cover dwellings that are in substantial disrepair as well as those which are unfit; the continuing reduction in the numbers of overcrowded and sharing households in the region; and the inclusion in the index of a measure based on homeless households in temporary accommodation.

Railway Maintenance Staff

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what technology (a) exists and (b) is under development to warn maintenance staff on the railway network of the approach of trains; and if he will make a statement on the train approach warning system. [100059]

Mr. Hill: Existing technology to warn staff working on or about the railway includes the "PEE WEE" system (a portable system which gives a special warning tone on the approach of a train), the Train Operated Warning System (TOWS), a permanent warning device in some locations where visibility is poor and "Minimel 90" (a portable automatic track warning system). A number of similar systems are undergoing UK approval.

Proven automatic warning systems should reduce the risk of an accident to train workers considerably below the risk from systems which rely on human observation of approaching trains.

Transport (Rural Areas)

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has assessed the level of dependence of people living in rural areas on the use of (a) the car and (b) public transport. [99900]

Mr. Hill: The National Travel Survey is used to assess the travel patterns of people living in rural areas. In 1996–98, 69 per cent. of journeys by people living in rural areas were by car, and 4 per cent. by public transport. Bus is the most widely used public transport alternative to the car, 59 per cent. of rural households lived within 13 minutes walk of a bus service with a frequency of at least once an hour.

GM Crops

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the research data he has received to date on the horizontal spread of marker genes and other transgenic DNA via pollen and dust; and what assessment he has made of this research. [100166]

Mr. Mullin: There are various reports of research into the possibility of horizontal gene transfer from genetically modified (GM) plants. These are publicly available in the scientific literature. The predominant scientific view is that, although a theoretical possibility, any horizontal transfer of transgenes from GM plants in the field would be an exceedingly rare event, and its success will depend greatly on the selective pressure acting on the outcome.

The Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) considers horizontal gene transfer in the environmental risk assessment that is conducted before any GM plants can be released. ACRE does not limit itself to considering horizontal gene transfer only from pollen and dust. ACRE concentrates on the likely consequences of such transfers, not on whether or not it could happen. If horizontal gene transfer from a particular GM plant is judged to be harmful to the environment, then the release would not be allowed.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his policy is on using his powers, following the farm-scale evaluations, to revoke consents (a) deliberately to release or (b) to market GM crops. [100002]

Mr. Mullin: If the farm-scale evaluations provide evidence that there is an adverse effect on human health or the environment as a result of the management of the herbicide tolerant GM crops, then the Government will act upon this evidence, and, if necessary, use the full extent of the powers available to protect human health and the environment, including revoking consents where appropriate.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if consent holders will be able to seek direct commercial benefit from the cultivation of GM crops in field-scale and other plantings, other than the farm-scale evaluations. [99905]

Mr. Mullin: The renewed agreement with industry on the conduct of the farm-scale evaluations announced on 5 November makes clear that none of the produce from GM crop plantings in the UK will be used in a way which is of direct commercial benefit to the consent holders during the farm-scale evaluation period. Any proposals for field-scale plantings other than those for the farm-scale evaluations must be agreed by the independent Scientific Steering Committee, in the light of their relevance to biodiversity research. Smaller than field-scale plantings, including those necessary for statutory UK and EU requirements, are not covered by the agreement.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if commercial benefits may accrue to any affiliated or associated companies of consent holders in relation to commercial growing of GM crops; [99918]

(2) if consent holders will be entitled to seek direct commercial benefit after the farm-scale evaluation period in respect of the cultivation of and the produce from GM crops during the evaluation period; [99906]

(3) if he will list the commercial benefits to which the voluntary agreement announced on 5 November on the commercial growing of GM crops does not apply; [99917]

(4) which persons will be entitled to seek commercial benefit from the growing of GM crops before 2003. [99919]

Mr. Mullin: The renewed agreement with industry announced on 5 November covers the conduct of the farm-scale evaluations for the next three years, through until the Scientific Steering Committee's review and recommendations following collection of data from the 2002 crop plantings. The agreement states that no direct commercial benefit will be sought from the plantings or obtained from use of the crops during the farm-scale evaluation period. This is to protect the integrity of the farm-scale evaluations as wholly concerned with biodiversity research. Subsequent use of produce is not covered by the agreement.

Examples of indirect commercial benefits that might accrue to the consent holders from the farm-scale evaluations could include results from the farm-scale evaluations that aided consent holders' other research work, or a change in share price if a crop was perceived to be proceeding satisfactorily through the evaluation process.

In the Government's view, the renewed agreement with industry does extend to affiliated or associated companies of consent holders. Our understanding is that the farmers growing the crops in the farm-scale evaluations are likely to be compensated by the consent holders; that would be a matter for them. If consents allow, farmers may be able to use produce on-farm as animal feed.

Council House Sale Receipts

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate how many additional council houses have been built as a result of his decision to release for use by local authorities, part of the capital receipts from previous council house sales. [100021]

Mr. Mullin: The available information relates to new build or purchase of existing dwellings by local authorities. Information provided by authorities on their plans for the use of Capital Receipts Initiative resources for 1997–98 and 1998–99 indicated that around 100 council houses would be built or purchased over the two years. Most of the resources have been used to carry out improvement and renovation work on existing local authority stock.

Elephants

Mr. Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to (a) oppose any change to the status of elephants at the next Conference of the Parties to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species which would allow any further international trade in elephant ivory and hides and (b) to consult with EU partners with a view to adopting a common EU position along such lines; if he will inform Parliament of the result of such consultations with EU partners in advance of the conference; and if he will make a statement. [100298]

Mr. Mullin: The 1997 Conference of Parties to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES) agreed an experimental one-off transhipment of ivory to Japan from Botswana, Namibia and Zimbabwe. This took place in July 1999, under stringent safeguards agreed by the Conference and CITES Standing Committee. Proceeds from the sales are being directed back into elephant conservation and community programmes. There can be no further trade in ivory unless the next CITES Conference, to be held in Nairobi in April 2000, agrees a specific proposal to permit this.

A key element of the 1997 decision was the setting up of new pan-African and Asian systems to Monitor Illegal Killing of Elephants (known as MIKE), together with an Elephant Trade Information System (ETIS). The MIKE system in particular is new and has not yet progressed to the state where Parties can expect it to produce reliable data in time for the CITES Conference next April.

The UK is Chair of the CITES Standing Committee and we were closely involved in devising and implementing the safeguards under which the 1997 experiment is being carried out. We regret that several Parties have submitted proposals to the next Conference without waiting for the full effects of the experiment to be monitored by the World Conservation Union (IUCN) and the UNEP CITES Secretariat. The Government believe that any change to the status of elephants at the next CITES Conference would be premature at present. We have made this known to the European Commission and our European partners. A meeting of the EC CITES Committee has been brought forward to 14 January 2000 at the request of the UK and we will seek a common EU position as soon as possible after that meeting takes place. I will inform Parliament of the outcome.

Railway Carriages

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what checks are made before a railway carriage that has been involved in an accident is put back into service; [100223]

(2) what percentage of railway carriages previously involved in accidents were put back into service in each of the last five years; [100224]

(3) what percentage of railway carriages currently in service have previously been in an accident. [100225]

Mr. Hill: This information is not available as it is not reportable to the Health and Safety Executive's Railway Inspectorate.

Repairs and maintenance of rolling stock following an accident is a matter for the vehicle owner.

If, however, the vehicle or carriage is substantially altered during repairs, approval will need to be obtained from HM Railway Inspectorate under the Railways and Other Transport Systems (Approval of Works, Plant and Equipment) Regulations 1994 before the vehicle or carriage can be put back into operation.

HMRI have enforcement powers under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 which they would use if there was any reason to believe that safety had been compromised either as a result of repair work or for any other reason.

Road Traffic (Pollution)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) at what level, compared to 1990, road traffic levels would have to be kept to ensure air quality targets for 2010 are met; [100468]

(2) to what level road traffic would need to be kept to ensure that carbon dioxide emissions from road traffic were 20 per cent. lower than those in 1990 by 2010; [100467]

(3) what assessment he has made of the impact of Government transport policies on traffic levels; what were traffic levels in 1990; and what are the projected levels for 2010. [100469]

Mr. Hill: No estimate has been made of the level of traffic in 2010 which would be consistent with road traffic emissions in that year being 20 per cent. below the 1990 level. Such an estimate would depend on the assumptions made in respect of a number of other factors, including the fuel efficiency of the vehicle fleet, the mix of traffic between vehicle types, and the speeds at which traffic moved. This means that there will be a range of 2010 traffic totals which would be consistent with any given level of road traffic CO_2 emissions.

Similar arguments apply to emissions of relevance to the National Air Quality Strategy, although here such an assessment would also need to take into account both significant variations in air quality at the local level, and emissions from non-transport sources, which can be just as important in addressing air quality objectives.

Motorised vehicle traffic on English roads in 1990 is estimated to have been some 353 billion vehicle kilometres. Revised assessments of future traffic levels, taking into account the potential impact of the Integrated Transport White Paper, are being prepared to inform the Government's first report under the Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Act 1998, which will be published shortly.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how he plans to assess the impact of road traffic in relation to (a) the emission of gases which contribute to climate change, (b) air quality, (c) health, (d) traffic congestion, (e) land and biodiversity, (f) danger to other road users and (g) society in accordance with the requirements of the Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Act 1998. [100466]

Mr. Hill: The Government will shortly be publishing their first report under the Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Act 1998 on the issue of whether to set a national road traffic reduction target. In preparation for that report, we are assessing how our policies can reduce each of these adverse impacts of road traffic.

Water Industry

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to increase competition in the water industry. [100439]

Mr. Mullin: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his pre-Budget report on 9 November 1999, Official Report, columns 883–906, the Government are carrying out a comprehensive review of competition in the water industry and aim to publish a consultation document on options for reform early in the new year.

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of outsourcing activities previously performed directly by water companies on quality and service standards. [100457]

Mr. Mullin: The Director General of Water Services publishes an annual "Report on levels of service for the water industry in England and Wales", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what allowance is made for regional variations and priorities in OFWAT's Water Companies Price Review. [100458]

Mr. Mullin: The price review is a matter for the Director General of Water Services. The Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions and the Secretary of State for Wales issued guidance to the Director General on the environmental and quality objectives to be achieved by the water industry between 2000 and 2005. These reflected local environmental priorities, but were defined to avoid unacceptable impacts on water prices in different parts of England and Wales.

In the case of Dwr Cymru (Welsh Water) and Dee Valley Water, the Secretary of State's functions in this matter transferred to the National Assembly for Wales on 1 July 1999.

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what information and communications with the water companies are used in the price review process and not reported in OFWAT's price determination document. [100454]

Mr. Mullin: This is a matter for the Director General of Water Services. His report "Final Determinations: Future water and sewerage charges 2000–05" includes a full account of the price review process.

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what consideration OFWAT is required to give to (a) environmental, (b) health and safety and (c) local economic factors during a water company price review. [100453]

Mr. Mullin: The Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales issued guidance to the Director General of Water Services on the environmental and quality objectives to be achieved by the water industry in England and Wales between 2000 and 2005. This guidance was published under the title "Raising the Quality" in September 1998, and was supported by more detailed announcements of company programmes on 1 March 1999.

In the case of Dwr Cymru (Welsh Water) and Dee Valley Water, the Secretary of State's functions transferred to the National Assembly for Wales on 1 July 1999. In respect of the remaining companies, the Secretary of State confirmed the environment and quality programme on 24 November.

The Director has a statutory duty to ensure that companies can finance the proper carrying of their functions. This includes obligations enforced by the Health and Safety Executive. The handling of the price review is a matter for the Director. I understand that he received representations on a wide range of issues, including factors such as local economic considerations.

Noise Pollution

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his Department's policy following the case of London Borough of Southwark v. Mills, in relation to the problem of noise pollution. [100436]

Mr. Hill: We have noted with interest this clarification of the law in relation to domestic noise activity.

Westminster Underground

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his Department's estimate of the opening date for Westminster Underground Station on the Jubilee Line. [100262]

Mr. Hill: London Transport aim to open the Jubilee Line station at Westminster shortly before Christmas. It is, however, a very deep and highly complex station, being constructed on an extremely constricted site. LT cannot therefore guarantee the opening date at present.

Bridstow Primary School

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment has been made of the provision of school crossing signs or signals on the A49 to ensure safer access to Bridstow Primary School; and if he will make a statement. [99852]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 26 November 1999]: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ginny Clarke to Mr. Paul Keetch, dated 1 December 1999:

I have been asked to reply to your question about the assessment for the provision of school crossing signs or signals on the A49 trunk road to ensure safer access to Bridstow Primary School.

There are school warning signs located on the approaches to this school to alert motorists to the presence of schoolchildren but there are no signals. The Highways Agency has not undertaken an assessment for signals in this location, but Herefordshire Council, who have responsibility for deciding on the need for a crossing patrol, has advised that the school does not meet the criteria for a patrol. In these circumstances, flashing amber signals would not be appropriate.

If a crossing patrol were to be operated at the school, the Highways Agency would, of course, give serious consideration to the provision of flashing amber signals.

If you would like to discuss the matter further, Tom Barry, the Highways Agency's Area 9 Manager, would be pleased to help. Tom is based at the Birmingham office at Broadway, Broad Street, Birmingham B15 1BL and can contacted by telephone on 0121 678 8366.

I hope this is helpful.

Waste Edible Oils

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many tonnes per annum of waste edible oils are produced in the UK from the UK's food manufacturing base and catering establishments; and if he will make a statement. [100221]

Mr. Mullin: The exact amount of waste of this type is not known. However, the Feed Fat Association estimate that some 90,000 tonnes of waste edible oils are recycled each year from UK food establishments.

Road Tolls

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions by how much he estimates a road toll of (a) £1, (b) £5 and (c) £10 per private car would reduce road traffic; and what is the basis of his estimate. [99924]

Mr. Prescott [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The Government are providing powers for local authorities to put forward road user charging schemes if they think these are appropriate to deal with traffic management locally. The Secretary of State will not approve any congestion charging scheme unless: public transport has been improved first to offer motorists choice, before charging sets starts; local people have been consulted; it is clear that all proceeds will be put into improving local transport; and the appropriate technology will be in place to make it work.

The impact of road user charges on road traffic will vary accordingly to a number of factors including location, prevailing road and traffic conditions and the complimentary traffic and wider transport measures introduced alongside charges.

Water Directives

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what time scale he has set for achieving the guide values in the Bathing Water, Shellfish Waters, Surface Water Abstraction and Freshwater Fish Directives; [100340]

(2) if the guide value contained in the Bathing Water Directive, the Shellfish Waters Directive, the Surface Water Abstraction Directive and the Freshwater Fish Directive are mandatory standards; and what directions he has given to the Environment Agency on enforcing them; [100401]

(3) what plans he has to enforce the guide values contained in the Bathing Water, Shellfish Waters, Surface Water Abstraction and Freshwater Fish Directives; and if he will make a statement. [100342]

Mr. Mullin: The EC Directives on Bathing Waters, Shellfish Waters, Surface Water Abstraction and Freshwater Fish set guide values which are not mandatory values and which member states must endeavour to observe, in the case of the first two instruments, or respect, in the case of the remaining two. The obligations of each Directive, including on guide values, have been incorporated in the transposing legislation which places duties on the Environment Agency. The Government expect to see progress towards the guide values which have been set.

Shellfish

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what standards of faecal coliforms in shellfish flesh or intervalvular liquid he has directed the Environment Agency to observe; and whether these standards are expressed in terms of shellfish flesh or shellfish liquid. [100339]

Mr. Mullin: The Environment Agency is under a duty to endeavour to observe a guideline value of 300/100ml in shellfish flesh and intervalvular liquid as set out in the Surface Waters (Shellfish) Directions 1997.

Road Safety

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he proposes to introduce to improve road safety and reduce road fatalities. [100656]

Mr. Hill: We will shortly be publishing a new road safety strategy which will include casualty reduction targets for the year 2010. The strategy will set out a range of measures for reducing road casualties and improving road safety.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to issue guidance on future funding criteria for Regional Development Agencies; and if he will make a statement. [100519]

Ms Beverley Hughes: There are no plans to issue any such guidance. The funding arrangement is for the Public Expenditure Settlement, which covers a three-year period, to determine the overall provision for each RDA, taking account of their corporate plan. In making yearly allocations under the Settlement, the Government take account of any criteria relating to a particular programme and the RDAs current corporate plan, including matters such as the agency's effectiveness in carrying out its responsibilities.

Rents

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what evidence he has received to date, in respect of the forthcoming review of housing benefit, of the impact of fluctuations in standard reference rents on the ability of tenants to take up and retain tenancies. [100770]

Mr. Mullin: We have received representations from a number of organisations. My Department has, jointly with the Department of Social Security, commissioned and published research on housing benefit and the private rented sector, and is undertaking research on a range of related issues, including the work of rent officers.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the Government's policy on determining regional boundaries for the local delivery of services funded by central Government departments; and if he will make a statement. [100627]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government's policy is set out in the White Paper "Modernising government". There is a presumption that Departments and other public bodies should adopt the boundaries used by the Government Offices in the Regions unless there are strong overriding considerations for not doing so. Progress will be reviewed in 2002.

Rail Safety

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam will receive a letter from the Chair of the Health and Safety Commission concerning signals passed at danger. [100447]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 30 November 1999]: I understand that a letter was sent to the hon. Member on 29 November.

London Social Services

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each London borough how many (a) people were registered homeless, (b) people were on local authority waiting lists, (c) local authority housing visits were completed, and (d) registered social visits were completed (i) in the financial year 1998–99 and (ii) in the present financial year. [100803]

Mr. Mullin: The latest available information is given in the table. Information on visits carried out by local authorities is not collected centrally.

Local authorities have different practices for compiling and managing housing register/waiting lists which mean that simple comparisons between authorities can be misleading.

House Selling

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to require energy audits and advice to be included in the information provided by house vendors (a) in the pilot schemes of his house selling proposals and (b) subsequently. [100801]

Mr. Mullin: A key proposal in our package of reforms to the home buying and selling process is a requirement for the seller or the seller's agent to put together a pack of standard documents and information for prospective buyers, before the property is put on the market. The pack should include a house condition report which contains an assessment of how energy efficient the property is. The pack, including a house condition report and energy efficiency assessment, will be tested in the Bristol Pilot scheme starting later this month.

Common Land (Vehicle Access)

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to amend the law relating to common land, with respect to vehicle access; and if he will make a statement. [100708]

Mr. Mullin: In addition to our proposals to give a statutory right of access on foot to registered common land, the Government are considering whether there should be any further changes to the legislation that affects common land. If so, there will be public consultation on what changes would be desirable.

London Underground

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made on the proposals for integrating London Underground's sub-surface lines with the national railway network; and if he will make a statement. [101288]

Mr. Prescott: I announced in June that Railtrack and London Transport would be investigating the scope for taking forward two specific integration schemes, running East-West and North-South, and, on that basis, Railtrack would bid for the PPP contract to maintain and upgrade the Underground lines in question.

Railtrack and London Transport have not found it possible to identify a practicable scheme to integrate the Tube and the national railway network on an East-West axis on the basis and timetable envisaged in June. All the options would have involved a connection through Paddington. This has highlighted a number of issues relating to constraints on capacity in the Paddington approaches, not least in the light of the Ladbroke Grove tragedy.

Accordingly, the Government, Railtrack and London Transport have together agreed that there is no longer sufficient basis for an exclusive PPP negotiation between London Transport and Railtrack on the sub-surface lines and links with the national railway.

Competitions for the two deep-tube PPPs are well underway and London Transport will now commence a competition for the sub-surface PPP structure so as to leave open the option of integration from the west of London at some point in the future.

The work so far has confirmed the validity of an integration scheme on a North-South axis, based on extending the London Underground East London Line to North London from Whitechapel, and to south and south-west London from Canada Water and New Cross. I have asked Sir Alastair Morton and the shadow Strategic Rail Authority to advise me as soon as possible on the best way of implementing North-South integration taking into account the parallels with Thameslink, and the need to obtain the necessary approvals.

I have also asked Sir Alastair Morton and the shadow Strategic Rail Authority to undertake a wide-ranging study of the capacity issues and potential for integration to the west of London. The shadow Strategic Rail Authority will be working closely with Railtrack and LT in undertaking these studies.

Railtrack and Government will of course continue to work together on a range of initiatives based on our plans for a growing railway, which will mean Railtrack delivering a large programme of infrastructure projects to improve the capacity and quality of the network, not least in major works such as the Channel Tunnel Rail Link.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Minority Ethnic Groups

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will arrange for regular surveys of the police and other public services to monitor progress towards equal satisfaction with those services among black and other minority ethnic groups. [100027]

Mr. Charles Clarke: So far as the police service is concerned, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary set a Ministerial Priority in June to increase trust and confidence in policing among minority ethnic communities in line with Recommendation 1 of the Macpherson report. Recommendation 2 of that report proposed a range of performance indicators for assessing achievement of the Priority, which included achieving equal satisfaction levels across all ethnic groups in public satisfaction surveys. The Steering Group which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary chairs to oversee the implementation of the Action Plan published in March as the Government's response to the Macpherson report, approved at its October meeting proposals for the development of indicators in line with Recommendation 2 including satisfaction surveys. Further work is currently being undertaken on the development of this indicator.

For other public services, the Home Office is committed to the establishment of government-wide and departmental performance indicators to measure improvements in race equality. Work is currently being undertaken on the development of these indicators which are likely to include measures of confidence in public services. The performance indicators will be announced in Spring 2000.

Cremation

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many bodies have been cremated in the United Kingdom in each of the past five years; and, in each year, what percentage cremations constituted of the number of deaths. [99915]

Mr. Boateng: The table sets out statistics from the Office for National Statistics and the Federation of British Cremation Authorities.

Year	Number of cremations	Number of deaths	Percentage of cremations
1994	434,223	627,636	69.2
1995	445,574	645,493	69
1996	445,934	636,007	70.1
1997	446,305	629,746	70.9
1998	439,145	629,112	69.8

Defendant Statistics

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) for each year since 1990, in what percentage of either-way cases that went to trial before a jury the defendant was found guilty; and what the percentage conviction rate was in such cases for (a) white defendants and (b) black and ethnic minority defendants; [100249]

(2) in each year since 1990, what was the average length of sentence imposed on defendants found guilty in either-way cases that went to trial before a jury; and what was the average length sentence imposed in such cases on (a) white defendants and (b) black and ethnic minority defendants; [100251]

(3) what was the conviction rate for (a) white defendants and (b) black and ethnic minority defendants appearing before magistrates' courts for each year since 1990. [100250]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Home Office collected data on disposals at magistrates' courts by ethnicity of defendant in 1998 in 11 police force areas. These are pilot studies and work is required to address data quality problems. However, information from four of the areas (Lancashire, Leicestershire, Northumbria and West Yorkshire (Bradford and Keighley)) will be published in "Statistics on Race and the Criminal Justice System" on 9 December 1999. The information will cover prosecutions and sentencing for indictable offences. It shows that for cases disposed of (other than by committal) at magistrates' courts, the conviction rate is 67 per cent. for white defendants and 57 per cent. for black defendants.

Copies of the publication will be sent to the Library.

No national information from the Crown Court is available by ethnic group although pilots are under way. Crown Court information from the Home Office Court proceedings Database is given in the table.

Defendants pleading not guilty [1] to triable either way offences at the Crown Court, England and Wales, 1995–98

Year	Percentage found guilty	Percentage of those found guilty given a custodial sentence	Average custodial sentence length (months)
1995[2]	43	57	24.7
1996	44	61	25.0
1997	41	62	27.6
1998	38	62	28.3

[1] Pleaded not guilty to principal offence; some of those found not guilty may not have been tried by a jury (eg the judge may have ordered or directed an acquittal).
[2] Plea data only available from July 1995

Life Sentences

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of (a) men and (b) women serving a life prison sentence in prisons in England and Wales on 1 November. [100444]

Mr. Boateng: The latest available provisional information is for 31 October 1999. On that date, there were 4,175 male and 149 female life sentence prisoners in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales.

Operation Care

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in relation to Operation Care how many complaints have been received from how many complainants. [100232]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information on the number of claimants is not readily available. The number of complaints received reflects each separate complaint rather than the number of individuals who claim to have been abused. As of 8 July 1999, the number of separate complaints received was 759.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what meetings his Department has held with members of the legal profession involved in Operation Care. [100235]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that there have been no meetings between Home Office officials and members of the legal profession involved in Operation Care.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many defence witnesses have been arrested as part of Operation Care. [100233]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There is no requirement in law for the defence to provide either the Crown Prosecution Service or the police with lists of defence witnesses at any stage of an investigation. I cannot say therefore whether any individual arrested as part of Operation Care might also be a defence witness.

Local Authority Care Homes (Abuse)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance his Department issues to police authorities relating to the conduct of investigations of cases of sexual abuse in local authority care homes. [100237]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In August, the Government issued draft new inter-agency guidance "Working Together to Safeguard Children" which takes account of new research, experience and legislation concerning child abuse. It includes a section on children living away from home and provides guidance on investigating allegations of abuse committed by professionals, carers or volunteers. A final version of the document will be issued in the new year.

Child Pornography

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action the Government are taking to prevent child pornography being transmitted over the Internet; and what penalties exist to deter those responsible for publishing child pornography over the Internet. [100293]

Mr. Boateng: The criminal law applies equally to material on computer systems as to material in other forms. We have very strict legislation against child pornography which makes it an offence to produce, circulate or possess with a view to distribution any indecent photograph of a child under 16. These offences carry a maximum sentence of three years' imprisonment, an unlimited fine or both. The simple possession of an indecent photograph of a child is also an offence and carries a maximum sentence of six months' imprisonment.

Section 84 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 updated these controls to include indecent computer-generated photographs of children and they have been successfully applied to child pornography transmitted over the Internet.

We are determined to ensure that there are effective measures against child pornography. We support the work of the Internet Watch Foundation (IWF) which passes to the police details of potentially unlawful material brought to their attention by members of the public via a specially established hotline. If the originators of the material are abroad, the Foundation passes the report to the National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS) who liaise with the enforcement agencies of the countries concerned. The IWF took action on 430 reports of alleged child pornography in 1998.

The Government also fully support international initiatives in the Council of Europe and the G8 to combat criminal misuse of the Internet.

Police Manpower

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total change in England and Wales in the number of (a) all police officers, (b) police constables, (c) civilian police force staff and (d) special constables between May 1997 and the last date for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [99793]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 26 November 1999]: Information is available in respect of numbers at March 1997 and March 1999. The information is set out in the table.

Police service numbers for March 1997 and March 1999

Police Service Numbers	March 1997	March 1999	Total Change
Total Police Officers[1]	127,158	126,096	−1,062
Police Constables[1]	98,132	97,520	−612
Civilian police force staff[1]	53,011	53,031	+20
Special Constables	19,864	16,484	−3,390

[1] Full-time equivalent numbers

The powers of the Home Secretary to set police establishment levels for each force were removed under the Police and Magistrates' Courts Act 1994. It is for the chief officer to determine staffing requirements within the overall resources available.

The drop in the number of special constables has resulted mainly from police forces applying higher standards when recruiting them. The use of higher standards for recruiting reflects the fact that special constables are now being deployed on duties very similar to those of regular officers.

Asylum

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the aim of clearing all current cases by October 2000, stated by the permanent secretary in his letter of 13 October to the Public Accounts Committee, refers to all current asylum cases or to all asylum cases involving children. [100483]

Mrs. Roche: The aim mentioned in the letter of 13 October referred to all asylum cases. This aim is a milestone to delivery of the published targets in April 2001. It will be kept under review in the light of pressures created by the current high level of asylum applications.

Computer-based Crime

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to develop a national fraud squad to tackle computer-based crime. [100404]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There are proposals for the establishment of a Computer Crime Unit within the National Criminal Intelligence Service, but this would not constitute a national fraud squad.

Integrated Casework Directorate

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the benchmark against which he plans to measure the four key performance indicators for the Integrated Casework Directorate listed by the permanent secretary in his letter of 13 October to the Clerk of the Public Accounts Committee. [100484]

Mrs. Roche: The benchmark figures for each of the four key performance indicators were compiled from statistics showing the output of the Asylum Directorate, the After Entry and Appeals Directorate and the European Directorate over a 13 week period between September and November 1998, divided by 13 to obtain an average weekly figure. The figures are as follows:

Category	Number of decisions
Asylum casework	650
Asylum appeals	250
European casework	250
General/settlement casework	4,100
Total	5,250

Deportees

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have been deported over the past 12 months; and on what grounds. [100614]

Mrs. Roche: The total number of people who have been removed or departed voluntarily from the United Kingdom between October 1998 and September 1999 is shown in the table. Regrettably, information about the grounds of removal could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Total number of persons[1] removed or departed voluntarily under port or enforcement procedures, October 1998 to September 1999

	Number
Port removals[2]	30,710
Illegal entry removals[3]	5,320
Deportation removals[3]	1,220

[1] Does not include persons who may leave the United Kingdom without informing the Immigration and Nationality Directorate.
[2] Refused leave to enter and removed.
[3] Figures are provisional and include persons departing voluntarily after enforcement action had been initiated against them.
Note:
All figures are rounded to 10.

30-year Rule

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the extent to which the 30 year rule is proposed to be relaxed in the Freedom of Information Bill; and (a) what kind of records will be released which would otherwise have been held for 30 years and (b) on what grounds records will continue to be held for the 30 year period. [100659]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Freedom of Information legislation will not affect the 30 year rule, as the principles governing the release of records at 30 years will remain broadly the same.

However, under the proposals in the Freedom of Information Bill, many more records will be released earlier, and therefore, fewer records will fall to be released at 30 years.

It is not possible to specify particular records which will be released under Freedom of Information, as earlier releases will be spread across a range of records which would otherwise have been held until 30 years.

The Freedom of Information Bill contains certain exemptions which provide the grounds for withholding information beyond 30 years. These grounds are: information supplied by, or relating to, work of the security services; national Security; defence; international relations; the economy; information from confidential sources in the course of investigations and proceedings; law enforcement (until 100 years); honours (until 75 years); health and safety; personal information (for the lifetime of the individual concerned); information provided in confidence; and specific statutory bars on disclosure.

However, even where an exemption in the Bill applies, the Public Record Office, or the authority holding the information, must consider on a case by case basis any discretion it may have to disclose the information, deciding whether the public interest in disclosure outweighs that of maintaining the exemption.

Police (Conflict Resolution)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the conflict resolution manual, revised by ACPO's Self-defence and Restraint Committee, will contain information on dealing with a mental illness; if the revision has been completed; how beat officers will receive this information; and if the manual will be made available to members of the public. [100718]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand from the Self-Defence, Arrest and Restraint sub-committee that work is continuing on revision of the manual, and that the inclusion of information on dealing with persons with a mental illness will be considered as this work progresses.

The contents of the manual will be disseminated to officers through Personal Safety training . A decision on whether the manual can be made public will be made by the Association of Chief Police Officers once the drafting work is complete.

Shotgun Licences

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people living in England and Wales hold a shotgun licence. [100766]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The number of shot gun certificates on issue at the end of 1998 was 627,600.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the letters to him, dated 28 July, 10 September and 14 October, from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, concerning Bulbur Begum. [100638]

Mrs. Roche: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary wrote to my right hon. Friend on 26 November.

Hashman and Harrup

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what policy changes the Government plans to implement following the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Hashman and Harrup. [100588]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government intend to review the powers to bind over once all the relevant cases before the European Court of Human Rights have been decided. The case of Steel and others established that the powers to bind over to keep the peace are sufficiently well established to comply with the Convention. Following the decision in Hashman and Harrup, we shall study the Court's judgment carefully and consider how best to advise the courts and the police on the use of the power to bind over to be of good behaviour.

CS Spray

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action his Department plans to take following the September publication of the reports by the Committee on Toxicity, Mutagenicity and Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment concerning the effects of CS spray. [100782]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Following the report by the independent Committees on Toxicity, Mutagenicity and Carcinogenicity, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary indicated that there was no reason to consider withdrawing CS spray from police use.

Operational guidelines issued by the Association of Chief Police Officers have been revised to take account of the report's findings concerning the use of CS with persons who are mentally ill and those who may have respiratory conditions. The guidelines include appropriate advice on aftercare and will be issued to chief officers shortly.

The Home Office will be taking forward with the Department of Health the report's recommendation for follow up studies into persons who have received medical treatment following the use of CS spray. In addition, the Home Office's Police Scientific Development Branch is continuing work looking at alternative solvents and potential alternative incapacitants.

Probation Service

Mr. Alan Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department by what name he intends the reformed Probation Service for England and Wales to be known. [101283]

Mr. Boateng: A Bill, to be introduced to this House, will reform and modernise the Probation Service within England and Wales. The modernised service will be known as The Community Punishment and Rehabilitation Service for England and Wales (CPRS). This Service has a key role to play in delivering the Government's aims on effective sentencing and punishment that:

The public is protected from dangerous offenders;

Offenders are properly punished and their sentences are rigorously enforced;

Punishments are made to work better both in prison and outside; and Courts have available to them a flexible range of sentences.

The Probation Service has not been well served in recent years by its name, with offenders and the general public alike unsure of its role. The new name encapsulates the Service's role as a law enforcement agency and sends out a clear message to offenders that punishment in the community is not a soft option but one that should work to reduce re-offending.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with regard to projects at the Kennedy Institute of Rheumatology, London, involving the artificial induction of arthritis in mice, what steps were taken to assess the validity of the proposed research and identify other potential sources of the information required before the licence was granted. [100707]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, project licences are issued only if the likely benefits (to man, animals or the environment) outweigh the costs to the animals involved and if there are no alternatives which replace animal use, reduce the number of animals needed or refine the experimental design to minimise suffering. The Animals (Scientific Procedures) Inspectorate advises on whether, and on what terms, licences and certificates should be granted or amended.

Xenotransplantation

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many transgenic pigs have been released since 1 January under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 for export from the UK for use in (a) medical research and (b) breeding programmes; and to which countries they have been exported. [100702]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: 49 pigs were exported in March and a further 40 in July. Both batches were exported to the United States of America for use in breeding programmes.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many project licences have been issued during the current year for primates to be used in xenotransplantation procedures, broken down by (a) type of procedure, (b) severity banding of procedure, (c) number of primates used per procedure and (d) origin of primates used. [100701]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: One licence has been issued this year for kidney transplants from transgenic pigs to primates. The severity banding is moderate. 14 macaques were used in 14 procedures and all were obtained from the Philippines.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many procedures have taken place under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 whereby baboons have been given humanised pig hearts; how many baboons were involved; and how many days each survived. [100703]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Since the commencement of baboon studies in 1966, a total of 44 baboons have received transgenic pig hearts, with the longest survival time reaching 99 days. In addition, five animals received non-transgenic hearts.

Political Party Funding

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans the Government have to regulate political party funding, donations and sponsorship for (a) events, (b) conferences and (c) elections. [100428]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Proposals for legislation on these matters, in response to the Fifth Report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life on the funding of political parties, were published on 27 July 1999 and a Bill will be introduced into Parliament later this session.

Strip Searches

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the reasons are for the delay in the publication of his Department's recommendations following its review of strip search procedures; and if he will make a statement. [100173]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service has not yet submitted its recommendations to me. The report is being finalised. Its completion has been delayed because of competing pressures and the complexity of the Prison Service regulations concerned. I understand that I will receive the report and the recommendations shortly. As agreed by the then Minister of State for the Home Department, my right hon. Friend, the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin) in her reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) on 15 July 1997, Official Report, column 98W, a copy will be placed in the Library when it is completed.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Lackenby to Shipton Pylon Line

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate his Department has made of the final total cost to public funds of improving the approach roads to the National Grid Company's Lackenby to Shipton transmission line. [100725]

Mrs. Liddell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to her by my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford and Urmston (Ms Hughes), the Under-Secretary on 8 November 1999, Official Report, column 391W.

World Trade Organisation

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure legitimate concerns about health, environmental and animal welfare issues can be effectively accommodated with the rules of the World Trade Organisation. [100698]

Mr. Caborn: Existing WTO rules allow Governments wide scope to impose trade restrictions as a means of addressing concerns about health and many environmental issues. However, the Government, along with its EU partners, believe there is room for some improvements in the rules, particularly better to accommodate environmental and animal welfare concerns, and are pressing for these subjects to be included in the forthcoming negotiations.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who is the business representative on the Government's delegation to the World Trade Organisation meeting in Seattle. [100697]

Mr. Caborn: The business representative is the Chairman of the CBI's Trade Policy Working Group.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what (i) discussions he has had with and (ii) communications have been received from industry and business associations in respect of the World Trade Organisation meeting in Seattle. [100700]

Mr. Caborn: Ministers and officials have had many discussions with and communications from industry and business associations in respect of the meeting in Seattle. Broadly, industry is very supportive of the launch of a new comprehensive round of trade negotiations, recognising the importance to the UK economy of open markets and removing barriers to trade.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what position the Government will be adopting at the World Trade Organisation ministerial meetings in Seattle in respect of the previously agreed end to the multi-fibre arrangement. [100699]

Mr. Caborn: In the Government's view, the terms of the phase-out of the multi-fibre arrangement set out in the GATT Uruguay round agreement on textiles and clothing (ATC) should not be reopened and all signatories should implement the agreement in full.

Export Finance

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Government's discussions with the banks concerning their future remuneration under ECGD's fixed rate export finance scheme. [101287]

Mr. Byers: These discussions are now concluded. The previous arrangements expired on 30 November.

A new scale of remuneration, which seeks an equitable balance between the interests of the banks, the taxpayer and the exporter, has been introduced with effect from 1 December.

A copy of the memorandum which sets out the details of the new arrangements has been placed in the Library of the House for information.

ECGD

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what financial support has been provided for the ECGD in each of the last five years from public funds. [100513]

Mr. Caborn: ECGD receives funds from three votes—administration, public expenditure and trading. The actual outturn as reported in the appropriation accounts for the last five years is outlined in the table.

£000

Year	Administration Vote	Public Expenditure Vote	Trading Vote	Total
1994–95	28,002	(25,080)	(17,295)	(14,373)
1995–96	24,582	15,789	(264,105)	(223,734)
1996–97	22,824	17,771	(122,197)	(81,602)
1997–98	22,627	40,077	(53,152)	9,552
1998–99	22,885	[1]318,959	(110,135)	231,709

[1] The increase in the Public Expenditure Vote in 1998–99 is in respect of a loan from Treasury to enable the refinancing of outstanding export finance which will bring future financial benefits to the Exchequer.

Notes:

1. Figures in brackets indicate a net contribution to the exchequer
2. Figures for 1998–99 have been certified by the NAO but not laid before Parliament

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what role the ECGD plays in the securing of (a) military aircraft export orders and (b) overseas sales of commercial aircraft. [100512]

Mr. Caborn: ECGD's guarantees to exporters and banks help UK exporters to secure contracts including in the aerospace field.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those categories of commercial transactions which do not qualify for ECGD support. [100516]

Mr. Caborn: ECGD provides guarantees for finance products of two years or more. These finance products are applicable to exports of a capital or semi-capital nature plus related services. ECGD does not normally provide support for exports that only justify less than two year credit terms.

ECGD also provides insurance-based products:

1. to exporters who have cash or near cash contracts of a capital or project nature plus related services;
2. as the provider of reinsurance to the commercial insurance market when required; and
3. through its Overseas Investment Insurance scheme.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which OECD countries have export insurance schemes providing the same categories of cover as are presently available via the ECGD. [100507]

Mr. Caborn: The majority of OECD countries have export credit insurance schemes which are broadly similar to that provided by the ECGD, although not all have privatised their short-term credit insurance operations. In respect of medium and long-term business (involving credit terms of two years or more) there is a common system to classify the sovereign and country credit risk of buyer/borrower countries under an agreement concluded through the OECD—the Arrangement on Guidelines for Officially Supported Export Credits.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Civil Servants

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many civil servants were employed by his Department in (a) 1999, (b) 1998 and (c) 1997. [99052]

Mr. Wills: The number of civil servants employed by the Department for Education and Employment in 1999, 1998 and 1997 were as follows:

	1 April 1997	1 April 1998	1 April 1999
Department for Education and Employment	[1]4,679	4,061	4,251
Government Office	[1]n/a	673	624
Employment Service	31,550	30,796	32,675
Total	36,229	35,530	37,550

[1] At 1 April 1997, the Government Office staff were included in the figures for DfEE.

Note:

The figures are based on full-time equivalents and include casual staff.

The increase in staff shown by the Employment Service is a direct result of using more personal advisers and New Deal activities.

Departmental running costs for the periods in question are as follows:

Department for Education and Employment including Government Office

	£ million
1996–97	264.8
1997–98	237.2
1998–99	255.9

These are the net running cost figures from the Treasury's Public Expenditure Survey database, as at September 1999.The apparent "dip" in running costs in 1997–98 is caused by the use of end year flexibilities in both 1996–97 and 1998–99 to meet staff restructuring costs within the Employment Service and DfEE.

Employment Service

	£ million
1996–97	929.2
1997–98	[1]853.7
1998–99	[1]911.1

[1] Includes impact of the "Windfall Tax". This is the one-off receipt raised on the excess profits of the privatised utilities. The tax is being used to fund the Welfare to Work programme. The Welfare to Work programme incorporates all the "New Deal" activities and is designed to extend new work opportunities to people detached from the labour market.

British Teachers (European Union Schools)

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to ensure that British teachers working in the European Schools are eligible for the promotion on pay scales to which they are entitled under the European Schools Statute. [100065]

Mr. Wicks: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) on 21 July 1999, Official Report, columns 538–39W.

Target Setting

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many targets have been agreed between his Department and (i) local authorities and (ii) other bodies apart from his own agencies and non-departmental bodies since May 1997. [99472]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 24 November 1999]: My Department has set out a number of Key Performance targets in its PSA and Strategic Framework to 2002, including the National Learning Targets for England for 2002. The Key Performance targets underpinned by targets set with local authorities and other bodies, excluding our own agencies and non-departmental bodies, since May 1997, are listed:

DfEE target: a reduction by one third in school truancies (from 0.7 per cent. to 0.5 per cent. half days missed a year through unauthorised absence), and exclusions (from 12,500 to 8,400 permanent exclusions a year) by 2002.

Local authorities have been required to set targets for reducing unauthorised absence and for reducing permanent exclusions for the three years commencing 1999–2000. These targets have been included in their Education Development Plans. Provisions under the Schools Standards and Framework Act 1998 also allow the Secretary of State to require governing bodies of maintained schools to set school-level targets for reducing unauthorised absence where their attendance is significantly below average. During 1999, 304 schools have been asked to set targets.

DfEE target: an increase in the proportion of those aged 11 meeting the standard of literacy for that age (level 4 in the KS2 test) from 63 per cent. to 80 per cent. by 2002, and an increase in the proportion of those aged 11 meeting the standard of numeracy for that age (level 4 in the KS2 test) from 62 per cent. to 75 per cent. by 2002.

Targets at local education authority level for the achievement of 11-year-olds in literacy and numeracy, as measured by the Key Stage 2 national curriculum tests in English and maths, have been agreed with the Department for 2000 and 2002. Local education authorities are also required to submit to the Department targets for their authority for 2001 by January 2000, as part of the process of revising their Education Development Plans.

DfEE targets: an increase in the proportion of those aged 16 who achieve one or more GCSEs at grade G or equivalent, from 92 per cent. to 95 per cent. by 2002, and an increase in the proportion of those aged 16 who achieve five or more GCSEs grades A-C from 45 per cent. to 50 per cent. by 2002.*

Each local authority has agreed with the Department three targets for achievement by pupils aged 16: the percentage gaining 5 or more GCSEs at A8-C; the percentage gaining at least 1 GCSE at A*-G (or equivalent); and the average points score per pupil. These targets are listed in the authority's Education Development Plan.

DfEE target: 45 per cent. of medium sized or large organisations and 10,000 small organisations are recognised as Investors in People by 2002.

The Department sets targets for Training Enterprise Councils each year which reflect their local contribution to the national target.

The Department's Key Performance targets are also supported at operational level by numerous other targets to ensure delivery by individual units. Listing all of the Operational Targets the Department has agreed with local authorities and other bodies would be inappropriate and disproportionate in terms of resource. However, the DfEE annual Departmental Report and Annual Report of the Employment Service does include performance related information.

Youth Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the outcome of the Youth Council held in Brussels on 23 November; and if he will make a statement. [99846]

Mr. Wills: The European Commission presented its future approach to youth affairs on which there was an exchange of views. The Commission also summarised progress on its proposal for Recommendations concerning the application of Community law in the field of mobility of students, trainees, young volunteers, teachers and instructors.

The Presidency gave a progress report on the proposal for a Decision of the European Parliament and of the Council establishing the Community action programme for youth. Following discussion, the Presidency concluded that conciliation would take place during the Portuguese Presidency. All the European Parliament's second reading amendments, including the budget for the programme, would be carefully considered.

The Council agreed the text of its Resolution on the non-formal education dimension of sporting activities in the European Community Youth programmes. The Resolution is a mixed Resolution of the Council and Ministers of the member states meeting in the Council[1], and will be adopted at a future Council of Ministers. The Commission's view that this should only be a Council Resolution would be noted.

The draft conclusions on the implementation of measures to combat child sex tourism were presented by the Presidency which also summarised youth activities which it had organised during its Presidency.

[1] The Resolution acknowledges that sport is one of way of working with young people. However, whilst the Community has competence for co-ordination in the field of youth, sports policy remains the competence of member states. The mixed Resolution therefore reflects this difference in competence.

Departmental Estate

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what his estimate is of land and property (a) in Scotland, (b) in the United Kingdom, (c) overseas and (d) in total for (i) his core Department and (ii) the Employment Service; and what is the total value of other assets held by each of these bodies. [99841]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 26 November 1999]: For the core Department, we are unable to provide value information because it is being developed as part of the implementation of resource accounting. The information is currently being audited. The first set of resource accounts will be published in respect of 1999–2000.

Value information for the Employment Service (ES) is set out as follows. These values have been derived from accounting information used to produce the audited 1998–99 ES published accounts.

As at 31 March 1999:	£
Total value of Land and Property in ES
(a) In Scotland	16,056,242
(b) In the United Kingdom	125,118,000
(c) Overseas	0
Total	141,174,242
Total value of all other assets held by ES
(a) In Scotland	1,714,746
(b) In the United Kingdom	77,070,000
(c) Overseas	0

SSAs

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will give the median and the semi-interquartile range for (a) SSA per primary pupil and (b) SSA per secondary pupil, adjusted for inflation, for all local education authorities in England and Wales for the 10 years from 1990–91 to 1999–2000. [100341]

Median and interquartile ranges for real terms SSAs: 1990–91 to 1999–200

Sexually Abused Victims

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance his Department issues to local education authorities regarding compensation payments to victims of sexual abuse. [100239]

Ms Estelle Morris: My Department does not issue guidance to local authorities on compensation payments to victims of sexual abuse. That is a matter for the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority and the Courts.

Undergraduates

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many students enrolled in their first year at universities in England for the academic years (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1998–99; [100247]

(2) how many students continued with their second year of study at English universities for the academic years (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1999–2000. [100246]

Mr. Wicks: The available information is shown in the following table.

Full-time first degree students in higher education institutions in England

Academic year	Students in their first year of study	Students in their second year of study
1996–97	259,647	—
1997–98	—	213,833
1998–99	261,433	—
1999–2000[1]	—	n/a

[1] Data for 1999–2000 will not be available until April 2000.

These figures cannot be used to calculate non-completion rates directly. Some students switch from full-time to part-time study, while others suspend studies for a year but return to qualify later. In addition the available figures will include those who are repeating the first year of their course and those who fail their first year examinations.

The latest information on non-completion rates published by the Department relates to students beginning full-time and sandwich first degree courses in 1995–96, and shows that between 18–19 per cent. of these students failed to complete their course, a low figure compared to other countries. ("Non-completion" covers students who leave their course for various reasons, over the duration of their course.)Information on student progression for individual higher education institutions in the UK will be published on 3 December, in the Higher Education Funding Council for England's "Higher Education Performance Indicators". These calculations take into account the wider variety of patterns of attendance of students, including factors such as changing courses or institutions and repeating or intermitting years of study.

Class Sizes

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many classes of 30 and over for five to seven year olds were recorded for schools in Shropshire in (a) May 1997 and (b) the latest available date; and if he will make a statement. [100592]

Ms Estelle Morris: Figures relating to the size of Key Stage 1 classes are collected in January, and (from 1998) also in September. In January 1997, there were 109 Key Stage 1 classes in Shropshire LEA taught by one teacher with 31 or more pupils. In April 1998, following local government reorganisation, Shropshire LEA split into two: Shropshire and Telford and Wrekin LEAs. In January 1999, there was a combined total of 51 such classes in Shropshire and Telford and Wrekin. The corresponding figure for September 1999 was 10.

Architecture Students

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will issue guidance to local authorities on advising architecture students to apply for funding for their entire course at the start of the course. [100629]

Mr. Wicks: Local education authorities recognise the distinctive two-part structure of the architecture course and the need to encourage eligible students to apply at the outset for support for all years of the course. Where students do not apply immediately, they can make a later application for support for Part II of the architecture course. LEAs have discretion to continue their eligibility for support for the whole of the course at any time before they complete Part 1. Nevertheless, we shall consider the case for additional guidance for the next academic year.

Teaching Vacancies (Bolton)

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teaching vacancies there are in (a) maintained schools and (b) colleges of further education in the Bolton Local Authority area; and into which categories of subject the vacancies fall. [100606]

Ms Estelle Morris: There were two vacancies for full-time teachers in the maintained nursery, primary, secondary and special school sector in the Bolton local authority area in January 1999. Both posts were for classroom teachers in secondary schools, one in physics and the other in modern foreign languages.

Information on the number of teaching vacancies in colleges of further education in the Bolton local authority area is not held centrally.

Commonwealth Students

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many Commonwealth students are studying in the United Kingdom; and which countries have received financial help from his Department in relation to them. [100767]

Mr. Wicks: The number of Commonwealth students studying in the UK in the 1997–98 academic year, the latest for which figures are available, were:

	Higher education	Further education
Full-time	44,900	2,100
Part-time	11,100	2,100
Total	56,000	4,200

This Department offers scholarships through the Montserrat Emergency Award Scheme, established in 1998–99, to students from Montserrat wishing to study in higher education in the UK who left Montserrat as a direct result of the volcanic activity.

There are also two schemes open solely to applicants from the Commonwealth; the Commonwealth Scholarship and Fellowship Plan, funded jointly by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) and the Department for International Development (DfID) and the Shared Scholarship Scheme, funded by the DfID. Commonwealth students may also apply for Government funded scholarships which are open to all international students, including the British Chevening Scholarships Scheme, funded by the FCO and the Overseas Research Students Awards Scheme, funded by this Department.

Adult Education

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what arrangements he will put in place to ensure that local authorities' adult education services are funded by the local authorities in 2001 at or above the level of the relevant standard spending assessment sub-category; [100602]

(2) how much each local education authority in England spent on adult education in the financial year 1998–99; [100612]

(3) what is the level of adult education funding that will be transferred from the budgets of each English local education authority to the Learning and Skills Council in the financial year 2001–02. [100613]

Mr. Wicks: In "Learning to Succeed" we set out our intention to give the proposed Learning and Skills Council (LSC) responsibility for adult and community learning from April 2001. We made clear that provided local authorities meet the requirements to prepare and implement effective lifelong learning development plans they can expect to receive from the LSC a substantial part of its resource for adult and community learning.

Following consideration of the comments received on our proposals we will be announcing shortly more detail of our plans for establishing the LSC, including arrangements for funding adult and community education through that body rather than local authorities.

Information on local education authority expenditure, including that on adult education, will be available in the new year.

EU Education Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the outcome of the Education Council held in Brussels on 26 November; and if he will make a statement. [100829]

Mr. Wills: The Council of EC Education Ministers, at which I represented the UK, adopted a resolution on "developing new working methods for European co-operation in the fields of education and vocational training".

Ministers then held an open debate on the role of education and vocational training in the new millennium.

The Council received information from the Presidency on the outcome of conciliation with the European Parliament on the proposal for a second phase of the Socrates education action programme. Information was received from the European Commission on: the proposal for a Decision of the European Parliament and the Council to establish the European Year of Languages 2001; forthcoming proposals for European Parliament and Council Recommendations on the mobility of students, young trainees, young volunteers, teachers and trainers and on European co-operation in the evaluation of the quality of school education; the role of education and training in implementing the Stability Pact for South-East Europe; the implementation of the Council resolution of 6 May 1996 on educational multimedia in the fields of education and training; and indicators and benchmarks in the field of school quality.

Ministers received a report from the European Schools High Council on the future of the European Schools and held an exchange of views. The Council also received information from the Portuguese delegation on plans for the Portuguese Presidency of the Council.

A copy of the Council minutes will be placed in the Library in due course.

Dance and Drama Awards

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the dance and drama awards for students on further education courses. [101314]

Mr. Wicks: Over 830 of the most talented students have been successful at auditions and are now benefiting from the awards while they train at some of the country's leading dance and drama schools. The latest information suggests that the awards have already succeeded in attracting unprecedented numbers of students from families with among the lowest levels of family income. Over 20 per cent. of students are from families with incomes of less than £10,000 per annum.

The awards provide substantial help with tuition fees and a contribution towards living costs. However, we have recently announced that from next September the level of award paid to students on further education courses and living away from home will increase from a maximum of £2,025 to £4,025. Within these amounts the provision for students' living costs rises from £1,000 to £3,000 per annum (£2,550 outside London). The sums will be targeted in order to provide increased resources to students in greatest need. We have also raised the assessment threshold so that all students with residual family incomes below £17,369 will get the appropriate maximum funding available.

Pending the introduction of the new rates next year, additional funding of up to £2,000 per student will be paid to students. This will be over and above their current funding for fees and living costs and will be allocated relative to their assessed needs. We plan to make the first additional payments in December.

School Transport Review

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects to announce the results of the review of school transport. [100328]

Jacqui Smith: The School Travel Advisory Group is looking into all aspects of school transport. We expect the Group to publish its report early in the new year.

University Salaries

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to review the salary scales for university staff; and if he will make a statement. [100710]

Mr. Wicks: The pay and conditions of staff in higher education are a matter for the employers not the Government. The Bett Report into higher education pay and conditions, published in June, made a number of recommendations for restructuring the sector's terms and conditions. It will be for the higher education employers to consider how these recommendations can be implemented.

Barnet Schools

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in each of the last five years, what have been the total number of pupils attending state primary and secondary schools in the Borough of Barnet; what proportion of them have been out-of-borough; and what were the numbers of full-time equivalent teachers. [100218]

Pupils and teachers in Barnet LEA—January each year

	Maintained primary schools		Maintained secondary schools
	Headcount of pupils	Full-time equivalent number of teachers	Headcount of pupils	Full-time equivalent number of teachers
1999	26,441	1,179.3	20,437	1,339.8
1998	26,177	1,172.7	20,106	1,322.7
1997	25,981	1,167.3	19,783	1,336.0
1996	24,809	1,136.4	19,437	1,312.2
1995	24,443	1,107.0	19,158	1,290.0

Hendon-Barnet College Merge

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will announce his decision on the proposed merger of Hendon and Barnet Colleges. [100852]

Mr. Wicks: No proposal has been received at this stage by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Independent-State School Partnership Scheme

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) applications and (b) successful applications from each region have been made in respect of the Independent/State School Partnership Grant Scheme (1999–2000). [100331]

Applications for independent/state school partnerships grant in 1999–2000

Region	Total number of applications[1]	Number of successful applications	Percentage of successful applications[2]
North East	12	2	17
North West and Merseyside	36	6	17
Yorkshire and Humber	17	5	29
East Midlands	13	3	23
West Midlands	41	7	17
East of England	31	9	29
London	31	9	29
South East	44	8	18
South West	39	7	18
England	264	56	21

[1] Applications were for one or two year grants, commencing in 1999–2000.
[2] Successful applications as a percentage of total applications in the region.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to extend the Independent/State School Partnership Scheme beyond 2001. [100330]

Ms Estelle Morris: Independent evaluation of the first year of the scheme was recently carried out by Leeds University School of Education. Their report reinforces our belief that partnerships are contributing to raising standards and increasing educational opportunities for the pupils and staff involved. We therefore intend to encourage independent and maintained schools to work in partnership beyond 2001.

WALES

Consultants

9. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much money the Welsh Office spent on consultants in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99; and how much is planned to be spent by the Office of the Secretary of State for Wales during this current financial year. [98885]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The following figures detail Welsh Office expenditure on consultants in the relevant financial years, running from 1 April to the following 31 March.

1996–97	739,363
1997–98	1,311,459
1998–99	1,836,194

I do not expect to incur any expenditure on consultants in the current financial year.

NHS Finance

10. Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he next plans to meet the First Secretary of the National Assembly to discuss the financing of the NHS in Wales. [98886]

Mr. Hanson: My right hon. Friend and I are in constant dialogue with the First Secretary and Assembly Secretaries about all important issues affecting Wales, including the funding of the NHS.

Beef on the Bone

11. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the Welsh Agriculture Secretary about the ban on the sale of beef on the bone. [98888]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I am in regular contact with my colleagues in the National Assembly and we discuss a range of issues including all matters relating to agriculture in Wales.

16. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had about the lifting of the beef-on-the-bone ban in Wales. [98893]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have discussed this issue with a number of individuals and organisations.

17. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has held with the First Minister of the National Assembly concerning the ban on beef on the bone. [98894]

Mr. Hanson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply my right hon. Friend gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan).

21. Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his discussions with MAFF on the beef-on-the-bone ban. [98898]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I am in regular contact with my colleagues in the National Assembly for Wales and Whitehall and we discuss a range of topics including matters relating to agriculture in Wales.

Civil Service Numbers

12. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many civil servants his Department employs currently; and if he will make a statement on trends relating to civil service numbers (a) since May 1997 and (b) projected over the next three years. [98889]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My Department currently employs 35 civil servants, with a further five vacancies. Questions relating to overall civil service numbers should be directed to my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office.

Children

14. Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has met the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales to discuss the child care and child protection elements of the Government's legislative programme and its impact on Wales. [98891]

Mr. Hanson: The Secretary of State will meet the First Secretary and appropriate officials to discuss these issues as necessary. I have already met the Assembly Secretary Jane Hutt to discuss proposed legislation, including childcare and child protection elements.

Match Funding

15. Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer about including additional money in the block grant for Wales for objective 1 and 2 match funding. [98892]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I see the Chancellor of the Exchequer regularly when we discuss a number of issues.

24. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received about objective 1 and 2 funding since the beginning of May. [98901]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My predecessor and I have received many representations about Objectives 1 and 2, some of which have referred to funding.

25. Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary with regard to objective 1 match funding. [98903]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I hold regular meetings with the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales. We have discussed a range of issues, including Structural Funds support in Wales, and I am aware of the importance of the issue.

Special Advisers

18. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much money is currently spent by his Department on special advisers; and how much was spent during (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99. [98895]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My Department is currently spending around £90,000 per annum on special advisers. The previous costs were:

1996/97	30,964
1997/98	95,430
1998/99	101,786

Electoral System

19. Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the operation of the electoral system used in elections to the Welsh Assembly. [98896]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The electoral system used in elections to the Welsh Assembly is provided for in Section 4 of the Government of Wales Act 1998 and combines the "first past the post" method for constituency Members with "proportional representation" for additional Members. This ensures that the National Assembly is representative of all parts and interests in Wales.

National Minimum Wage

20. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the impact of the national minimum wage on Wales. [98897]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I met the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry last month and we discussed a range of issues. The Government fully recognise the importance of assessing the effect of the introduction of the national minimum wage and they asked the Low Pay Commission to monitor and evaluate the minimum wage's introduction and impact across the UK, with particular reference to the effect on pay and employment. The Commission is due to report later this month.

Children (Leaving Care) Bill

23. Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has scheduled with the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales about the Children (Leaving Care) Bill outlined in the Queen's Speech. [98900]

Mr. Hanson: I will be having discussions with the First Secretary and appropriate officials as and when necessary.

Transport

26. Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has met the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales to discuss the Government's legislative programme and its impact on transport in Wales. [98904]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the First Secretary regularly and we discuss a number of issues, including the impact on Wales of the Bills in the Government's legislative programme.

Forestry

27. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales about the protection of forestry in Wales. [98905]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet weekly with the First Secretary of the National Assembly and we discuss a wide range of topics. However, Forestry matters in Wales are a matter for the Forestry Commission which reports direct to the Assembly.

Block Grant

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales to discuss the size of the block grant. [98890]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the Assembly First Secretary on a weekly basis to discuss a range of issues.

Cabinet Committee on Agriculture

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which minister in his Department is a member of the Cabinet Committee on Agriculture. [100102]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 29 November 1999]: There is no Cabinet Committee exclusively concerned with agriculture matters. I assume the hon. Member refers to the Rural Affairs Committee (misc 8). This Committee was established to consider rural matters in England. However, I receive the Committee's papers and if these raise issues which are relevant to Wales I will attend the Committee's meetings.

Farmers

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last received a delegation of farmers from Wales. [98883]

Mr. Paul Murphy: During October I received deputations from the Farmers Union of Wales, the National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association. On each occasion the meetings were productive and covered a wide range of topics. I am attending the CLA Wales dinner on 1 December.

Education

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales to discuss assistance for education in Wales. [98902]

Mr. Hanson: The Secretary of State regularly meets the First Secretary to discuss various issues.

I have met Tom Middlehurst to discuss aspects of education, and will continue to meet or talk to Mr. Middlehurst on a regular basis.

Pre-Budget Statement

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has met the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales to discuss the impact on Wales of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's pre-Budget statement. [98887]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the Assembly First Secretary on a weekly basis to discuss a range of issues.

PRIME MINISTER

Iraq

Q11. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what recent representations Her Majesty's Government have received from (a) UN organisations and (b) church organisations about continuing UN sanctions and military action against Iraq. [98916]

The Prime Minister: We continue to maintain close contacts with all the UN organisations operating in Iraq. There are also regular meetings between officials and representatives of church organisations at which the sanctions regime and our enforcement of the No Fly Zones can be discussed.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 1 December. [100329]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I will have further meetings later today.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pig Industry

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the extra costs per pig imposed on pig breeders which arise from animal welfare arrangements in Britain which are not imposed in other EU countries; and if he will provide compensation for these costs. [99292]

Ms Quin: No recent estimates have been made but at the time the decision was taken to improve pig animal welfare standards in the UK, it was decided that the costs should not be compensated by the taxpayer. My right hon. Friend the Minister and I do, however, continue to urge purchasers of pigmeat to source to UK welfare and other standards.

Sterling

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what money is currently available for compensating UK farmers for the problems caused to them by the strength of sterling. [99213]

Ms Quin: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply to my hon. Friend for Kettering (Mr. Sawford) on 25 November 1999, Official Report, column 740W.

Fish Quotas

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what response he has made to the suggestion by the European Commission representative in the UK that national fishing quotas could be abolished after 2002. [99752]

Mr. Morley: None. No member state or the Commission has put forward any such proposals.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what changes are proposed in the fish quota system from 2003, with particular reference to the replacement permit system; and if he will make a statement. [100448]

Mr. Morley: No changes have been proposed in the TACs and quotas system under the Common Fisheries Policy (CFP) nor do I expect any change as a result of the review of the CFP in 2002. The question of replacement permits does not therefore arise.

Transgenic DNA

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what analysis has been made of the propensity of bacteria in the human mouth and respiratory tracts to take up antibiotic resistance marker genes and other transgenic DNA. [100168]

Ms Quin: This issue is carefully considered by the Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes as part of their rigorous safety assessment of genetically modified (GM) foods. The Committee has published two reports on the use of antibiotic resistance markers in GM plants for human food (in July 1994 and July 1996), copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House. In addition the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Foods funds a programme of R&D to underpin the safety assessment process which provides information on this and other issues related to GM foods.

TREASURY

Energy Saving

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received (a) in favour of and (b) in opposition to a reduction in the rate of VAT on energy saving materials in the last year. [100775]

Mr. Timms: Treasury and HM Customs and Excise have received a number of representations in favour of a reduced rate of VAT for energy savings materials. They have received none opposing it.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rates of VAT are charged in each of the other European Union countries on (a) energy saving materials and (b) domestic fuel. [100776]

Mr. Timms: The VAT rates given in the table apply to fuel put to both domestic and business use in other Member states. Only the UK has a different VAT rate for fuel put to domestic use.

Percentage

Member state	(a) Energy saving materials	(b) Fuel and power
Austria	20	[1]10, 20
Belgium	21	[2]12, 21
Denmark	25	25
Finland	22	22
France	20.6	20.6
Germany	16	16
Greece	18	[3]8, 18
Ireland	21	12.5
Italy	20	10
Luxembourg	15	[4]6, 12
Netherlands	17.5	17.5
Portugal	17	[4,5]5, 17
Spain	16	16
Sweden	25	25
UK	[6]5, 17.5	[7]5, 17.5

[1] The reduced rate applies to supplies of wood.
[2] The reduced rate applies to supplies of coal and peat.
[3] The reduced rate applies to supplies of wood.
[4] The 6 per cent. rate applies to gas and electricity; wood, oil and coal are 12 per cent.
[5] 5 per cent. applies to electricity and oil.
[6] For energy saving materials installed under a Government funded grant scheme.
[7] 5 per cent. applies to supplies of fuel and power for domestic and charitable use.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he has taken in the last year to pursue with other European Union countries a wider reduction in the rate of VAT charged on energy saving materials. [100773]

Mr. Timms: There have been no discussions within the last year.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the employment implications of reducing the rate of VAT on energy saving materials. [100774]

Mr. Timms: None.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which European Union countries which have varied the rate of VAT charged on energy saving materials since May 1997, indicating the change to the rate charged; and what representations he has made to (a) the European Commission and (b) other bodies on these changes. [100771]

Mr. Timms: No other EU Governments have varied the rate of VAT charged on energy saving materials since May 1997.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has made to the European Commission regarding the reduction of VAT on energy saving materials in France. [100772]

Mr. Timms: None. The French reduced rate is for the renovation and repair of private dwellings, under a European Commission initiative permitting experimental reduced VAT rates. It does not cover DIY energy saving materials, since the experimental reduced rate may only be applied to services.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the reduction of VAT on energy saving materials in (a) France and (b) Italy; and what plans he has for similar reductions in the United Kingdom. [100601]

Mr. Timms: There have been no reductions in VAT on energy saving materials in France or Italy. France has announced a reduced rate for the repair and renovation of private dwellings under the optional experimental scheme covered by Annex K of the EU's Sixth VAT Directive. Italy has made an application to the Commission to do the same.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will reduce VAT on energy saving materials to 5 per cent. [100603]

Mr. Timms: This Government have already reduced to 5 per cent. the VAT rate applicable to grant-funded installation of energy saving materials in the homes of the less well off. EC VAT law does not allow the UK to apply a reduced VAT rate to sales of energy saving materials for DIY installation.

Small Firms

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to the Inland Revenue of providing the support for small firms' payroll operations outlined in the Inland Revenue press release of 11 November. [100740]

Dawn Primarolo: The support announced on 11 November builds on existing extensive assistance for small firms and is estimated to cost up to £40 million over the next three years.

EU Contributions

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the net and gross contributions by the United Kingdom to the EU in 1997 and 1998, indicating the source of the date. [100621]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested can be found in Table 3 of the Government's White Paper "European Community Finances" (Cm 4382).

Registrars' Services

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what consultations he has had with representatives of the Muslim and Jewish communities about the provision of registrars' services between Christmas and the end of the Millennium holiday; [100584]

(2) what steps he has taken to ensure adequate provision of registrars' services during the period between Christmas and the end of the Millennium holiday. [100585]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The provision of special facilities such as for members of the Muslim and Jewish communities is a matter for the Proper Officer for Registration Matters in each local authority in agreement with the registrars.

The Registrar General's standing instructions will apply as they do every Christmas and New Year period. If the Registrar's Office is shut for two or more consecutive days, or if special facilities such as those for the Jewish and Muslim communities are provided in the area, there will be a notice explaining what arrangements have been made to deal with urgent matters. Proper Officers have been asked to publicise the availability of the service over the Christmas and New Year period. The Registrar General has advised the Proper Officer for Registration Matters in each local authority that an emergency service will be needed for death informants on 30 December 1999 and 4 January 2000.

Tax Havens

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of income lost to the Treasury as a result of the use of off-shore tax havens. [100851]

Dawn Primarolo: This information is not available.

Personal Service Companies

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many personal service companies currently pay tax and national insurance; what was the yield of tax and national insurance from those companies; and what methodology was employed to calculate the current estimated shortfall of tax and national insurance receipts from personal service companies, in the current financial year. [100511]

Dawn Primarolo: The available information is contained in the Regulatory Impact Assessment on the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill published in October 1999. Estimates of the yield from the proposed measure to stop avoidance of tax and National Insurance Contributions using personal service companies were included in the Financial Statement and Budget Report published on Budget Day in March 1999.

Tax Changes

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the quantifiable effect of tax changes made since May 1997 on (a) the UK economy, (b) business activity and (c) Treasury receipts and payments. [100515]

Dawn Primarolo: The revenue effects of the last three Budgets were published in table 2.2 of the July 1997 Financial Statement and Budget Report, and table 1.3 of the March 1998 and March 1999 Financial Statement and Budget Reports. Developments and prospects in the economy are shown in Chapter 3 of the July 1997 Financial Statement and Budget Report, and Annex A of the March 1998 and March 1999 Financial Statement and Budget Reports.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which changes to the tax system since May 1997 (a) have required primary legislation, (b) have been achieved by secondary legislation and (c) have been required as a result of European or other international agreements. [100514]

Dawn Primarolo: The answer is as follows:

(a) Tax changes requiring primary legislation since May 1997 were included in the 1997, 1998 and 1999 Finance Bills. In addition, changes to various taxes were included in the following Acts: Regional Development Agencies Act 1998, CDC Act 1999, Tax Credits Act 1999, Access to Justice Act 1999, Social Security Contributions (Transfer of Functions) Act 1999, Welfare Reform Act 1999, Employment Relations Act 1999 (NMW) and Social Security Administration (Fraud) Act 1997.

(b) A full list of tax changes made by secondary legislation is available in the House of Commons Library.

(c) Changes to the tax system which have been required as a result of European or other international agreements are as follows:

888/98/EC FISCALIS—Decision of the European Parliament and the Council establishing (and funding) a programme of Community action to improve indirect taxation systems of the internal market.

98/80/EC Amending directive 77/388/EEC—A special scheme for investment in gold.

99/49/EC Amending directive 77/388/EEC—Provides for continuation of the minimum standard rate of VAT throughout the EC.

99/59/EC Amending directive 77/388/EEC—in respect of VAT arrangements for telecommunication services.

Financial Services and Markets Bill

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library the instructions to Parliamentary Counsel to date for the drafting of the Financial Services and Markets Bill. [101133]

Miss Melanie Johnson: No. Drafting instructions represent only the beginning of the drafting process. The Government have published explanatory notes on the Bill, and Ministers explain the Government's policy in the course of Parliamentary proceedings.

Tax Credit

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many businesses in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire will benefit from the new research and development tax credit; and if he will make a statement. [101127]

Dawn Primarolo: The information is not available.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefit Payments

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the status is of the recent letter from the Benefits Agency to weekly recipients of Child Benefit encouraging them to opt for payment by automated credit transfers; and if he will write to all those who opted for automated credit transfer as a result of this letter to remind them of their continued option of payment through a post office. [99565]

Mr. Rooker: Letters have been issued to some Child Benefit customers who are currently receiving their benefit on a weekly basis where it appears that they, in fact, should have been paid four weekly. We are obliged to pay people at the frequencies set out in relevant legislation and we must put this right when errors are discovered. Child Benefit is a four weekly benefit except in certain circumstances. It is not normally a weekly benefit.

The letter explained that their Child Benefit would, when their current order book expired, be paid on a four weekly basis unless the customer contended that this would cause particular hardship.

As with all Departmental literature which refers to methods of payment, the letter explains to customers that they can receive benefits directly into their bank account by automated credit transfer (ACT). The wording in the letter has been in use since 1994 and is consistent with the words used in claim packs for benefit and advice pages contained in benefit order books.

The exercise that resulted in letters being issued to some Child Benefit customers has been completed. There are no plans to issue any further letters to these customers.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are (a) the annual costs of the production and distribution of order books and (b) his estimate of the annual running costs if printed order books are replaced by benefit payment cards. [99567]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

The total annual cost of the production and distribution of order books and girocheques is £45,068,487. Order books will not be replaced by benefit payment cards pursuant to the answer from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 24 May 1999, Official Report, column 21W.

Post Office

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will list the principal activities of his Department and its agencies which provide business for (a) Crown post offices and (b) other post offices; if he will assess whether the level of business generated in each case is likely to increase or decrease over the next five years; and which new areas of business for post offices are likely to be developed by his Department and its agencies over the same period; [99555]

(2) what the policy of the Benefits Agency is on encouraging the replacement of benefit payments to post offices by automated credit transfers prior to 2003. [99564]

Mr. Rooker: Our principal activity, which provides business for Post Office Counters Ltd. (POCL), is the encashment of pensions and allowances (together with supporting administration and accounting functions). This activity is fully available in both Crown and other post offices.

Current trends indicate a decline in this activity between now and 2003. This is due to the reduction in the number of people generally depending on benefit and the steady growth in customer preference for payment direct to bank accounts. From 2003 ACT will become the normal way of paying benefits and, as a result, the rate of decline in current order book and girocheque activity on behalf of the Department will accelerate.

It is envisaged that the migration of benefit recipients from paper based methods of payment to more efficient and secure payment direct to bank accounts will take place over a two year period from 2003 to 2005. Between now and 2003 the Department will work with POCL to ensure that a wide range of banking services are available over post office counters.

Officials from the Department have already met with representatives from the Post Office to discuss the mutual development of strategies which will ensure that benefit recipients continue to have access to cash at post office counters.

Currently order book and girocheque pay 65 per cent. of all benefit customers.

External Consultants

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been spent by his Department on external consultants and advisers since May 1997 funded from (i) his Department's programme provision and (ii) his Department's running costs. [99492]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 24 November 1999]: The Department's programme provision funds benefit payments only.

Information in respect of the Department's expenditure on consultants is in the table.

Departmental expenditure on consultants

£ million

Financial year	Expenditure on management consultants	Expenditure on IT consultants	Total expenditure
April 1997 to March 1998	11.6	8.3	19.9
April 1998 to March 1999	13.0	14.2	27.2
April 1999 to October 1999	13.1	5.6	18.7

Notes:

1. Figures rounded to nearest 100,000.
2. The expenditure has been incurred on a number of major IT and change initiatives.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what proportion of claimants expressed as a percentage of all claimants had their disability living allowance withdrawn in (a) the Vale of Glamorgan, (b) Wales and (c) the UK in (i) June, July and August 1998 and (ii) June, July and August 1999. [100164]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of Disability Living Allowance is a matter for Mr. Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Norman Haighton to Mr. John Smith, dated 30 November 1999:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question. As he is unavailable I am replying on his behalf. You asked how many and what proportion of claimants, expressed as a percentage of all claimants, had their Disability Living Allowance withdrawn in (a) the Vale of Glamorgan, (b) Wales and (c) the UK in (i) June, July and August 1998 and (ii) June, July and August 1999.

I should explain that we do not keep data specific to the Vale of Glamorgan, and to provide such information routinely would incur high costs.

The Department of Social Security administers benefits for Great Britain only (i.e. England, Scotland, and Wales). Northern Ireland benefits are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. The information that is available for Wales and Great Britain is set out in the attached table.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Housing and Council Tax Benefits

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about the performance of CSL in relation to the administration of housing and council tax benefits. [100227]

Angela Eagle: Taunton Deane Borough Council has informed the Department about the level of CSL's performance in their area. The Authority is closely monitoring the situation and has established a clear path forward to secure improvements in the level of CSL's performance. The Authority will keep the Department informed of all significant developments.

HEALTH

Nursing Statistics

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) nurses, (b) community psychiatric nurses, (c) district nurses, (d) health visitors and (e) midwives there are per capita in each health authority area; and what was the total health spending per capita in each area in (i) the last year for which figures are available and (ii) 1997. [99912]

Mr. Denham: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on 19 October 1999, Official Report, columns 473–75W on the health spending per capita per health authority area. Data on the numbers of nurses, community psychiatric nurses, district nurses, health visitors and midwives per capita in each health authority area are shown in the tables.

Community Pharmacies

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate his Department has made of the number of community pharmacies expected to close during the year 2000. [99882]

Ms Stuart: During 1998–99 (the last year for which figures are available), 46 pharmacies opened in England to dispense National Health Service prescriptions and 51 closed. No estimate has been made of the number likely to close during 2000.

NHS Hospital Employees

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of nurses working in NHS hospitals on 2 November were (a) supplied by agencies and (b) employed on short-term fixed-length contracts. [99874]

Mr. Denham: This information is not collected centrally.

Prescriptions

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prescriptions were tracked for the purposes of charging to primary care group budgets during the first six months of operation of primary care groups; and how many invoices were issued by NHS trusts and health authorities to other NHS bodies during the last six months of the period in which the fundholding and extra-contractual referrals systems were in operation. [99896]

Ms Stuart: The Prescription Pricing Authority estimates that it will charge the cost of some 255 million prescriptions against Primary Care Group prescribing budgets for the six-month period April to September 1999.

The Department does not hold information centrally on the number of invoices issued by National Health Service trusts and health authorities to other NHS bodies during the last six months of the period in which the fundholding and extra-contractual referrals systems were in operation.

National Screening Committee

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library a copy of the reports of the National Screening Committee inquiries into (a) diabetic screening, (b) pre-natal screening for cystic fibrosis and (c) neonatal screening for cystic fibrosis. [100013]

Mr. Denham: Copies of the National Screening Committee's workshop papers and the Health Technology Assessment report on screening for cystic fibrosis have been placed in the Library. The Library will also have copies of the National Screening Committee's workshop papers on diabetic retinopathy screening. These can also be viewed online at http://www.nelh.nhs.uk/screening/diabetic-retinopathy/. The National Screening Committee will consider proposals for screening for type II diabetes, which results from a relative deficiency of, or insensitivity to insulin, later next year.

Intensive Care Units

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is on increasing the recruitment of doctors as specialists in intensive care units to allow them to work consecutive days in the week, as recommended in the Audit Commission's report, "Critical to Success". [100195]

Mr. Denham: We are currently carrying out a national review of intensive care services, which will lead to the publication of national standards of care. The review will take account of the range of findings in the Audit Commission's report "Critical to Success", including their findings on the arrangement for medical staffing of intensive care units.

It will be for National Health Service trusts and health authorities, who are responsible for the quality of the services they provide, to determine the number, grade and mix of staff they will require to provide those services. Intensive care medicine became a separate specialty from anaesthetics in June this year. At national level we have been reviewing the numbers of higher specialist training opportunities in both specialties together. We are satisfied that currently, there are enough trainees entering intensive care medicine, for there to be sufficient qualifying for consultant posts over the next few years. We will be reviewing the position in intensive care medicine again next year.

Waiting Times

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many out-patients not yet seen for a first outpatient appointment following GP written referral had been waiting (a) longer than 13 weeks and (b) longer than 26 weeks at the end of each quarter since June 1996 in the NHS London Region. [100282]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is in the table:

Outpatient figures for London Region

Social Exclusion

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he is taking in response to the report published by MIND in November into social exclusion among people with mental illness. [100642]

Mr. Hutton: We welcome the report as a contribution to the debate on social exclusion. The Government have a full programme for tackling the social exclusion of those with mental health problems. Many of the issues in the Inquiry's recommendations are being tackled through the work of the Government's Social Exclusion Unit; the Department's "Saving Lives: Our Healthier Nation" revised guidance on the streamlined Care Programme Approach; Review of the Mental Health Act 1983; Impact Strategy to reduce stigma, the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 and Department for Education and Employment/ Department of Social Security initiatives on promoting employment and benefit reforms.

Independent Healthcare Report

Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to reply to the Health Committee's Fifth report of Session 1998–99 on Regulation of Private and Other Independent Healthcare (HC 281); and if he will make a statement. [101281]

Ms Stuart: On Friday 3 December the Government will publish their reply to this Report and will also publish "Regulating Private and Voluntary Healthcare: The Way Forward" which sets out the response to our consultation on this subject and our proposals for action. Copies of the documents will be available in the Library on 3 December.

Xenotransplantation

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many applications for xenotransplantation clinical trials have been received and from which companies; how many involve (a) transgenic tissue and (b) transgenic organs; from which animals these materials come; and for each category how many permissions have been granted. [100704]

Mr. Denham: To date, the United Kingdom Xenotransplantation Interim Regulatory Authority (UKXIRA) has received one application which complies with the requirements set out in "Guidance on making proposals to conduct xenotransplantation on human subjects". Following initial consideration by the UKXIRA, the applicant subsequently advised the authority of their intention not to pursue the application. Two other applicants have been advised to re-submit their applications in accordance with the requirements described in the guidance.

Details of applications submitted to the UKXIRA are supplied in confidence. An announcement will be made if an application is approved.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funds have been committed to research and development of the use of organs from GM pigs. [100706]

Mr. Denham: The Medical Research Council (MRC), which receives its grant in aid from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, has funded two projects related to xenotransplantation:

Between 1993 and 1998, £500,000 was allocated to: "Germ Line modification of pig organs for human transplantation" conducted by the BBSRC Babraham Institute.

In 1998–99, £50,000 was allocated to: "Endogenous retroviruses of pigs and xenotransplantation" conducted by the Institute of Cancer Research and the MRC National Institute for Medical Research.

The Department is directly funding a further project. In 1999–2000, £149,000 was allocated to: "An investigation into the ability of porcine endogenous retroviruses to infect animals other than pigs" being conducted by the Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research.

Organ Donation

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to investigate methods of addressing the shortage of human donor organs other than by the use of transgenic pigs; what his policy is on an opt-out donor card; and if he will make a statement. [100705]

Mr. Denham: The Organ Donor Publicity Campaign was launched in October 1998 and was reinforced in February by a campaign targeting the South Asian community. We shall continue to build on these campaigns to encourage people to join the National Health Service Organ Donor Register, to carry the Donor Card at all times and most importantly make their wishes known to their family and friends.

We shall be developing a further campaign to inform the medical profession about best practice in requesting organ donation. Additionally, in line with the drive to improve the quality of care for all users of the NHS, we shall seek to ensure that best practice is adopted in all units involved in donation and transplantation. We shall also support best practice in live donation, which has increased significantly over the last few years.

While there is some support for an opt-out system of donation, the medical profession is divided and there are still many people who are not in favour of it. A survey undertaken this year has shown that there is still significantly more public support for the current system of donation than for opt-out.

We will continue to keep an open mind on all options for increasing donation rates. However, before introducing any measure aimed at increasing the supply of organs we would have to be sure that it commands public confidence.

Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the review of sections 17(2) and 18 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 has been completed; and if he will make a statement. [100923]

Mr. Hutton: These provisions require the Secretary of State to report to Parliament each year on the number of disabled people aged under 65 who received long-term care in a hospital (or a part of a hospital) vested in the Secretary of State and used wholly or mainly for the care of elderly people (section 17(2)); and were supported by their local authority in residential care used by people of 65 or over (section 18(3)).

(By virtue of section 45 of the Government of Wales Act 1999, reports on the position in Wales are now for the National Assembly of Wales to publish, rather than for the Secretary of State to make to Parliament. In Scotland, this is a matter for the Scottish Executive and the Scottish Parliament).

Reports to Parliament under section 17(2) ceased after 1995 because the establishment of National Health Service trusts meant that there were no longer any hospitals "vested in the Secretary of State". Reports to Parliament under section 18 continue but show a considerable drop in the number of under-65s accommodated with over-65s. The figures they report are no longer, if they ever were, an unambiguous indicator of "inappropriate placements". (For example, if the caring decision is taken to allow a person who has reached his 65 birthday to stay in a home where he may have lived for several years, all the residents in the home who are aged under 65 will be included in the figures).

The Government therefore made clear, when making their report under section 18 last year, that they were minded to repeal these two provisions and would welcome any views on this proposal. Copies of the responses received have been placed in the Library. The majority support the proposal for repeal, some also noting that the system for registering care homes is a much more effective way of ensuring appropriate placements than statistical reports. Having considered all the responses, the Government have decided that repeal is the right option, and will pursue this when parliamentary time allows.

Malnourishment

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the health problems caused by malnourishment. [100711]

Ms Stuart: Malnourishment includes undernourishment and obesity. Both of these are associated with ill health and mortality. Undernourishment can delay recovery from illness and increases susceptibility to osteoporosis and infection, whilst obesity is a risk factor for coronary heart disease, stroke, diabetes, gall bladder disease, some cancers and arthritis.

CABINET OFFICE

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what motor mileage allowance rates her Department offers to (a) Ministers and (b) civil servants using their own vehicles for official business; and what has been the cost of each in each of the last five years. [98724]

Mr. Stringer: The current motor mileage allowance rates offered by the Cabinet Office, its agencies and the Central Office of Information to Ministers and civil servants using their own vehicles for official business are as follows. Cabinet Office Ministers, when travelling on official business, may use a private car instead of an official car, and claim mileage allowance in the same circumstances and on the same terms as civil servants in the central department.

There were no payments to Ministers in 1997–98 and 1998–99. Payments to civil servants in 1997–98 and 1998–99 totalled £368,000 and £412,000 respectively. The information for the previous three years is not available in the form requested and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) how much her Department has spent on ministerial transport in each of the last two years; [98718]

(2) on civil servants' transport in each of the last two years. [98719]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated under the terms of the Framework Document to the Government Car and Despatch Agency. I have asked its Chief Executive, Mr. Nick Matheson, to write to my hon. Friend.

The cost of private car services for Cabinet Office Ministers in 1997–98 was £3,050.77. The cost of private car services for Cabinet Office Ministers in 1998–99 was £1,694.56.

The Cabinet Office (excluding Security Facilities Division) spent £3,786,000 on civil servants' transport in 1997–98 and £4,001,000 in 1998–99. This is mainly based on actual expenditure, but includes a small number of estimates where exact figures are not available. The figures for Security Facilities Division and Central Office of Information are not readily available, and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. All travel undertaken by civil servants complies with the requirements of the Civil Service Management Code.

Letter from Nick Matheson to Dr. Lynne Jones, dated November 1999:

The Minister of State has asked me in my capacity as Chief Executive of the Government Car and Despatch Agency to reply to your Parliamentary Question about how much has been spent on ministerial transport in each of the last two years.

The total cost of providing the Government Car Service was £7.79 million in 1997/98 and £8.06 million in 1998/99. The total costs for allocated services to all ministers were £4.30 million in 1997/98 and £4.32 million in 1998/99. These costs also include non-ministerial use such as the movement of documents and for use by officials as directed by the ministerial private office. The total costs for allocated services to senior officials were £740,000 in 1997/98 and £950,000 in 1998/99. The remaining costs in both years covered other services provided by the Government Car Service.

The Government Car and Despatch Agency charges customer departments for the services provided on a basis that recovers all costs.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Macedonia

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what procedure citizens of the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia have to undertake in order to obtain a visa to visit the United Kingdom. [100322]

Mr. Vaz: Skopje offers only a limited service because of accommodation constraints. Applications are accepted from diplomats; those seeking urgent medical treatment; British Government and British Council sponsored visitors, and refugee cases accepted by either UNHCR or the Home Office. Other Macedonian nationals who wish to visit the UK may apply at any other visa issuing Post.

Falklands

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he intends to have further discussions with the Argentine Government regarding a common fisheries agreement for the Falkland Islands; and if he will make a statement. [100019]

Mr. Battle: The Falkland Islands Government regulates fishing in Falkland Islands waters. However, the British and Argentine Governments have agreed the need for longer-term measures to ensure the sustainability of fish stocks in the high seas of the South West Atlantic and that this should be achieved through the establishment of a multilateral fisheries regime. The European Commission has an on-going dialogue with the Argentine Government on proposals for such an arrangement. We actively support these discussions and we raised the issue at the recent South Atlantic Fisheries Commission in Buenos Aires on 25 and 26 November 1999.

Turkey

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received on the security situation in Turkey following the announcement by the PKK of its withdrawal from armed struggle. [100009]

Mr. Vaz: We receive regular reporting from the British Embassy in Ankara on the security situation in Turkey. Following the recent declaration by the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) that it will end its armed struggle, the security situation has improved, but isolated clashes between PKK members and Turkish Armed Forces are still occurring.

The British Government welcome the PKK's declaration. However, we believe that it is still too early to assess whether the armed struggle is in reality at an end.

International Criminal Court

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the timetable for publication of the draft legislation on the International Criminal Court; and what consultation he will hold about this legislation; [100657]

(2) what is the timetable for publication of the draft legislation on the International Criminal Court. [100653]

Mr. Hain: Draft legislation to enable ratification of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) will be published in the course of this parliamentary session. After publication, all parliamentarians, organisations and individuals interested in the ICC will be given an opportunity to comment.

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Government intends to ratify the International Criminal Court Treaty. [100652]

Mr. Hain: The UK requires legislation before we can ratify the International Criminal Court Statute. This legislation will be published in draft form in the current parliamentary session and introduced as soon as the parliamentary timetable allows.

British Trade International

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the markets which have been selected by British Trade International for special promotion; and what plans he has to develop British trade in each of these. [100654]

Mr. Battle: The following tables list those markets identified as Target Markets by British Trade International and gives details of the strategies which are being implemented for each market:

(a) Under-exploited and newly emerging markets for more experienced exporters

Countries	Promotional launch	Strategies
Brazil (in the context of Mercosur)	November 1998	Provide reliable and impartial information about opportunities and risks in the market; awareness raising events in the UK; improve exporters' market specific skills (eg languages, marketing)
Central Europe
Poland	February 1999	Under this two-year campaign, each country is the subject of an individual market initiative, this includes a London-based launch conference in partnership with the CBI, an in-market launch event and a series of UK regional seminars delivered in partnership with local business organisations, focusing on the detail of doing business in the market, both as an exporter and as an investor; the programme also includes a sector-based approach: main focus on automotive and electronic components, infrastructure projects, financial services, environment and consumer goods and retail
Hungary	October 1999
Czech Republic	February 2000

(a) Under-exploited and newly emerging markets for more experienced exporters

Countries	Promotional launch	Strategies
China/Hong Kong
China	January 1998	A 2-year programme of awareness raising events in every region of the UK; an intensive programme of sector-focused activity
Hong Kong	January 1998	Promote Hong Kong's role as a gateway for British companies wanting to access the China market; focus on the expanding range of opportunities in IT and related sectors; promote the opportunities in Hong Kong's massive infrastructure plans promote Britain as a source for quality consumer goods including fashion
Egypt	November 1998	Raise the profile of Egypt as a destination for UK services, products and investment; improve the flow and quality of market and sector information available, principally to SMEs; develop a viable Business Council (commercially-driven and led); encourage the formation of SME joint-ventures and other forms of partnership
India	January 1993	Plans are in hand to widen the scope of the Indo-British Partnership which promotes exports and investment. The new programme will be announced by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he visits India in January 2000
Japan	April 1998	Help British companies win business in Japan and with Japanese companies worldwide; cross-sectoral themes of high technology support for UK businesses setting up in Japan and assistance to companies to invest directly in Japan and set up facilities there
Mexico	November 1999 (in Mexico) January 2000 (in UK)	Develop an SME partnership programme in priority sectors; special focus on the use of electronic media, with the development of a number of virtual trade promotion concepts; support for regional links between organisations and businesses in the UK and Mexico
South Africa	May 1998	Close co-operation with the South African Department of Trade and Industry to promote trade and investment partnerships; major Partnership Week events in South Africa, focusing on PFI opportunities; UK/South African SME partnership programme, developing linkages with previously disadvantaged groups; 'thinksouthafrica' gateway website
Taiwan	April 1999	Focus on events in the UK and Taiwan (including inward and outward missions) across a small number of priority sectors
Turkey	June 1998	Awareness raising activities and events in the UK; assist the promotion of the Turkish market through relationships between representative bodies in the UK and Turkey.

(b) Markets for new and inexperienced exporters

Countries	Promotional launch	Strategies
United States of America	November 1998	Export USA aims to give small companies, particularly those with innovative products, services or processes, the confidence to tackle the market effectively. Firms pay £1,000 for: on-going contact with Commercial Officers; market assessment and advice; short marketing course at a university business school; visit to a trade fair or conference in the USA; and assistance with commercial publicity
Canada	December 1999	Export Canada will be broadly similar to Export USA, but will place greater emphasis on new exporters
Western Europe	September 1998	The Export Explorer scheme has been developed for new and inexperienced exporters aimed at Western Europe. It is delivered through Business Links and other intermediaries at a cost to the company of £99 plus travel. The package is delivered as: Market Explorer, offering companies the opportunity to visit one of the easy access starter markets of the Republic of Ireland, Belgium, the Netherlands and the Nordic countries,; Trade Fair Explorer, which helps firms to visit one of the major trade exhibitions in Western Europe; a continuous programme of sector initiatives, using British Trade International's 18-strong team of Export Promoters for Western Europe

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he had with President Jiang Zemin during his recent visit regarding protecting the environment (a) nationally and (b) globally. [100635]

Mr. Battle: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and President Jiang Zemin agreed that protecting the environment was one of a number of common challenges on which closer co-operation was desirable.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he discussed with President Jiang Zemin during his recent visit the situation in Hong Kong since its handover in 1997. [100639]

Mr. Battle: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed Hong Kong with the Chinese Foreign Minister and with the Director of the Hong Kong and Macao Office of the State Council who accompanied President Jiang Zemin on his State Visit, making clear our continued commitment to the values of the Joint Declaration. The two sides agreed that the concept of "One Country, Two Systems" was working in practice.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he had with President Jiang Zemin during his recent visit regarding China's role in the UN Security Council. [100634]

Mr. Battle: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and President Jiang Zemin agreed on the need for close consultations on international issues, as Permanent Members of the UN Security Council, in their meeting on 21 October.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he had with President Jiang Zemin during his recent visit regarding China's role in South East Asian security. [100636]

Mr. Battle: South East Asian security was not discussed in any detail during the State Visit.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what agreements he signed with President Jiang Zemin during his recent visit. [100633]

Mr. Battle: None.

China

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the work of the British Council in China in the last 10 years. [100640]

Mr. Battle: The work of the British Council in China has consistently been of a very high standard and has performed an invaluable role in promoting British culture and education in China. The Council make a major contribution to promoting links between China and the United Kingdom in areas of reform including in law and governance and in supporting rapidly growing British involvement in China's education and training markets. The Council's arts activities promote a positive image of Britain in China as demonstrated by the series of events staged during my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's visit to China in October 1998.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to encourage further academic exchanges with China. [100637]

Mr. Battle: Academic and educational exchanges are an important part of our deepening relationship with China. A number of steps are being taken to encourage further academic links with China. These include:

(a) As part of the Prime Minister's initiative we are planning to increase the number of Chinese students in this country from 5,000 to 20,000.

(b) The British Council's Academic Links with China Scheme (funded by DFID) supports 33 active academic links. A recent visit to China of senior UK academics organised by the British Council has resulted in agreement with the Chinese Ministry of Education to establish a new framework for institutional collaboration.

(c) The Chevening Scholarship Scheme will be expanded and used to support some 120 awards in China.

(d) There are a number of projects devoted to professional development and training in China. These include: the BOND scheme (funded by BTI) which expects to make 25 industrial placements from China each year, the Financial Sector Training Scheme (funded by DFID) which aims to train 225 financial professionals in the UK over four years.

The British Council will hold a number of high profile education events in China in 2000 including a British education festival in Beijing and Shanghai in February that will involve over 90 British institutions. Follow up to the Council's Lifelong Learning festival held in November this year in China will focus on academic co-operation and exchanges particularly for distance and vocational learning.

Mrs. Leyla Zana

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last discussed the imprisonment of Mrs. Leyla Zana with the Turkish authorities. [100764]

Mr. Vaz: The British Embassy in Ankara has been following the case of Mrs. Zana closely since her arrest in 1994. In particular, we have noted that Mrs. Zana and those MPs convicted on similar charges were awarded compensation by the European Court of Human Rights for breaches of the Convention of Human Rights. These breaches related to detention length and legality of detention.

We have made a number of representations to the Turkish authorities since she was first put on trial and will continue to do so.

Mr. Abdullah Nouri

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Iranian authorities regarding the political trial of Abdullah Nouri; and what assessment he has made of the implications of the trial for (a) United Kingdom-Iran relations and (b) the parliamentary elections promised for February. [100617]

Mr. Hain: We and our EU partners have been following closely the trial by the Court of the Clergy of Abdullah Nouri, for which sentence was passed on 28 November.

How Mr. Nouri's sentencing to five years imprisonment will effect February's Majles elections is a matter for speculation. We hope that the elections will take place in as free and fair conditions as possible. It is too early to say what impact Mr. Nouri's conviction will have on UK/Iran relations.

Bahrain

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what issues of human rights and democracy he raised with the Amir of Bahrain during his recent visit to Britain. [100666]

Mr. Hain: Human rights were raised with the Amir as part of our policy of constructive engagement on such issues. We welcomed the positive steps Shaikh Hamad has taken towards improving Bahrain's human rights situation since his accession and offered our assistance and advice.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what human rights abuses he raised with the Amir of Bahrain during his visit. [100805]

Mr. Hain: Human rights were raised as part of our policy of constructive engagement on such issues. We welcomed the positive steps the Amir has taken towards improving Bahrain's human rights situation since his accession and offered our assistance and advice.

EU Council Business

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the forthcoming business in the Council of the European Union for (a) December and (b) the major European Union events for the next six months. [101185]

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 2 December 1999

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Target Setting

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many targets have been agreed between his Department and (i) local authorities and (ii) other bodies apart from his own agencies and non-departmental bodies since May 1997. [99475]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 24 November 1999]: The Department's Public Service Agreement (PSA) sets out the Department's own targets in respect of local government. Details of any targets agreed with local government are not held centrally, although the Secretary of State will specify performance indicators and targets covering the broad range of local government functions under the best value provisions set out in Part I of the Local Government Act 1999. These indicators and targets will be introduced by Order by the end of 1999, and will apply from April 2000.

Rail Services

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what information has been provided for local residents on the proposed reduction in rail services between Nunhead and Victoria. [99586]

Mr. Prescott: The changes which will affect Victoria to Nunhead services from the start of the new year are currently shown in the timetable information available at stations, as these form part of the winter 1999–2000 timetable which came into effect on 26 September 1999. Since that timetable was agreed, Connex have reinstated the two trains per hour to Victoria, and will provide an hourly service from Victoria.

Road Deaths (Alcohol)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) drivers, (b) riders, (c) passengers and (d) others have been killed in crashes where one or more driver or rider has exceeded the legal alcohol limit in each of the past five years, for (i) urban and (ii) rural areas; what the average figures were for 1981 to 1985; and if he will make a statement. [100041]

Mr. Hill: The numbers of fatalities in road accidents where one or more driver or rider was over the legal alcohol limit are not available for urban and rural areas; however, estimates can be made by the speed limit of the road on which the accident occurred. The estimates in the table, shown rounded to the nearest 10, are for built-up roads with a speed limit of 40 mph or less and for non-built-up roads with a speed limit of more than 40 mph, for the last five years for which figures are available.

GM Crops

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will describe the nature of the unacceptable effects on the environment which he would consider sufficient to prevent commercial exploitation of GM crops. [99907]

Mr. Mullin: Before any release of a GMO can take place, the regulatory authority must ensure that all appropriate measures are taken to avoid any adverse effects on human health and the environment which might arise. Assessment of adverse effects is carried out on a case-by-case basis, looking at such things as gene transfer to wild relatives, toxicity of gene products, allergenicity, invasiveness and persistence of the plant as a weed, etc. The statutory Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) has been set up to advise ministers on these issues and has published the guidance note "The Regulation and Control of the Deliberate Release of Genetically Modified Organisms" on the risk assessment procedure.

In the case of the farm-scale evaluations of GM oil seed rape and fodder maize currently underway, ACRE has already advised on the risks to the environment of the GM plants themselves. In addition, the independent scientific steering committee will also be able to advise Government on the significance, and therefore the acceptability, of any impacts on farmland wildlife associated with the management of the crops as compared with equivalent non-GM crops, such as a reduction in invertebrate or weed numbers.

In the light of the results and the advice from the committees, decisions will be made on the commercialisation of the GM crops.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research he is currently undertaking into the role that the cauliflower mosaic viral promoter may play in enhancing horizontal gene transfer. [100169]

Mr. Mullin: The statutory Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) has recently been asked to consider this issue and will be advising shortly. ACRE's advice will be published, and if the committee considers it necessary, appropriate scientific research will be commissioned.

Carn Brea Leisure Centre, Cornwall

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the proposed closure of Carn Brea Leisure Centre in Cornwall. [100231]

Ms Beverley Hughes: It is for Kerrier District Council to explain its decision to close the sports hall and swimming pool at Carn Brea and to justify any alternative proposals in its Best Value Performance Plans, which must be completed by 31 March 2000. In the meantime, I would expect the Council to do everything it can to keep the facilities open.

Bio-diesel

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to encourage the production of bio-diesel to help the UK achieve its target of 20 per cent. reduction in greenhouse gases; and if he will make a statement. [100240]

Mr. Hill: Many alternative road fuels have the potential to offer significant environmental benefits, and the Government are keen to encourage their wider use wherever it is cost-effective to do so. Bio-diesel has the potential to offer reduced CO_2 emissions compared with ordinary diesel. We will continue to keep under review bio-diesel's potential for cost-effective reductions in greenhouse gas emissions from road transport.

Road Tolls

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the countries in which tolls have been imposed on road use on roads which had existed free of use, for at least five years prior to tolling. [99926]

Mr. Prescott [holding answer 26 November 1999]: We are aware that charges have been applied to previously free roads in many parts of the world, for example in Singapore, Norway and the United States, and will shortly be introduced on roads in Rome and Melbourne. However, comprehensive information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mobile Phone Installations

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what plans he has to produce guidance for planning authorities on the handling of public health concerns that arise from proposals to site mobile phone base stations in residential areas; [100264]

(2) what plans he has to amend planning guidance for telecommunications permitted development in order to allow planning authorities to apply a precautionary principle in sensitive areas until the full non-thermal health effects of mobile phone radiation have been established. [100267]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government are aware of public concern about mobile phone systems and health and have set up an independent expert group to advise on possible risks to public health. The group, chaired by Sir William Stewart FRS, FRSE, is currently holding open meetings around the UK to take views.

My Department issued for consultation the draft of a joint circular with the Department of Health on land use planning and electro-magnetic fields (EMFs). The draft circular provides advice to local planning authorities in deciding applications for development giving rise to EMFs, such as telecommunications base stations. The guidance will be finalised as soon as practicable.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received in the last six months regarding (a) the conduct of mobile phone companies, (b) their applications for new mast sites and (c) such applications by Orange PCS. [100266]

Ms Beverley Hughes: My Department has received correspondence concerning the amenity and health aspects of the siting of telecommunications masts proposed by the different mobile phone operators, including Orange plc.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of mobile phone masts erected in the United Kingdom in the last 24 months have been shared by licence holders. [100263]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Department's Circular 4/99, "Planning for Telecommunications", makes clear the Government's expectation that developers should provide the local planning authority (LPA) with clear evidence that they have fully considered the use of existing masts, buildings and other structures before seeking to erect any new mast. If this evidence is not considered satisfactory, the LPA may be justified in refusing approval of the mast's siting. The information on shared masts is not available in the form requested. However, the mobile operators have told us that one third of existing masts owned by them are shared.

Dial-a-Ride (West London)

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what level of funding West London Dial-a-Ride has received from his Department in each of the last five years. [100192]

Mr. Hill: The Government provide grant funding to London Transport for London Dial-a-Ride services, but the distribution of the grant between the six regional Dial-a-Ride companies is a matter for London Transport. Government funding for Dial-a-Ride services in London over the last five years is as follows:

Year	£ million
1994–95	11.3
1995–96	10.4
1996–97	10.1
1997–98	10.6
1998–99	11.5

Uniform Business Rate

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list in respect of each local authority area in England and Wales the projected yield of the Uniform Business Rate in (a) 2000–01 and (b) 1999–2000. [100741]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The information requested on Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

For England, the information requested on the projected yield of the Uniform Business Rate is not yet available. However, I have today placed in the Library of the House a table which shows the projected contribution to the Business Rate Pool for each local authority in England for 1999–2000.

Regional Government

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has for introducing democratically elected regional chambers in England. [100520]

Ms Beverley Hughes: We have said that, in time, we will introduce legislation to allow people, region by region, to decide whether they want directly elected regional government. We remain committed to this. Finding the right solution may take time, just as the arrangements for Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and London have taken time.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what involvement Regional Development Agencies will have in monitoring social exclusion in the regions. [100518]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government have developed a set of 9 core "State of the Region" indicators which the RDAs used to inform the development of their strategies. These include an indicator entitled "Percentage of the population with above average living conditions" which is based on the standardised mortality ratio. In their strategies, RDAs have also developed, or have given a commitment to develop, further indicators which address the specific features of their region. These will include indicators covering some key social issues.

Signals Passed at Danger

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many signals passed at danger were recorded for each train operating company since 1990. [100662]

Mr. Hill: The information is not available. Incidents of signals passed at danger (SPADs) have been reportable under statute only since April 1996. At present, SPAD incidents are reported by the seven regional Railtrack zones and are not broken down into train operating companies. The Health and Safety Executive's 1996–97, 1997–98 and 1998–99 annual reports on railway safety contain details of SPADs listed by Railtrack zone. Copies are available in the House Libraries.

Rail Link, Solihull

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his policy on the construction of the rail link between the Land Rover plant in Solihull and the west coast main line; and if he will make a statement. [100521]

Mr. Hill: The Rover Group Ltd. applied on 18 November to the Secretary of State for an Order under the Transport and Works Act 1992 to authorise this rail link. The period by which objections or other representations should be lodged ends on 14 January 2000. The Secretary of State will then consider whether a public inquiry should be held into the proposal.

The application will be considered on its merits in the light of relevant policies. These include, on the one hand, our policy of encouraging the movement of freight by rail rather than road where appropriate and, on the other, the restrictive planning policies that apply to development in the Green Belt. These issues and any others raised by interested parties will be carefully considered by the Secretary of State in deciding whether or not to make the Order.

Trans-European Networks

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which countries are eligible for the increase in funds in Trans-European Networks, following the Cologne Summit; what is the amount of the increase in funds; if the UK share has been allocated; and if he will make a statement. [100995]

Mr. Hill: Regulation (EC) No 1655/99 of 19 July 1999, which amended the 1995 trans-European network (TEN) financing Regulation (2236/95), established a financial framework of euro 4,600 million (about £2,890 million at current exchange rates) for TENs in the fields of transport, telecommunications and energy for the period 2000–2006. The financial framework for the period 1995–1999 was 2,345 million ECU. Any member state, or body within a member state, is entitled to bid for TEN funds to support a project of common interest. The decision to grant aid to a project rests with the Commission, with assistance from a Committee of representatives of member states for each TEN sector. There is no provision for sharing out the budget between the member states.

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the progress of renegotiation of the Trans-European Networks. [100884]

Mr. Hill: The transport trans-European network (TEN) guidelines (Decision No. 1692/96/EC) required the Commission, before 1 July 1999, to submit a report to the European Parliament and the Council indicating whether the guidelines should be adapted. The production of that report has been delayed and its publication is not now anticipated before Easter 2000. The Commission has indicated that, should the report suggest that the guidelines do need to be adapted, it expects to come forward with formal proposals before the end of 2000.

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will name the schemes which the Government will propose for Trans-European Network funding; and if he will make a statement. [100887]

Mr. Hill: Bids for funds from the 2000 transport trans-European network (TEN) budget must be with the Commission by 10 January 2000. Our officials have received a number of proposals and are currently considering which of these should be submitted to the Commission. Ministers will make a decision on the bids later this year. At this stage, it is possible to confirm only that we will submit bids for support for the Channel Tunnel Rail Link and for the West Coast Main Line modernisation, as we indicated in our 1998 White Paper on the Future of Transport (Cm 3950).

Lindane

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the recommendation of the EU to ban lindane; and if he will publish the scientific evidence which he has received on lindane. [101067]

Mr. Mullin: The recommendation to suspend the use of lindane as an agricultural pesticide was contained in a report that the Austrian authorities, as rapporteur, submitted to the European Commission as part of the EU review of pesticides. The Commission has yet to reach a decision on the future European status of lindane.

A "review report", which includes the rapporteur's monograph, together with reports of the peer review meetings and a summary cover report, will be made available after a final decision has been taken.

Daylight Saving

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the effect of Daylight Saving on the numbers of road (a) injuries and (b) deaths of children in each year since 1990. [100116]

Mr. Hill: The Department commissioned research into the likely benefits of changing British Summertime to increase the safety benefits of daylight hours. The report by TRL published in 1998 looked essentially at potential casualty reductions if the clocks were set one hour forward in Winter (October to March) and two hours forward in Summer (March to October). This would in effect mean that throughout the year it would be lighter in the evenings and darker in the mornings.

The conclusion was that this might save over 100 deaths per year, and taken together with serious injuries save well over 400 casualties. There are no separate figures pertaining to children.

Eye-Tests (Drivers)

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what tests (a) train drivers and (b) drivers of public service vehicles are required to take to determine their ability to distinguish between colours; and how often they are required to take them. [101167]

Mr. Hill: Train drivers are required to pass a medical which includes a test for colour blindness, using the Ishihara Plates Test. Train drivers are also required to meet certain visual acuity requirements. The period between medical assessments is determined by the age of the train drivers; those aged less than 56 are medically assessed every five years, those aged 56 to 62 every two years, and train drivers over 62 every 12 months.

Drivers of passenger carrying vehicles (PCV's) are not tested specifically for colour blindness but do need to meet certain visual acuity requirements.

Local Authority Housing Finance

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what further consultations he proposes on the detail of his proposals to reform local authority housing finance. [101417]

Mr. Raynsford: Improving local authority financial accounting is an important part of our agenda to modernise local government. As part of our plan to introduce resource accounting to local authority housing finance, we intend to remove rent rebates from the Housing Revenue Account (HRA). Today I have published a consultation paper asking for views on the details of how this could be done. Removing rent rebates from the HRA will make councils housing finances simpler and more transparent. It will be easier for local residents to see how money is being spent, increasing openness and accountability. Copies of the new consultation paper have been placed in the Library of the House. We published two other consultation papers earlier in the month on other aspects of improving local authority housing finance.

Nitrate-vulnerable Zones

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he is proposing further designations of nitrate vulnerable zones in England; and if he will make a statement. [101592]

Mr. Mullin: Following a reference to the European Court of Justice, the Government have now widened their interpretation of the EU Nitrates Directive, beyond monitoring nitrate levels in drinking water sources, to include monitoring in non-drinking water freshwaters. It is expected that this extended testing will lead to the designation of new Nitrate-vulnerable Zones, in which Action Programme measures will help to reduce nitrate levels in water. Nitrate levels in non-drinking surface waters are already being monitored by the Environment Agency and parallel work will be undertaken to establish nitrate levels in groundwater not used as a source of drinking water.

Technical assessment of the extended monitoring as a result of this change is already under way, and completion of the associated mapping of areas proposed for designation is expected next year. The Government will then publish a consultation paper, detailing their designation proposals, which will set out the exact number and location of the new Nitrate-vulnerable Zones. It is expected that, as with existing Nitrate-vulnerable Zones, the majority of any new designations will be in central and eastern England.

River Thames (Safety)

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when Lord Justice Clarke's interim report on safety on the River Thames will be published. [101593]

Mr. Hill: Lord Justice Clarke's interim report has been published today (CM 4530). The report deals with safety on the River Thames and is the first product of the Thames Safety Inquiry, which the Deputy Prime Minister announced on 18 August this year. I am glad to receive this welcome and thorough report, which is helpful as we approach the Millennium celebrations. Lord Justice Clarke has asked for any comments on the report by 10 December, and I will be very interested to see all the reactions to his recommendations.

I will, of course, review the report in detail and have already asked the Department for an action plan to be submitted to Ministers before Christmas. I have the following immediate announcements:

As to Millennium Night celebrations on the river:

> I am grateful for the extensive planning already done to ensure safety on the River on Millennium night by the Port of London Authority (PLA), by the Government Office for London and by the emergency services. As Minister for London, I have been closely involved and fully concur with Lord Justice Clarke's conclusion that the emergency services are as prepared as they can reasonably be expected to be for the Millennium celebrations. This should reassure users of the river and its banks that they will be able to enjoy a spectacular evening in safety.
> In the past few months the Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA) has inspected every passenger ship operating between the Thames Barrier and Teddington Lock to make sure they continue to operate safely. Each vessel now carries a specific Search and Rescue (SAR) plan agreed with PLA, and those plans will also be approved by MCA before the Millennium.

As to the important issue of alcohol controls:

> My Department has today issued a public consultation paper on the introduction of alcohol controls, considering options not only in relation to masters and crew of merchant shipping and fishing vessels, but also for those navigating other vessels (including privately owned pleasure craft). We will finalise our proposals next year in light of comments received.

As to the year 2000, when we expect peak use of the Thames:

> In the coming year, MCA will continue its enhanced programme of inspections of passenger ships on the Thames, to ensure continued operational safety.
> Riverbank authorities are urgently invited to review the provision of bankside life-saving equipment in light of Lord Justice Clarke's recommendation.
> We are studying urgently how we can improve search and rescue facilities on the river allowing for those already provided by the Port of London Authority, the River Police and the London Fire Brigade. We are considering, in collaboration with other relevant authorities, the provision on an experimental basis, of an inshore rescue craft service on the Thames. Any such provision would be reviewed later in 2000 to inform decisions on permanent provision on the river in the light of operational experience. I am glad to announce that the PLA would be willing to manage this experiment for the Department.
> The Department will also work closely with PLA to produce a formal assessment of the risks associated with navigation on the tidal Thames. This will include consideration of search and rescue arrangements, as recommended by Lord Justice Clarke. I have asked for the first results of this assessment to be sent to me personally as soon as possible so that it can influence further planning.

As to subsequent years:

> I am attracted by the recommendation that a duty should be imposed upon an appropriate single authority to assess and ensure the provision and coordination of search and rescue facilities on the Thames. I have asked for urgent advice on what legislation would be needed to secure its legal and financial basis. This will underpin the progress on safety which Lord Justice Clarke acknowledges has already been made and is now further enhanced by his recommendations.

I am grateful for Sir Anthony Clarke's practical proposals for the Thames safety regime. I now look forward to receiving his final report, which will contain his recommendation on whether there is a case for a further investigation or inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the Marchioness disaster.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Fighting Fund

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to publish the bidding guidelines for forces to follow when bidding for a share of the Crime Fighting Fund for police recruits. [101472]

Mr. Straw: I have today placed a copy of the Bidding Guidelines, together with a copy of the form which forces and police authorities should use to apply for a share of the fund, in the Library.

Copies of the Guidelines and the form were sent to all Chief Constables and Chairmen of police authorities today. Those wishing to bid should complete the form and return it to the Home Office by 10 January 2000.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make available the latest revisions of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate's country assessments. [101473]

Mrs. Roche: Revised country assessments were made available to caseworkers during September 1999. They will be made publicly available on the Home Office internet site within the next few weeks and copies have been placed in the Library. The assessments are all sourced to information obtained from independent external sources and from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

A list of the countries for which assessments are prepared was previously set out in a reply from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department to my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg) on 13 May 1998, Official Report, columns 127–28W. They are revised at six-monthly intervals, previously in March and September. The schedule will change to April and October from 2000.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what extent, under the proposed new arrangements for support of asylum seekers, it will be possible for voluntary or charitable bodies to supplement in cash or in kind the support provided from public funds without a corresponding reduction in that support. [99941]

Mrs. Roche: Under the new Asylum Support Arrangements, it is intended that the National Asylum Support Service may take into account support from voluntary and charitable organisations when assessing the amount of support it will provide. This will not apply to emergency assistance provided while an application for support is being considered. This proposal is included in a consultation document which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced in a reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) on 25 November 1999, Official report, column 176W. The closing date for comments on these proposals is 14 January 2000 and we shall finalise our policy after that date.

DEFENCE

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the cost of fees incurred by the Air, Army and Sea Cadets in using the Criminal Records Bureau will be met by his Department; and if he will he make a statement. [100610]

Mr. Spellar: The Cadet Forces will be required to pay for their use of the Criminal Records Bureau. I understand that the fee is likely to be around £10 per inquiry. We would expect such costs to be met from within existing resources.

Falklands

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions RAF flights serving the Falkland Islands have been delayed by mechanical or other failures since September; and if he will make a statement. [100899]

Mr. Spellar: Since September, there have been 42 flights to and from the Falkland Islands (21 outbound and 21 return). Of these, eight flights were delayed for aircraft serviceability or availability reasons.

Army (Retention)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make available to the public (a) Major-General Spacie's report, "Welfare in the Army", (b) the Army's Retention Study and (c) the Continuous Attitude Surveys for service leavers produced by DASA; and if he will make a statement. [100219]

Mr. Spellar: The purpose of all three reports is to inform the Army's personnel management policies and there are currently no plans to publish the findings externally. Major-General (Retired) Spacie's report, "Welfare in the Army" and the Army's Retention Study were commissioned to study Welfare provision and personnel policies across the Army. The Continuous Attitude Survey aims to determine the attitude of serving personnel, their families and Service leavers; this highlights trends which are useful in the development of sound personnel and training policies.

East Timor

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on force levels in East Timor. [101476]

Mr. Hoon: There are now over 10,000 troops in the international force in East Timor (INTERFET) and the Australian Force Commander has agreed that circumstances now enable the withdrawal of British forces.

The UK currently has some 290 service personnel in East Timor. Lead elements of the contingent from 2nd Battalion Royal Gurkha Rifles will return to their base in Brunei on 8 December. The remainder of the troops, including UK-based headquarters staff and signallers, and an RAF C-130 aircraft deployed to the region, will be withdrawn by 15 December.

Although the UK does not plan to contribute units to the follow-on UN peacekeeping force (UNTAET), a small number of military observers will be provided. The Government have also offered Australia assistance with airlift for a short period during the transition from INTERFET to UNTAET.

The deployment of the Gurkhas, RAF C-130 aircraft, and earlier of HMS Glasgow, is another example of the UK's ability to provide forces capable of decisive action in the difficult initial stages of a crisis. British troops were able to lend their considerable expertise and experience to the international force. This has assisted the swift return of over 100,000 refugees.

Army Personnel (Compensation)

Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made on the review of compensation arrangements for members of the armed forces. [101477]

Mr. Spellar: I am considering draft proposals from the review of compensation arrangements and hope to publish a consultation document early next year. The review represents the first comprehensive look at compensation arrangements since the War Pensions Scheme was introduced over fifty years ago. It is a highly complex subject. The review has examined from first principles the way in which service men and women and their dependants are compensated when they suffer illness, injury or death due to service. I am determined that we should provide our service men and women with a compensation package which will give them the reassurance that they will be provided for when facing the challenges and risks associated with service life.

Kosovo

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many shelter kits have been sent to Kosovo for relief aid; and what is the cost of the kits. [100750]

Mr. Foulkes: I have been asked to reply.

Over 100,000 houses in Kosovo suffered damage in the conflict, of which half are beyond repair. This situation affects over 700,000 people. Emergency shelter is co-ordinated by United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). 57,100 emergency repair kits are being provided through United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the European Commission Humanitarian Office (ECHO) and Office For Disaster Assistance / USAID, in order to create dry shelter in repairable houses, on the basis of one room per family. According to the latest available figures, over 60 per cent. had been distributed by 15 November. UNHCR and OFDA/USAID are also distributing some 10,000 extended roofing kits which aim to provide shelter for several families within a single less-damaged dwelling.

ECHO have committed 16.5 million euros for NGO programmes focusing on shelter. The EC Task Force have separately committed 14 million euros. OFDA spend $33.4 million on shelter in the last US fiscal year (ending September 1999), and have so far spent $12 million this fiscal year. Figures for UNHCR are not currently available.

The Department for International Development's (DFID) chief contributions to winterisation complement shelter initiatives. Through DFID's Emergency Infrastructure Engineering Unit we aim to get essential work done on utilities, particularly power and water supply, before the winter becomes too severe. We have committed £19 million for these works. Pristina airport is crucial to emergency rehabilitation as an alternative supply route to the congested Blace crossing. DFID has committed up to £3 million to carry out emergency works to keep it open for 24-hour civilian air operations through the winter.

Goats (Experimentation)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many goats have been killed as a result of experiments conducted on them in the last six months by the MoD. [100748]

Mr. Kilfoyle: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 2 December 1999:

I have been asked to reply to your question about the number of goats killed as a result of experiments in the last six months by the Ministry of Defence.

As I explained in my letter of 14 April 1999 the total number of goats killed in 1999 will be higher than in recent years. In addition to the on-going submarine escape programme carried out on behalf of the Ministry of Defence, DERA is also taking part in a 3 year co-operative programme with the United States Navy looking at safe rescue from submarines. The conditions of this co-operative research will result in a higher number of animals humanely killed for the 3 years of the programme's duration. In addition, a restocking programme has taken place as many of the goats were getting old and, on veterinary advice, these have also been humanely killed.

In view of these factors, it may be misleading to provide figures for the last six months and I will, therefore, address the period from 1 January 1999. From 1 January to 29 November 1999, 62 goats were humanely killed following experiments, 36 were humanely killed for reasons of old age and another 4 on grounds of ill health.

The Animal (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 assumes that all experiments cause stress to the animals involved and it is therefore normal practice to humanely kill the animals at the end of the experiment. Only where the experiment is considered sufficiently benign for the animals not to suffer any long lasting stress do the terms of the Act, subject to Home Office review, allow them to be used on more than one occasion. This is usually the case with the goats used in the submarine research programme.

I hope this is helpful.

RAF Ash

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has for the future of RAF Ash. [100291]

Mr. Kilfoyle: None. RAF Ash was sold on 24 July 1998.

Recruitment (Fiji)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many personnel went as part of the British Army recruiting team to Fiji. [100756]

Mr. Spellar: A total of 26 personnel, military and civilian, have been involved in the Army selection visit to Fiji. One military officer visited prior to deployment to brief the Fijian Prime Minister. The team that subsequently deployed consisted of 25 personnel. Of these, two have already returned to the UK. The purpose of the visit was not recruitment, but to process applications to the British Army already received.

Himalayan Kayak Expedition

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British soldiers are participating in the British Army Himalayan Kayak Expedition. [100749]

Mr. Spellar: Adventurous Training Exercise Himalayan Encounter Finn was a tri-Service kayaking expedition conducted in Nepal by 42 British Service personnel between 23 September and 6 November 1999. Thirty-three of the participants were Army personnel.

Recruitment (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what targets he has for the recruitment of ethnic minorities into Her Majesty's forces. [100570]

Mr. Spellar: The recruiting goal for this financial year is for 3 per cent. of all new recruits to be drawn from ethnic minorities. The goal, first set in 1998–99 at 2 per cent., rises annually by 1 per cent. to a goal of 5 per cent. by 2001–02.

Land Disposals

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what was the value of surplus land disposals for the Army for each of the last three years; [100883]

(2) what is the value of surplus land disposals by the Royal Navy in each of the last three years; [100747]

(3) what was the value of surplus land disposals for the Royal Air Force in each of the last three years. [101196]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The information requested is not held centrally. However, I will write to the hon. Member once it is available and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Campaign Medals

Mr. Trend: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will assess the benefits of issuing a campaign medal to service personnel who served in the Suez Canal Zone between 1951 and 1954. [100335]

Mr. Kilfoyle: My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces, when Under-Secretary of State for Defence, reviewed the matter of a medal for those who served in the Canal Zone between 1951 and 1954 last year. He concluded that he could find no grounds for reopening the case to award a medal for service in the Canal Zone between 1951 and 1954. He saw no new evidence that he believed would enable him to persuade the Committee on the Grant of Honours Decorations and Medals to overturn their policy of non-retrospection, or revoke any of the decisions made at the time or following the various reviews since 1990.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much his Department has spent on ministerial transport in each of the last two years. [98709]

Mr. Byers: Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry are required—under the terms of the Ministerial Code and Travel by Ministers—to make efficient and cost-effective travel arrangements. For Information on spend on the Government Car Service, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 1 December 1999, Official Report, columns 255–56W.

Post Office

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the post offices that have opened in England and Wales in the last 12 months. [99606]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand from the Post Office that 9 new post offices have opened in England and Wales and a further 136 offices have reopened since October 1998. I have arranged for a list of these offices, prepared by the Post Office, to be placed in the Library of the House. The Post Office definition of a reopened post office includes offices which have relocated and those to which a new subpostmaster/subpostmistress has been appointed, as well as offices which reopen after a period of closure.

Cannabis

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what initiatives his Department is undertaking to test the medicinal benefits of cannabis. [99646]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 25 November 1999]: The Medical Research Council (MRC) has invited a number of research proposals on the potential therapeutic uses of cannabinoids. A funding decision is expected in December on a clinical trial concerning the therapeutic uses of cannabinoids/cannabis in the treatment of spasticity in multiple sclerosis. Two further trials of its use in post-operative pain will be considered next year.

The MRC currently co-funds a "Realising Our Potential Awards" (ROPA) grant with Zeneca at the University of Manchester. This study investigates the effects of cannabinoids on brain cell degeneration. MRC have contributed £97,260.

Also, the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council (BBSRC) supports two individual projects/grants investigating the medicinal effects of cannabis.

Mobile Phone Installations

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the number of new mobile phone masts to be erected in the United Kingdom in each of the next three years. [100265]

Ms Hewitt: No estimate has been made, and I do not have the commercial information available to enable me to make one. However, it is Government policy to limit the number of masts where possible through mast sharing. The Telecommunications Act 1984 licences of the mobile network operators therefore require that before they erect a new mast they investigate the possibility of using an existing mast belonging to themselves or another licensee; of replacing an existing mast belonging to themselves or another licensee with a mast for joint use; and of erecting, in co-operation with any other telecommunications operator, a mast for their joint use. This is reinforced by the Government's planning policy, which is to encourage mast and site sharing where appropriate.

Refrigeration

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the regulations with which a company manufacturing refrigerators and employing 1,500 people has to comply. [100482]

Ms Hewitt: The following regulations apply specifically to a refrigerator manufacturer, employing 1,500 people:

The Energy Information (Refrigerators and Freezers) Regulation SI 3076, 1994

The Energy Efficiency (Refrigerators and Freezers) Regulation SI 1941, 1997

Environmental Protection (Control of Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer) SI 506, 1996.

In addition, a refrigerator manufacturer will need to meet other regulations including those deriving from company law, taxation, employment, health and safety, land planning requirements and environmental legislation.

Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the potential IT benefits from fundamental research at CCLRC; and what steps he is taking to mobilise UK enterprise to maximise the opportunities. [100241]

Ms Hewitt: IT is intrinsic to CCLRC's research activities, not just those of the computer science and engineering and IT departments. Its benefits are continuously assessed by the other Research Councils, which are its primary customers.

CCLRC is actively involved in programmes to disseminate knowledge and technology to the wider business community. These include regional initiatives to provide access for SMEs to the skills base, and participation in a programme on behalf of the EU to involve industry in future developments of the worldwide web.

It is also active in encouraging development of start-up companies on CCLRC sites, where the business development offices at Daresbury and Rutherford encourage technology transfer and act as 'incubators' in the initial growth phase. A particular success story is that of Bookham Technology Ltd., founded in 1989, and located at Rutherford Appleton Laboratory from 1992–97.

The company designs and manufactures silicon integrated optical devices for the next generation of fibre-optic cable. It has raised $90 million of investment to date from such firms as Intel, Cisco, and 3I, and now employs 210 staff on sites in the UK, USA, and Japan.

Business Rates

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the impact upon the competitiveness of businesses in England and Wales of the increase in business rates for 2000–01. [100742]

Ms Hewitt: The purpose of the revaluation of non-domestic properties on 1 April 2000 is solely to update rateable values in line with changes in the property market since the previous revaluation in 1995 and to ensure they accurately reflect the relative rental value of properties. Although the total rateable value for England will increase—reflecting the improved state of the economy since the 1995 revaluation—the National Rate Multiplier will be reduced for the first time since it was introduced in 1990. Overall, the total amount collected in rates will be broadly the same in real terms as in 1999–2000.

A consultation exercise was undertaken on the need to introduce transitional arrangements to mitigate the impact of the 2000 revaluation of the rates bills of individual businesses. In their responses to the consultation paper—which included a draft Regulatory Impact Assessment—the vast majority of businesses supported the need, under the present arrangements, for a transitional relief scheme. The scheme announced on 25 November will place tight limits on the amounts that individual bills can rise as a result of the revaluation.

Textile Industry

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to meet representatives of the textile sector to discuss job losses in the industry. [101058]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I met the Textiles and Clothing Strategy Group, which includes representatives of textiles and clothing manufacturers, trade associations, unions, retailers and academia, to discuss issues affecting the industry on 13 October. Other DTI ministers are planning to meet representatives of the industry to discuss these issues further before Christmas

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from the (a) Knitting Industry Federation and (b) National Union of Knitwear, Footwear and Apparel Trades about the textile industry; and if he will make a statement. [101057]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Department has received a number of representations about the textiles industry, including representations from the National Union of Knitwear, Footwear and Apparel Trades.

I appreciate the widespread concern in the industry about the number and rate of job losses in the sector and I am keeping a close eye on developments. In particular, I am looking forward to seeing the report from the industry-led Textiles and Clothing Strategy Group, which will contain recommendations for action to address a number of the issues currently affecting the industry.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what (a) capital and (b) revenue financial assistance he has given to the textile sector in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99 and (d) 1999–2000. [101059]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Government offer support for capital investment under the Regional Selective Assistance (RSA) scheme. RSA offered to the textiles and clothing industry in Great Britain in recent years was as follows:

Year	£
1996–97	12,505,000
1997–98	5,863,000
1998–99	4,175,000

In addition to capital support, the textiles and clothing industries have benefited from a wide range of government assistance in areas such as trade promotion, training, research and technical development, supply chain development, spreading best practice and support for design.

Post Office

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the extent to which first class mail is delivered the next day by the Post Office. [100927]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The latest statistics published by the Post Office show that nationally, for the July-September quarter 1999, 92.1 per cent. of first class mail was delivered on the next working day following posting against a target of 92.5 per cent.

Arms Exports (Channel Islands)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what end-user undertakings were given with regard to arms exports to the Channel Islands between 1 January and 31 December 1998 regarding the permanent OIELs issued under summary classifications 14 and 333 and the SIELs issued under classifications ML1, ML2, ML3 and ML4; and if he will make a statement. [100112]

Dr. Howells: In almost all circumstances, applications for a Standard Individual Export Licence (SIEL) must be supported by an appropriate end-user undertaking. Where the intended consignee is a Government body, and the application is not for a licence to export chemicals listed in Schedule 2 or 3 to the Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC) to a state which has not ratified the CWC, a copy of the official purchase order or a copy of the relevant part of the contract covering the order is normally sufficient.

An Open Individual Export Licence (OIEL) is specific to an individual exporter and covers multiple shipments of specified goods to specified destinations and/or, in some cases, specified consignees. The exporter must obtain from each consignee an appropriate end-user undertaking for each export before the export takes place, or not later than one month after the date of exportation.

Under arrangements between the DTI's Export Control Organisation (ECO) and Jersey and Guernsey Customs and Excise Departments, the latter send ECO all applications for a licence to export arms or other goods controlled for strategic reasons from the Channel Islands. ECO then circulates these applications to OGDs for advice in line with their policy requirements as determined by them, before giving advice to the relevant Channel Islands licensing authority. Copies of licences issued for the export of such goods to the Channel Islands are sent to the Channel Islands authorities.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on arms exports to the Channel Islands, with specific reference to Clauses 5(a), 11(a) and 11(d) of the criteria used in considering conventional arms export licence applications. [100114]

Dr. Howells: All applications for a licence to export to the Channel Islands any goods subject to control by being listed in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, as amended (commonly known as the Military List), are considered against the criteria announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 28 July 1997, Official Report, columns 26–29, and the EU Code of Conduct on Arms Exports. Copies of licences issued for the export of such goods to the Channel Islands are sent to the Channel Islands authorities.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on how many occasions since 1 May 1997 the export licensing authorities of the Channel Islands have consulted his Department with regard to the re-export of arms originally exported to the Channel Islands under licence from his Department; what the outcome was of these consultations; and if he will make a statement. [100115]

Dr. Howells: Under arrangements between the DTI's Export Control Organisation (ECO) and Jersey and Guernsey Customs and Excise Departments, the latter send ECO all applications for a licence to export arms or other goods controlled for strategic reasons from the Channel Islands. ECO then circulates these applications to OGDs for advice in line with their policy requirements as determined by them, before giving advice to the relevant Channel Islands licensing authority. Copies of all licences issued for the export of such goods to the Channel Islands are sent to the Channel Islands authorities.

While ECO do not maintain a central record of the number of times that the Channel Islands authorities have requested advice, I understand that all decisions taken by the latter have been in line with the advice they have been given, whether or not the goods concerned were originally exported to the Channel Islands from the UK.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Milk Tokens

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received on the provision of milk tokens to (a) pregnant students and (b) all women on a low income. [100037]

Mr. Bayley: We have received no recent representations on these matters.

Carer's Premium

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost of allowing pensioners who become carers to receive the carer's premium in income support; how many new claimants he estimates would become eligible each year; and how long their entitlement would last on average. [100042]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows:

It is estimated that the extension of carer premium entitlement to those becoming carers aged 65 or over would cost £15 million in Income Support in the year 2000–01, with 20,000 gainers, together with a much smaller sum of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit. Information to estimate how long entitlement would last is not available.

Notes:

1. Cash prices. Costs rounded to the nearest £5 million, gainers rounded to the nearest five thousand.

2. As survey based estimates, the above will be subject to sampling error. The accuracy of the costing is also affected by the limitations of the data available on the time spent caring for a sick or disabled person.

3. The answer depends on their being underlying or actual entitlement to Invalid Care Allowance (ICA). It is assumed that all other ICA entitlement rules remain in place after the proposed change—including 35 hours spent caring, benefit overlap rules, earnings limits and receipt by the person being cared for of Disability Living Allowance (care) at the middle or higher rate or Attendance Allowance.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people receive the carer's premium in income support; how many of these are pensioners; and at what ages these pensioners first became entitled to the benefit. [99920]

Mr. Bayley: As at August 1999 there were 193,000 Income Support claimants with a carer premium, of which 11,000 were aged 65 or over. The table provides information on the age of the claimant when they first became entitled to Income Support. They may have been in receipt of the carer premium then or subsequently.

Income Support claimants aged 65 and over with the carer premium by age at the start of their current claim to Income Support, August 1999

Age of claimants	Number of claimants
All claimants	11,000
Aged under 59	3,000
60 to 64	5,000
65 and over	3,000

Notes:

1. Figures are based on a 5 per cent. sample of Income Support claimants as such are subject to a degree of sampling error.
2. Caseload figures are rounded to the nearest thousand and may not sum to totals.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the estimated loss to his Department as a result of benefit fraud during the last 12 months. [100440]

Mr. Rooker: Previous estimates have shown that £2 billion a year has definitely been lost through fraud. A further £3 billion may have been lost in cases where fraud is strongly suspected and a further £2 billion where there is some suspicion of fraud.

We are now measuring the level of fraud and error in Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance, the two most vulnerable benefits, thoroughly investigating a monthly random sample of cases in each Benefits Agency area. Staff error is measured separately by a special team within the Benefits Agency. The latest period for which figures are available is the 12 months ending September 1998 where the level of fraud and error in these benefits was £1.4 billion or 9 per cent. of the total benefit paid.

Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in Scotland are in receipt of industrial injuries benefit. [100256]

Mr. Bayley: The number of assessments for Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit in payment for Scotland was 27,000 on 4 April 1998, the latest date for which statistics are available.

Note:

Figures for assessments are "provisional" and are based on a 10 per cent. sample of Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit, including an adjustment for late returns.

Departmental Performance Targets

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the targets and performance indicators for his Department's policies. [100916]

Mr. Rooker: The Department has set out the key performance targets on which it will be judged in its PSA, and the measures of success it will use in the Output and Performance Analysis (OPA) published in March this year.

In addition, the Secretary of State sets annual targets for the Department's agencies. These targets are announced to Parliament by means of a written parliamentary answer. A full list of the targets and target dates for the Department's agencies can be found in the Next Steps Report and in individual agency Business Plans. Performance against targets is also reported in agencies' Annual Reports. Copies of these documents can be found in the Library.

These high level targets are supported at operational level by numerous other internal targets in order to ensure delivery by individual units.

NIRS2

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the implications of NIRS2 problems for the implementation of stakeholder pensions in April 2001. [100646]

Mr. Rooker: IT support is one of a number of key issues we are addressing in the development of our implementation plans for stakeholder pensions. We are ensuring those plans take account of the difficulties so far experienced with NIRS2.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to have eliminated all remaining delays in payment of retirement pensions resulting from the transfer to the NIRS2 computer system; and if he will estimate (a) the total number of such payments still outstanding, (b) the total amount still outstanding, (c) the total number of pensioners who have been affected since the problem first occurred and (d) the likely total cost of compensation. [101141]

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many recipients of SERPS are receiving payments which have been estimated rather than calculated precisely because of NIRS2 problems; [100648]

(2) what provisions the Government have made to ensure that pensioners are not living in undue hardship because of the NIRS2 computer problems and benefit payment backlog; [100650]

(3) how much the Government have so far paid in compensation for NIRS2 delays; how much they expect to pay in future; and on what basis compensation is calculated; [100645]

(4) how many pensioners are suffering unreasonable delays in receiving contributory benefits as a result of the NIRS2 problems; [100649]

(5) how much money the Government still owes pensioners affected by the problems with NIRS2 in (a) unpaid benefits and (b) compensation. [100647]

Mr. Rooker: We have long-standing contingency arrangements to ensure that pensioners do not suffer undue hardship in the event that computer problems arise. Where NIRS2 cannot provide the information required to finalise a claim, clerical calculations are undertaken. Additional resources have been made available for processing the clerical calculations, of both additional pension and the increase earned by people who have deferred receipt of their pension beyond minimum State Pension age.

A National Insurance benefit task force was set up to assist people who experience difficulties or who have queries about the problems arising from NIRS2.

As at 31 October 1999 we have paid £2.113 million in compensation for NIRS2 delays to benefit recipients. Of this £1.986 million relates to the flat-rate £10 compensation payments and £0.127 million to payments made under the normal rules of the Department's Special Payments Scheme. It is not possible at this time to estimate how much more compensation will be paid because of NIRS2 delays.

The Department operates a long-standing non-statutory compensation scheme, the terms of which have been agreed by the Parliamentary Ombudsman and his predecessors. Under the terms of the scheme compensation is calculated using the "Retail Shares and Deposit Average Rate" provided by the Building Societies Commission. Compensation may be provided for any period of delay beyond normal processing time (referred to as the "indicator of delay") for the benefit concerned. The rate currently in use is 3.872 per cent. Where a person would be due more than £10 under the terms of that scheme he or she is paid the balance in addition to the £10 outlined above.

As at 1 November 1999 the Inland Revenue estimate the cost of additional payments to Pension Providers, in respect of individual scheme members, for the delay in the payment of Age Related Rebates, was £36.2 million.

Up to the time that NIRS2 began providing Retirement Pension calculations on 6 January 1999, it was estimated that 285,000 pensioners had been affected by NIRS2 problems. Of these there remain about 40,000 cases to be reviewed. Not all of these will be in receipt of an incorrect amount of benefit.

Since 6 January NIRS2 has not been able to provide the amount of additional pension (SERPS) in about 10 per cent. of the cases in which it is known SERPS entitlement exists. For these estimated 60,000 claims a year the Benefits Agency is carrying out clerical calculations, with a view to ensuring that all new pensioners are receiving their full entitlement by the date of their retirement. In total, therefore, the maximum estimated number of new pensioners affected by NIRS2 problems to the end of 1999 will be 345,000.

Information about the full amount of Retirement Pension which has been underpaid because of the delayed implementation of the NIRS2 computer, and the compensation payable, will not be available until recovery action is complete. This is expected to be during next year.

Benefit Payment (Methods)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the advice given to pension and benefit recipients about whether they can choose to collect their payments in their local post office. [101069]

Mr. Rooker: All pension and benefit recipients receive advice on all the available methods of payments including collecting their payments in their local post office.

Free School Meals

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the estimated value of the notional amount included in family credit to compensate for non-entitlement to free school meals. [101144]

Mr. Bayley: When the Family Credit scheme was introduced in 1988, provision was made to replace the value of entitlement to free school meals (and free milk/vitamins for the under-fives). This was done by adding £2.55 a week to each child credit. The total child credit has since been uprated annually by the Rossi index.

Working Families' Tax Credit was introduced from 5 October 1999. It is more generous than the Family Credit it replaces.

Pensioners

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners aged over 75 years live with adults of below pension age; and what proportion that is of all pensioners aged over 75 years. [99397]

Janet Anderson: I have been asked to reply.

An estimated 0.4 million pensioners aged 75 or over live with adults below state pension age. This represents approximately 12 per cent. of all pensioners aged 75 years or over.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Kenya

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial aid was given by her Department to Kenya in the last year for which figures are available, indicating the projects for which aid was given. [99585]

Clare Short: UK aid to Kenya in 1998–99 totalled approximately £29 million, including £23.7 million from Technical Co-operation funds, £1.3 million Financial Aid, and £4 million Emergency Aid.

Projects over £1 million funded from Technical Co-operation and Emergency allocations and their expenditure in 1998–99 were as follows:

£000

Project	Expenditure
Kenya Agricultural Research Institute	2,274
Association for Better Land Husbandry	744
Smallholder Dairy Project	258
FarmAfrica Goat and Animal Health Project	121
Kwale Rural Support Programme	160
Wajir Pastoral Development Programme	125
ActionAid Capacity-building Programme	95
Wedco Microfinance, western Kenya	743
Kenya Women Finance Trust	214
Business Deregulation Project	287
Faulu Microfinance Project	885
Civil Society Umbrella Project (civil and political rights)	236
Support to 1999 Population Census	400
Primary Schools Management Project	1,118

£000

Project	Expenditure
Strengthening of Primary Education	1,486
Family Health Project	1,802
HIV/AIDS Prevention and Care Project	2,047
Family Planning Interim Support Project	162
Emergency Provision of Malaria Drugs	799
Social Marketing of Condoms	975
Oxfam Floods Emergency Project	1,608
Eradication of Polio	2,879
Bomb Blast
Re-equipping Kenya National Examinations Council	967
Re-equipping Co-operative Bank	994

Financial Aid in 1998–99 consisted of:

£000

Project	Expenditure
Molo-Litein Road Improvement	589
Pensions[1]	726

[1] Financial aid allocations include expenditure on the pre-independence element of pensions of former colonial public service officers.

British Council

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what amounts were paid by her Department to the British Council in respect of work carried out overseas in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99; and what is the estimated figure for the current financial period. [100054]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development's payments to the British Council in respect of work carried out overseas from 1997 to the current financial period are as follows:

	£ million
1997–98	44.8
1998–99	40.4
1999–2000	[1]32.8

[1] The figure for the financial year 1999–2000 is the current total to date

Contracts

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance is given by her Department to British companies to win contracts from Governments in receipt of aid from her Department. [100050]

Clare Short: None. The Department for International Development is responsible for promoting development and the reduction of poverty. British companies are assisted by British Trade International to win business overseas.

Complementary Medicine

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her support (a) for traditional medicine in treatment and management of HIV/AIDS and malaria in developing countries and (b) for the work of the Commonwealth Working Group on traditional and complementary health systems. [100726]

Mr. Foulkes: We will look with interest at any conclusions which bear upon improving the health of poor people in developing countries. The Working Group promises a comprehensive review of the contribution which traditional and complementary medicine can make towards better health.

Abortion

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the impact on the provision of (a) DFID and (b) joint DFID/US funded overseas family planning projects of the US Administration's decision to prohibit funding of foreign non-Governmental organisations which take part in public discussions on abortion in their own countries. [100476]

Mr. Foulkes: The US Administration's decision makes no difference to the commitment of this Government to helping poor people access good quality family planning and reproductive health services. It will not have a significant impact on jointly funded programmes.

HEALTH

Nursing and Residential Homes

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the financial impact that (a) the national minimum wage, (b) the working time directive and (c) the increase in registration fees will have on nursing and residential homes. [99050]

Mr. Hutton: The Low Pay Commission has been asked to monitor and evaluate the introduction and impact of the national minimum wage. The Commission has undertaken a consultation and fact-finding exercise during which it paid particular attention to the effect on low-paying sectors, including social care. The Government are due to receive the Commission's report in December and will then carefully consider its findings.

A regulatory impact appraisal on the costs and benefits for business generally resulting from the implementation of the Working Times Regulations was made, copies of which are available in the Library.

We will carefully consider the financial impact of increases in regulatory fees on residential and nursing homes before implementing any increase.

Epilepsy

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the prevalence of epilepsy is in each health authority area. [99839]

Mr. Hutton: The information is not available in the format requested.

Epilepsy is the most common chronic neurological disorder, affecting between 400,000 and 420,000 people—one in 200 of the United Kingdom population, including 100,000 children.

Free Prescriptions

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the basis for his policy for free prescriptions for those, not otherwise exempt, with certain medical conditions. [100014]

Ms Stuart: Entitlement to free prescription for those not otherwise exempt is based on the principle that those who can afford to contribute should do so, while those who are likely to have difficulty in paying should be protected.

The extensive exemption and charge remission arrangements are intended to ensure that no-one need be deterred from obtaining any necessary medication on financial grounds.

NHS Dentistry (Stoke-on-Trent)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which dental practices in Stoke-on-Trent, North are currently accepting new NHS patients. [100182]

Mr. Hutton: We understand that two dental practices in Stoke-on-Trent, North are currently accepting new National Health Service patients and another practice in the area will also be accepting new NHS patients from January following the appointment of a vocational trainee.

In addition, a practice in Stoke-on-Trent, North has had Investing In Dentistry moneys approved and it is anticipated that an additional surgery and the acceptance of new NHS patients will commence in the near future.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the waiting time between registration of new NHS patients and earliest appointment in Stoke-on-Trent, North; and if he will make a statement. [100183]

Mr. Denham: Specific data on waiting times between registration with a National Health Service dentist and earliest appointment in Stoke-on-Trent, North are not collected centrally. However, North Staffordshire Health Authority report that in Stoke-on-Trent, North new patients registering with an NHS dentist requiring urgent treatment will be seen within a week, while new dental patients requiring an extensive examination will be required to wait for a period of four to six weeks on average.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he will take to ensure emergency NHS dental services are available in Stoke-on-Trent, North. [100184]

Mr. Hutton: Emergency National Health Service dental services are provided as part of the General Dental Service contract to all patients registered with a NHS dental practitioner. North Staffordshire dentists operate an out-of-hours emergency rota which provides advice and care as appropriate to registered and unregistered individuals.

There is a salaried dental service located at Basford House, Stoke-on-Trent which provides access to dental care Monday to Friday for those unable to access general dental services. In addition, an emergency dental clinic also operates at Basford House every Saturday and Sunday, including Bank Holidays.

Optometrists

Mr. Patrick Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) for what reason optometrists do not have a place as of right on the boards of primary care groups in England; [100492]

(2) what discussions he has held with the First Minister of the Welsh Assembly on the (a) contribution and (b) role of optometrists on the boards of local health groups in Wales; [100491]

(3) what plans he has to review his policy on whether optometrists should have a place as of right on the boards of primary care groups in England. [100493]

Mr. Hutton: The differing professional representation on primary care groups and local health groups reflects the differing roles of and expectations which we and the Welsh Assembly have of the two organisations. We feel that, in England, primary care groups can achieve high quality eye care by consulting both local optical committees and individual optometrists as appropriate. We will, however, be watching developments in Wales with interest to see what lessons can be learned.

Mr. Patrick Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will review his policy on whether an optometric adviser should be appointed to each health authority in line with those persons already appointed to advise on general practice, dentistry and pharmacy. [100494]

Mr. Denham: This is for individual health authorities to decide, but we will be pointing out to them the highly worthwhile contribution which optometric advisers can make to both the development of primary eye care and the probity of general ophthalmic services.

Primary Care

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many Primary Care Act pilots (1) were planned by the previous Government; and how many have been developed; [100196]

(2) have been planned by the present Government; and how many have (a) been developed and (b) are in the process of being developed. [100197]

Mr. Denham: No Primary Care Act pilots were initiated by the previous Government.

Personal Medical Services pilots

Since 1998 there have been two waves of applications. In the first wave, 134 expressions of interest were received; 118 applications were received subsequently, and 102 approvals were issued. 88 schemes went live on 1 April 1998, with 83 pilots still operating at 1 September 1999.

In the second wave, announced in October 1998, over 400 expressions of interest were received. This resulted in 315 proposals being submitted by the end of June 1999. Of those, 204 were approved, with 116 going live in October 1999 and a further 86 by April 2000.

Personal Dental Services pilots

Since 1998 there have been three waves of applications. There were 15 pilots in the first wave, 13 of which started in October 1998 with a further two starting in January 1999. In the second wave, 72 expressions of interest were received, and the roll-out of 23 pilots commenced in October 1999. 120 expressions of interest were received for the third wave. These are currently being considered. Pilots in the third wave will commence from October 2000.

Down's Syndrome

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he will take to reduce prejudice against and misunderstanding of the clinical needs of Down's Syndrome patients within the NHS. [100194]

Mr. Hutton: We have already published good practice guidance on health services for people with learning disabilities: "Signposts for Success" (on commissioning and providing health services for people with learning disabilities) and "Once a Day" (for primary health care teams). We propose to build on these by ensuring that the clinical needs of people with Down's Syndrome are fully considered in our work to develop the new Government Learning Disability Strategy.

Herbal Remedies

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the nature and scope of the proposed forthcoming recommendations from the European Commission for possible amendments to EU Directive 75/318 relating to herbal remedies; and if he will make a statement. [100252]

Ms Stuart: The Commission Directive 99/83 EC, adopted in September 1999, amends the Annexe to Directive 75/318 EC. This new Directive provides additional guidance on the data required to meet efficacy and safety requirements where a company seeking marketing authorisation wishes to use bibliographical data for the purposes of establishing that the product has a well established use. We will shortly be bringing forward an amendment to the Medicines for Human Use (Marketing Authorisations Etc.) Regulations 1994 to incorporate the change into United Kingdom legislation.

It has become evident recently that there is uncertainty among a number of European Union member states on how to interpret 99/83 EC. We wish to provide stability and certainty for business. Accordingly, the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) is currently raising the issue with the European Medicines Evaluation Agency and the European Commission with a view to achieving greater clarity over interpretation. The MCA will also be discussing this question with our statutory advisory bodies, the Medicines Commission and the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

In on-going discussions in the EU over the interpretation of Directive 99/83 EC, and over the possible creation of an additional category of traditionally used medicines, our objective for herbal remedies will be to achieve proportionate regulatory arrangements, effectively balancing consumer choice and public safety. In working towards this objective, the MCA will continue its programme of informal dialogue with the UK natural health sector.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to update the list of specified or toxic herbs which are subject to restrictions on sale and supply set out in the Schedule to the Medicines (Retail Sale or Supply of Herbal Remedies) Order 1977. [100253]

Ms Stuart: At Ministers' request, the Medicines Control Agency has considered the need to update the lists of herbs which are subject to restrictions on sale and supply set out in the Schedule to the Medicines (Retail Sale or Supply of Herbal Remedies) Order 1977. The agency believes that the protection of public health will be best served by updating the lists, and work is in progress to that end. Any proposals will be subject to public consultation.

Mental Health Act 1983

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has evaluated regarding the role of paramedics currently involved in conveying people to hospital under the Mental Health Act 1983; and what training will be provided to enable the police to convey people appropriately. [100780]

Mr. Hutton: We know of no research on the role of paramedics involved in conveying people to hospital under the Mental Health Act. It is for individual chief constables to consider their forces' training needs in specific areas of work. National police training includes some formal training on mental illness, supplemented by practical role play exercises, during the course of the fifteen-week residential phase of the probationer training programme undertaken by all recruits to police forces other than the Metropolitan Police (which has its own training programme, including training on mental illness).

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will encourage other police forces to adopt the arrangements which exist between the Metropolitan Police and the London Ambulance Service regarding the transport to hospital of people with excited delirium and people detained under section 136 of the Mental Health Act 1983. [100781]

Mr. Hutton: The Mental Health Act 1983 Code of Practice encourages the development of local protocols by all the agencies involved in the operation of section 136 of the Mental Health Act. This section gives the police power to remove to a place of safety mentally disordered people found in a place to which the public have access and who are considered to be in immediate need of care or control. I understand that, in accordance with the Code of Practice, the Metropolitan Police and the London Ambulance Service are currently discussing a draft procedure to be followed on the transport to hospital of people who have been arrested under s136 of the Act. Once finalised, this will supplement existing guidance on admitting mentally ill patients to hospital and I would expect that both authorities would be willing to make it available to other organisations with an interest in these matters.

GP Referrals

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what right NHS patients have to access to information on the length of consultants' waiting lists before they are referred for treatment by their general practitioners; and if he will make a statement. [100643]

Ms Stuart: Patients are entitled to ask their general practitioner about the length of the hospital consultants' waiting lists in their area before being referred to a consultant. Most National Health Service trusts routinely send information to local GPs on waiting times for their consultants, and patients can access this information by phoning the Health Information Service on freephone 0800 66 55 44.

The Department also publishes data on the Internet on how long patients have waited for outpatient appointments and how long people are waiting on in-patient lists by speciality and by NHS trust.

Children's Rights

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to ensure that legislation affecting the rights of the child is available in a language and format suitable for children. [100906]

Mr. Hutton: Information about children's rights is increasingly available in a language and format suitable for children.

The Department has published summaries of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, some of which are available in minority languages, and leaflets on the Children Act 1989. Major child care voluntary organisations have also produced valuable materials for use in schools and other settings, some of which have been funded by central government.

Prozac

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the possible adverse reactions to Prozac (Fluoixtine), including reported cases of depression and suicide. [99940]

Ms Stuart: As with all medicines the safety of Prozac is continually monitored by the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) and the independent expert advisory body, the Committee on Safety of Medicines (CSM). The possible association of suicidal thoughts and hostile behaviour with Prozac was reviewed by the MCA and CSM in 1990. The available evidence did not suggest an increased risk with Prozac.

It is well known that suicidal ideation is associated with depression. Features of depression, including suicidal behaviour, can worsen after introduction of any anti-depressant prior to its beneficial effects being apparent and therefore reports of suicide attempts associated with Prozac are not unexpected. The Summary of Product Characteristics for Prozac warns that the possibility of a suicide attempt may persist until significant remission of depression occurs.

Cystic Fibrosis

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received opposed to the extension of free prescriptions to adults with cystic fibrosis. [100111]

Ms Stuart: No such extension has been proposed. We have therefore received no representations opposed to it.

NHS Employee Opinion Survey

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on the development of a core employee opinion survey for use by NHS trusts; and if he will make a statement. [100938]

Mr. Denham: All National Health Service employers are required under the NHS human resources framework, "Working Together", to have conducted an annual staff attitude survey by April 2000.

Guidance for NHS employers on good practice in designing, administering and acting upon the results of employee opinion surveys will be issued shortly. It will describe core areas which all NHS employers should cover in their surveys.

There are no current plans to develop a core employee opinion survey for use by all NHS trusts.

Cottage Hospital, Epsom

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reasons the question tabled on 8 October by the hon. Member for Thurrock concerning the cottage hospital at Epsom was not answered. [100935]

Mr. Denham: I apologise to my hon. Friend that he did not receive a reply to his earlier question. This was due to an administrative error.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what services are provided at the cottage hospital in the vicinity of Horton Country Park, Epsom. [100940]

Mr. Denham: The New Epsom and Ewell Cottage Hospital which is part of Epsom and St. Helier National Health Service Trust is a 20-bedded general practitioner hospital. It takes patients with any diagnosis i.e. medical, post-surgery and the terminally ill but not the mentally ill.

It has an outpatient department covering a range of services from general medicine, general surgery, dermatology, rheumatology, ear, nose and throat, audiology and plastic surgery. GPs do minor operation sessions there.

The hospital is also a base for nurse-led clinics for stoma, breast and urology. It is also a base for a district nursing service, health visitors for the elderly and a continence advisory service. There is also a rehabilitation team, comprising occupational therapists, physiotherapists, speech and language therapists, chiropodists and the hospital at home team.

Winter Pressures Funding

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has for additional funding for winter pressures for 1999–2000; and if he will make a statement. [100936]

Ms Stuart: There are no plans to provide additional money for winter pressures in 1999–2000. The 5.1 per cent. over and above inflation increase in National Health Service expenditure awarded by the Government is allowing health authorities to plan more effectively for the health and social needs of their populations, including the provision of services throughout the winter.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Education (Leicestershire)

15. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the impact of the current level of Government funding for Leicestershire on education in the county. [99355]

Ms Estelle Morris: Leicestershire will be getting an extra £12.8 million for 2000–01. It is very important that this extra funding is delivered to education by the county. They did not do so last year—I hope they will do it this time.

Science A-levels

17. Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of (a) girls and (b) boys who take A-levels obtain at least one science A-level. [99359]

Mr. Wicks: Of A-level candidates in 1998, 48 per cent. of boys and 32 per cent. of girls passed at least one science subject. However, more girls than boys taking a science A-level gained a pass.

New Deal

18. Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the New Deal for Lone Parents. [99360]

Ms Hodge: The programme is working well. Since October 1998, 93,690 lone parents have voluntarily agreed to have at least an initial interview with a personal adviser and 89 per cent. of those have agreed to participate further. 23,000 have found jobs.

19. Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the destination of those young people in Sussex who have completed the New Deal programme without securing long-term employment. [99361]

Ms Jowell: We know that over 1,100 young people left New Deal in Sussex for sustained work. Over 750 did not tell the Employment Service their reason for leaving but a recent survey suggests that over half of them will have found work. A further 850 left for a variety of destinations including education, training and sickness or other benefits.

20. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much has been spent on all aspects of promotion of the New Deal. [99362]

Ms Jowell: A sum of £19,657,565 has been spent on promoting New Deal to employers and unemployed people. This has resulted in high levels of awareness of New Deal and positive attitudes towards it among employers and unemployed people. It helped ensure that large numbers of employers offered good quality job vacancies to those on New Deal and it demonstrably improved the motivation of unemployed people.

34. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the progress of the New Deal for the unemployed. [99377]

Ms Jowell: The New Deal for young unemployed people continues to make good progress towards our manifesto target of moving 250,000 young people into work, which we expect to meet next year. By the end of September 1999 over 155,500 young people had found work through the New Deal, and more than 101,000 young people had benefited from training or work experience.

Ms Keeble: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps the Government are taking to improve access to financial services for people on the New Deal. [99345]

Mr. Blunkett: I am pleased that earlier this year we signed an agreement with the Royal Bank of Scotland that allows New Deal participants easier access to banking facilities. I expect other banks will follow this lead.

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will estimate the level of staff turnover among personal advisers in the New Deal programme since its inception in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Greater London and (c) Leaside District; and if he will make a statement. [99641]

Ms Jowell: Information relating to the job title of Employment Service employees is not held on our central HR Information System. The estimation of the level of staff turnover for personal advisers would therefore be at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his Department's plans for the development of the New Deal for those over 25 years. [99357]

Ms Jowell: We have set aside £100 million next year to enhance the existing New Deal for long term unemployed people aged 25 and over. Building on this, and to give every unemployed adult the best possible chance of finding a job, we will introduce a strengthened package of help for unemployed people aged 25 and over from April 2001, which will include a range of enhanced, work focused and high quality options for all participants.

Standards Fund

21. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations he has received about the operation of the standards fund. [99364]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations about the funding of schools and local education authorities, including the standards fund.

Internet

22. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he is taking to prevent children at school accessing inappropriate material via the internet. [99365]

Mr. Wills: We are determined that pupils should be protected from unsuitable material while accessing the wealth of educationally valuable material on the internet. DfEE and the British Educational Communications and Technology agency (BECTa) have produced a detailed information pack for teachers and parents about pupils' safe use of the internet. The Superhighway Safety pack, which is available free and is also on the National Grid for Learning, provides guidance on the wide range of measures which schools can adopt. These range from using walled gardens and filtering software, to monitoring and tracking pupil access and providing "user contracts" for pupils, spelling out how they should behave.

The Grid itself is a safe area of the internet, with all sites linked to it conforming to ground rules and a code of conduct. Content must not contain unsuitable material, or links to unsuitable material. Linked sites are required to co-operate fully with GridWatch, which provides a reporting mechanism in the event of unsuitable material appearing on the Grid, as well as immediate remedial action.

Asylum Seekers (Children's Education)

24. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he is taking to assist local councils in making provision for the education of children of asylum seekers who do not speak English. [99367]

Jacqui Smith: Children of asylum seekers are entitled to education in the same way as all other children and local education authorities receive funding for their education in the same way as for other pupils on school rolls. Children of asylum seekers who do not speak English receive extra help at school to develop their language skills through the Ethnic Minority and Traveller Achievement Grant, which is over £430 million for the next three years.

Performance-related Pay (Teachers)

25. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the funding arrangements he intends to put in place to finance performance-related pay for teachers. [99368]

Ms Estelle Morris: We will establish a Special Grant to target resources for the performance threshold separate from schools' delegated budgets. Schools will be able to draw additional funds from this grant via their local education authority for each teacher promoted to the upper pay spine. There will be no quota on threshold successes.

We are considering the most appropriate mechanism for funding other pay costs deriving from the Green Paper proposals.

Disruptive Pupils

26. Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action he is taking to assist schools in dealing with disruptive pupils. [99369]

Jacqui Smith: We are making some £500 million available over three years for projects to tackle truancy, exclusion and disruption. This is backed up with new guidance "Social Inclusion: Pupil Support" on attendance, behaviour, the use of exclusion and re-integration. In addition, the Excellence in Cities initiative includes the provision of Learning Mentors and Learning Support Units to help schools better manage disruptive pupils.

I recently hosted a seminar to consider the principal issues about the education of children with emotional and behavioural difficulties. We shall consider carefully the many constructive suggestions that were made.

Textile Industry

28. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will assess the impact of recent purchasing decisions by Marks and Spencer on employment in the textile industry; and what measures he plans to take in response. [99371]

Ms Jowell: The commercial decisions of private companies are a matter for them, and the DfEE do not assess the employment implications of individual cases. In a dynamic modern economy, jobs are being created and lost all the time. However, the total number of people in employment in the UK is growing—up by over 700,000 in the last two and a half years.

The Employment Service is there to help all individuals who lose their job to find another one, and most do so quickly. In addition to advice with jobsearch, re-training help is available for those who find it difficult to get work in their previous occupation, while people affected by a redundancy that has a significant impact on a local labour market can get access to ES programmes straight away. The Government have also established Rapid Response Units to ensure that, when a major redundancy occurs, the help individuals need to get back to work is quickly in place.

With specific reference to textiles and clothing, my colleagues at the Department of Trade and Industry have taken a keen interest in the work of the Textiles and Clothing Strategy Group, which has been looking at ways in which the UK's textiles and clothing industry can become more internationally competitive.

Special Educational Needs

29. Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the Government's plans to ensure equal opportunity and access for children who have special educational needs. [99372]

Jacqui Smith: The Government's strategy for raising standards for pupils with special educational needs is set out in the document "Meeting Special Educational Needs: A programme of action" published in November 1998. One strand of this programme was to expand the Schools Access Initiative to fund capital allocations to make mainstream schools more accessible to pupils with disabilities. We have allocated £20 million in the 1999–2000 financial year and expect to allocate a further £80 million over the next two years.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how he proposes to consult with children with disabilities on the provisions of the proposed Special Educational Needs Bill. [100905]

Jacqui Smith: The Special Educational Needs Bill will incorporate undertakings made in "Meeting Special Educational Needs: A Programme of Action", which were drawn up following extensive consultation—including with disabled children and their representatives—on the Green Paper "Excellence for All Children: Meeting Special Educational Needs".

In consulting on the Bill, we will welcome comments from all interested parties including children with disabilities.

Specialist Schools

30. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the success of specialist schools. [99373]

Ms Estelle Morris: Specialist schools submit annual reports about progress against their targets and we monitor their examination performance compared with the performance of all other schools. Their examination success is illustrated by their average 2.5 percentage point improvement in GCSE 5 or more A* to C results between 1998 and 1999 compared with an average of 1.5 percentage points for all other schools. Research projects about the effectiveness of the specialist schools programme carried out by the London School of Economics and Leeds University will be reporting soon and will be published in the new year.

Rural Schools

31. Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many rural schools were closed (a) between 1979 and 1997 and (b) since May 1997; and if he will make a statement on the future of rural schools. [99374]

Jacqui Smith: We estimate that around 450 rural primary schools closed between 1983 and 1998. Since the increased protection for rural schools that we announced in February 1998, only six such schools have been approved for closure. We are determined to preserve access to local schools for rural communities, and our guidance to local education authorities and school organisation committees makes clear that the presumption should continue to be against the closure of rural schools.

Local Education Authorities

32. Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the criteria in the funding formula for local education authorities. [99375]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend is well aware that there are problems with the current funding formula for local authorities. We looked at this issue in our first year in office. But there was no consensus among the various different groups of local authorities about the way forward. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister therefore announced in December 1998 that we would conduct a fundamental review in partnership with local government: we expect to make proposals emerging from the review by the summer of 2000.

Class Sizes

33. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on class sizes in secondary schools in England since May 1997. [99376]

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on average class sizes in secondary schools. [99370]

Ms Estelle Morris: The average size of classes in secondary schools remains at less than 22. That is around six below the figure for primary schools. Between January 1998 and January 1999 overall class size figures dropped from 24.9 to 24.8. Over the same period the overall pupil-teacher ratio fell from 18.9 to 18.8. Both these statistics represent the first reductions in 10 years. We have not only stopped the year on year increases seen under the previous Administration, but are reversing the trend towards higher average class sizes and pupil-teacher ratios.

Learning Through Landscapes

35. Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the effects of the learning through landscapes project on schools in Eltham. [99378]

Jacqui Smith: The school grounds programme in Eltham is managed by Learning through Landscapes in partnership with Greenwich Local Education Authority, and with support from The Bridge House Estate's Trust Fund and the Sir John Cass's Foundation. The programme is accountable to these partners but, as an original promoter of Learning through Landscapes, my Department would be interested to receive reports of the achievements of the Eltham project in due course.

GCSEs

36. Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress the Government have made towards achieving their targets in respect of GCSEs. [99379]

Ms Estelle Morris: This year's GSCE results have improved for the fourth year running and indicate that we are on course to achieve the national targets for Key Stage 4 for 2002.

Further Education

Ms Blears: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress has been made in encouraging young people to remain in further education. [99358]

Mr. Wicks: The Government have a range of policies to encourage young people to remain in further education. For example, the £275 million Further Education Standards Fund will help to promote better retention rates in colleges; and our new student support arrangements, with an additional £30 million funding, will also help young people to keep studying.

Secondary Education

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on expenditure on secondary education since April 1997. [99366]

Ms Estelle Morris: The unit cost per secondary school pupil in England in 1997–98 was £2,480. This rose to £2,490 in 1998–99. We expect the upward trend to continue and have provided funding to ensure that it does. The projected estimates for the period to 2001–02 are as follows:

Year	£
1999–2000	2,540
2000–01	2,610
2001–02	2,680

In contrast, between 1992–93 and 1997–98, secondary funding fell by £200 per pupil.

Employee Development Schemes

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to encourage the involvement of trade unions in employee development schemes. [99938]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 30 November 1999]: My Department provides support to encourage trade union participation in Employee Development Schemes and other workplace learning activities in a number of ways:

(i) through the Union Learning Fund, established in May 1998, which encourages trade unions to build their capacity as learning organisations. The fund supports trade union influenced workplace learning activities. A total of £12 million is allocated to the Fund;

(ii) through co-funding projects that help the TUC to develop case studies and good practice. For example, a project that encourages the use of individual learning accounts as a mechanism for adding value to Employee Development Schemes and the TUC publications "Employee Development Schemes—case studies of union involvement" and "Trade Unions and Employee Development Schemes—a negotiator's guide";

(iii) the TEC funded Bargaining for Skills projects have helped trade unions to raise awareness of Investors in People. Unions have use the Standard as a tool to develop skills in the workplace and to ensure the long term employability of their own staff and members.

Education Spending

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the extra money for education announced under the Comprehensive Spending Review (Cm 4011) includes contributions from local authorities. [100840]

Mr. Blunkett: The £19 billion additional funding for education across the UK (£16 billion in England) is made up of increases in central Government spending and in amounts allocated through Education Standard Spending Assessments for local authorities.

St. Luke's Primary School, Worksop

Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will investigate the delay to the extension to St. Luke's Primary School, Shireoaks, Worksop, Nottinghamshire; why there has been no response from his Department to documentation submitted by the architects; and if he will make a statement. [101074]

Ms Estelle Morris: Officials gave approval that this project proceed to tender on 24 November 1998 subject to confirmation from Nottinghamshire Local Education Authority that the phasing of spending could be contained within the overall "Local Education Authority Minor Works" allocation. This confirmation was given on 8 December 1998. It is for the school, diocese and Local Education Authority to agree when the project should proceed to the next stage—that is, the invitation of tenders—and advise the Department accordingly in order to allow the subsequent release of grant. It is understood from the consultant/architects acting for the school in this matter, that the Department will receive relevant documentation shortly and it is hoped that this will enable matters to be progressed.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Kingston Internet

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department under what circumstances the Lord Chancellor's Department has required a website to be closed. [101091]

Mr. Lock: The Department's attention was recently drawn to material on a webspace provided by Kingston Internet to a Mr. J. F. Hulbert which contained a series of defamatory allegations against individually named judges and court staff. Consequently, the Department wrote to Kingston Internet drawing its attention to the material and inviting the company's proposals for closing the site. However, it was for Kingston Internet to consider whether the use of the webspace complied with the terms of its contract with Mr. Hulbert and it subsequently disabled the webspace.

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what recent communications there have been between the Lord Chancellor's Department and Kingston Internet Ltd. [101090]

Mr. Lock: The Lord Chancellor's Department wrote to Kingston Internet on 25 October drawing attention to material on a website provided by that company to Mr. J. F. Hulbert. On 4 November the company responded indicating that it had disabled the webspace. This crossed with a letter from the Department of 5 November inquiring whether any consideration had been given to the letter of 25 October. The Department's letter of 5 November was in turn acknowledged by the company on 9 November. There have been no further communications between the Department and the company.

Inquests (Legal Aid)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department under what circumstances and for what special reasons legal aid can be made available to enable bereaved families to be legally represented at inquests. [100715]

Mr. Lock: An inquest is an inquiry concerned with the facts surrounding a death, rather than issues such as civil or criminal liability. Legal representation is generally considered unnecessary. Full civil legal aid is therefore not available to someone appearing at an inquest. Legal advice and assistance may be available under the Green Form scheme to those who are financially eligible in connection with inquests.

Under section 4 of the Legal Aid Act 1988, it is possible in exceptional circumstances for the Lord Chancellor to direct that help be given in cases where it would otherwise not be available. In future, the Legal Services Commission (successor to the Legal Aid Board) will be able to seek authorisation from the Lord Chancellor to provide funding, under section 6(8)(b) of the Access to Justice Act 1999, for representation in exceptional cases where they believe that funding is warranted. My Department is currently considering with the Home Office the criteria to take into account in deciding what constitutes an exceptional case in respect of an inquest, and will seek the views of interested parties.

Judicial Appointments (Peach Report)

Angela Smith: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Lord Chancellor will publish Sir Leonard Peach's report on the operation of the appointments procedures in relation to all judicial appointments and Queen's Counsel. [101594]

Jane Kennedy: Sir Leonard Peach's report is being published tomorrow. Copies will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Archives

Ms Keeble: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he proposes to publish a policy statement on archives. [101475]

Mr. Lock: The first ever Government policy on archives is published today. Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The report is also available on the internet.

Archive services have both governmental and cultural functions. Effective records management is essential to good governance, and at the same time, our documentary heritage is a crucially important cultural asset. The revolution in Information and Communications Technology (ICT) gives the archives sector the opportunity to make major advances in both areas and to provide genuinely inclusive services to ethnic minorities, women and young people who are under-represented among archive users.

The policy document has been produced by all the Government Departments with a responsibility for archives. It is an example of how joined-up government works to good practical effect. It will provide a framework for future Government thinking and action on archival matters.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how much his Department has spent on civil servants' transport in each of the last two years; [98692]

(2) how much his Department has spent on Ministerial transport in each of the last two years. [98691]

Mr. Battle: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Cabinet Office, 1 December 1999, Official Report, column 256W.

GCHQ

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs who has responsibility for payment of energy bills at GCHQ in Cheltenham following the signing of the relevant PFI contract; what criteria the contract includes covering energy efficiency requirements; and if he will make a statement. [100804]

Mr. Robin Cook [holding answer 1 December 1999]: GCHQ will be responsible for the energy costs. The contract requires that the Private Sector Provider (PSP) minimises energy usage, use of natural resources and associated operational costs over the life of the building.

GCHQ has an objective to be energy efficient and environmentally friendly in line with Government policy. The PSP's contribution to this objective will be addressed in the design of the building.

EU Code of Conduct for Arms Sales

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to ensure that the licensing authorities of (a) the Channel Islands and (b) other UK Dependent Territories are subject to the EU Code of Conduct for Arms Sales; and if he will make a statement. [99939]

Mr. Hain: I will write to the right hon. and learned Member shortly.

Strategic Export Controls

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to include a summary of licences issued by the Channel Islands and Dependent Territories in future annual reports by the UK Government on Strategic Export Controls; and if he will make a statement. [100113]

Mr. Hain: None at present. But we will review the format and content of future reports, taking into account responses to the first two Annual Reports and, in particular, the eventual conclusions of the Joint Inquiry being carried out by the House of Commons Foreign Affairs, Defence, Trade and Industry, and International Development Committees.

Kosovo

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many (a) Serbs, (b) Roma, (c) Bosniaks, (d) Montenegrins, (e) Turks and (f) other minorities have been abducted in Kosovo since the KFOR occupation; how many have (i) been rescued, (ii) left Kosovo since the KFOR occupation and (iii) been murdered since the KFOR occupation; and how many people have been charged with offences against (a) to (f) since the KFOR occupation. [101119]

Mr. Vaz: Since KFOR's deployment in Kosovo on 12 June 1999 and mid-November, there have been 137 abductions reported, including 43 Serbs and 77 Albanians. No figures are available for other minorities abducted nor for the number rescued.

UNMIK estimate that 97,000 Serbs remain in Kosovo from a pre-war population of around 200,000. It is estimated that between 6,000 and 7,000 Roma or "Gypsies" remain in Kosovo. Pre-war population figures for Roma are not exact. The 1991 census figure for Roma in Kosovo was 45,000.

In the same period from 12 June to mid-November, 379 murders have been reported in Kosovo. Of these 139 were Serbs, 145 Albanians and 99 of unknown ethnic origin. There are no details for the number of people charged with these offences.

TREASURY

Consolidated Fund

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the instances in which sums required for fulfilling guarantees made by the Government were charged on and issued out of the Consolidated Fund in each of the last five years. [100745]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Such sums are normally paid out of voted moneys. While Departments are advised that they should consider whether an immediate statement should be made to Parliament in respect of a maturing contingent liability of this kind, information is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. There have been no payments under guarantees charged by statute directly on the Consolidated Fund in the last five years.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is the policy of the Government that sums required for fulfilling guarantees given by the Export Credits Guarantee Department are charged on and issued out of the Consolidated Fund. [100744]

Mr. Timms: It is established Supply procedure for departmental payments such as claims in respect of guarantees issued by ECGD to be made out of moneys voted by Parliament. An excess requirement would necessitate drawing on the Consolidated Fund.

Government Resources and Accounts Bill

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for a body to be set up under Clause 15 of the Government Resources and Accounts Bill to undertake projects outside the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [100743]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government Resources and Accounts Bill includes provisions to enable the Treasury to incur expenditure in respect of the formation of Partnerships UK and to provide financial assistance to it. The exact size and nature of any commitments will be determined during the development process, which is currently under way. The legislation means that Partnerships UK will not be precluded from carrying on public private business outside the UK.

EU Budget Council

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the Budget Council held in Brussels on 25–26 November; and if he will make a statement. [100571]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Budget Council gave its second reading to the Draft EC Budget for 2000 on 25 and 26 November. This was consistent with UK objectives. The Council was firmly against any reopening of the financial perspective agreed at Berlin. The Council fully respects the EU's obligations with respect to needs in Kosovo, and is clear that the EU's share of reconstruction activity in Kosovo can be met without revising the financial perspective ceiling.

Population Growth

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the 10 fastest growing towns and cities in England which had the fastest population growth. [100789]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Tony Clarke, dated 2 December 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question asking for the ten fastest growing towns and cities in England on the basis of current population growth.

The ONS does not produce population estimates for towns and cities. The smallest areas for which population estimates are produced are unitary and local authority areas. The following ten unitary and local authority areas have shown the largest percentage increase in population between mid-1991 and mid-1998, which is the latest year for which population estimates are available.

East Cambridgeshire,
Westminster,
Kensington and Chelsea,
Forest Heath,
Milton Keynes UA,
Elmbridge,
Worcester,
North Dorset,
Bracknell Forest UA,
Cambridge.

Married Couples Tax Allowances

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of new pensioner couples who will be affected by the withdrawal of married tax allowances. [99085]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 29 November 1999]: Today's pensioner couples will keep the married couples allowance. Any couple where at least one spouse is 65 or over before 6 April 2000 will continue to be able to claim the allowance. In addition, any new pensioner couples—single people aged 65 or over before 6 April 2000—who subsequently marry will be able to start claiming the allowance after they marry.

EU Economic and Finance Council

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the ECOFIN Council held in Brussels on 29 November; and if he will make a statement. [101478]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Chancellor of the Exchequer attended the Economics and Finance Council of Ministers. The Paymaster General; in her capacity of chair of the Code of Conduct Group, was also present.

The Council adopted a directive on electronic money.

There was a discussion of the so-called "tax package" (code of conduct on business taxation, taxation of savings, and elimination of withholding taxes on cross-border interest and royalty payments between companies). The United Kingdom position, set out in its paper on international bonds presented by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the informal meeting of the Council in September, remains unchanged. A draft report from the Council to the European Council was agreed.

Following discussion, the Presidency concluded that Greece no longer had an excessive deficit. The formal decision would go to a future Council as an 'A' point.

The Council finalised their report on Economic Policy Co-ordination, which will go to next week's European Council in Helsinki.

The President of the European Court of Auditors gave an oral report on the Court's Annual Report published earlier this month outlining the priorities for reform.

The Council discussed the progress of the Financial Services Action Plan, and draft Council conclusions, submitted by the Presidency, were agreed without discussion.

The Commission gave a report on Financial Management and stated that improving it was one of their top priorities.

Diesel/Water Emulsion Fuels

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he proposes to treate, for excise duty purposes, the water content of diesel/water emulsion fuels. [101595]

Mr. Timms: Both EU and UK law make any liquid that is added to fuel liable to duty, even water. We do not think that is fair. We shall therefore be applying to the European Commission for a derogation enabling us to propose an amendment to the law in the next Finance Bill.

EU Commission Draft Own Resources Directive

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures are planned for an explanation of Commission Own Resources for entry into force in 2002 under the Berlin Conclusions; and if such will lead to an increase in the Communities budget. [101034]

Miss Melanie Johnson: An explanatory memorandum on the Commission's Draft Own Resources Decision that enacts the agreement reached in Berlin was sent to the European Scrutiny Committees on 28 July 1999. The new Draft Decision maintains the Own Resources ceiling.

Cologne European Council

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the future role of the European central bank in employment policy, pursuant to the Cologne Summit, with particular reference to the macro-economic dialogue. [101028]

Miss Melanie Johnson: It is recognised in the UK and across the EU that long-term, sustainable job creation requires a macro-economic climate of stability and steady growth. The addition to the European Employment Pact at the Cologne European Council of a macro-economic dialogue is a recognition of this fact. As Annexe I of the Cologne Conclusions makes clear, the dialogue is intended to be among a variety of policy actors for a better understanding of the best way to achieve macro-economic stability and hence facilitate long-term job creation. The European central bank, along with governments and social partners, will play an important role in these discussions.

"a confidence building and confidential exchange of ideas"

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will define the combat of harmful tax competition as referred to in section 22 of the Cologne Council Conclusions; and what measures are currently under discussion at EU level on this issue. [101031]

Dawn Primarolo: The conclusions of the ECOFIN Council meeting on 1 December 1997 concerning taxation policy state that there is a

> "need for coordinated action at European level to tackle harmful tax competition in order to help achieve certain objectives such as reducing the continuing distortions in the single market, preventing excessive losses of tax revenue or getting tax structures to develop in a more employment friendly way".

There have been regular discussions in the Council of the proposed "tax package".

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the UK will be subject to the provisions of section 19 of the Cologne Council Conclusions on (a) increased policy co-ordination, (b) dialogue between the social partners, (c) dialogue with the European Central Bank and (d) development of the European Employment Pact. [101029]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Section 19 of the Cologne Conclusions refers to the Council's adoption of Broad Economic Policy Guidelines of member states and the Community. The UK Government support the use of non-binding Broad Economic Policy Guidelines as a means of developing a co-ordinated macro-economic policy mix. They welcome the involvement of a variety of relevant policy actors—including both sides of industry and the ECB—in this process through the macro-economic dialogue, agreed at the Cologne Council as a third prong in the European Employment Pact.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures are understood by (a) limitation of the burden imposed on low-skilled and low-paid workers and

(b) characterising retirement provision by responsibility towards future generations, in the report to the European Council at the Cologne Summit on the European Employment Pact. [101026]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The European Employment Pact recognises the importance of improving the incentives for people to work and ensuring that employment policies are sustainable. An appropriate incentive structure is one that reduces the burdens of tax on low-paid workers and ensures that they are better off in work than on benefits. The Government have implemented a number of reform measures to put this into place. The Working Families Tax Credit, reforms to National Insurance Contributions, the new 10p rate of income tax and the cut in the basic rate to 22p all reduce the burden of tax on labour, and help to ensure work pays for everyone. A long-term approach to fiscal sustainability must include a strategy to cope with demographic change, including population aging. To this end, member states—the UK included—have an interest in pursuing fiscal and budgetary policies which respect the objectives of the Stability and Growth Pact.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on, and clarify the intent of, section 24 of the Cologne Presidency Conclusions. [101032]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Section 24 of the Presidency Conclusions from the Cologne European Council relates to a proposal enabling member states to introduce a lower VAT rate on labour-intensive services for a three-year trial period beginning in January 2000. With a view to making the taxation system more employment friendly, member states are invited, without obligation, to examine this proposal.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the implementation of appropriate wage development, as called for in section 20 of the Cologne Presidency Conclusions; which sectors of employment are referred to; what his policy is thereto; and what his Department defines as appropriate. [101030]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The maintenance of "appropriate wage development", in the context of section 20 of the Cologne European Council conclusions is an essential factor in achieving macro-economic stability, in particular in keeping control of inflation. As section 20 makes clear, this is particularly imperative for the Euro 11 (the group of countries adopting the Euro in the first wave). The Cologne Conclusions do not bind the Government to specific policy measures on wage developments; however, the Government believe it is important that wage developments across all sectors reflect productivity and labour market conditions and accord with the aim of maintaining low inflation and a stable macro-economic climate.

European Central Bank

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Court of Auditors will have access to all documents held by the European Central Bank. [101033]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Under Article 27.2 of the Statute of the European System of Central Banks and of the European Central Bank, the Court of Auditors shall have access to the accounts of all revenue and expenditure in an examination of the operational efficiency of the management of the ECB.

Petrol

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reasons lead replacement petrol is subject to higher duty than unleaded petrol. [101092]

Mr. Timms: Although LRP does not contain lead, it will generally be used by cars that formerly used leaded petrol. This part of the car population tends to be older and less fuel efficient than newer cars and consequently to have poorer emissions performance. The higher duty rate continues to keep in place an incentive for replacement of less fuel efficient cars.

NIRS2

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many items of data are waiting to be input onto national insurance records held on the NIRS2 computer system. [100915]

Mr. Timms: The information requested is not available.

Fuel Duty Escalator

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will assess the cost to the Treasury of exempting (a) the police, (b) the Fire and Rescue Service and (c) the Ambulance Service from the effects of the fuel duty escalator. [100061]

Mr. Timms: The Chancellor announced in the Pre-Budget Report statement that the pre-announced fuel escalator will no longer apply. Instead decisions will be made Budget by Budget.

Incomes (North Staffordshire)

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people are in receipt of working families tax credit in the (a) Stoke-on-Trent and (b) Stoke-on-Trent, South parliamentary constituencies. [99876]

Dawn Primarolo: Reliable estimates for the numbers in receipt of the Working Families Tax Credit in the Stoke-on-Trent, South parliamentary constituency are not yet available.

Third World Debt

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the likely cost to the British exchequer of the debt cancellation package agreed at the recent G7 Cologne summit. [100044]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The debt cancellation package agreed at the G7 Cologne Summit and subsequently endorsed at the IMF/World Bank Annual Meetings provides for the cancellation of 90 per cent. or more of commercial debt in the Paris Club and 100 per cent. forgiveness of ODA debt. The UK has, of course, already cancelled all of its ODA loans ($5 billion in 98 prices). The costs of cancellation of commercial debts under the terms of the Cologne deal will fall to the Export Credit Guarantee Department (ECGD), where debt written off is scored as losses against ECGD's recoverable assets.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Tourism

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what national body is responsible for marketing tourism within England. [100259]

Janet Anderson: The British Tourist Authority continues to market England abroad as part of its overall remit. It does so in partnership with the Regional Tourist Boards and the English Tourism Council, with which it has an Overseas Marketing Agreement. Domestically, the English Tourism Council retains a strategic policy overview of marketing and has a major role in carrying out market research and providing advice on techniques and best practice.

Television Licences

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if pensioners over-75 years who are to receive free television licences will also be exempt from a future digital licence fee supplement. [100048]

Janet Anderson: No decision has been made on the recommendation of the independent review panel on the future funding of the BBC for a digital television licence supplement for people using digital receivers.

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many pensioner households will not benefit from the introduction of a free television licence for the over-75s. [99072]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 29 November 1999]: An estimated 4.6 million pensioner households do not include a member who is aged 75 or over.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, (1) pursuant to his answer of 24 November 1999, Official Report, columns 155–56W, on TV licence concessions for 60, 75-year-olds and over, what assessment he has made of the number of households that will benefit in each of the next three years; [100473]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 24 November 1999, Official Report, columns 155–56W, on concessionary TV licences for pensioners aged over 75 years, if he will estimate the cost, at current prices, of providing licences in each of the next three years. [100472]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 30 November 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to my earlier reply on 24 November 1999, Official Report, columns 155–56W. The available forecasts of household numbers, by age group, are not sufficiently accurate to enable detailed information to be provided for future years. The costs of the concession will also be affected by the precise structure of the scheme, which the Government intend to announce shortly.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will estimate the cost of making television licences available at no cost to all pensioners. [100572]

Janet Anderson: The estimated cost of providing free television licences to all households including a pensioner would be nearly £700 million a year, while the cost of free television licences for all pensioner-only households would be approximately £490 million a year.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many more pensioners would benefit if the free television licence concession was extended to all households comprised only of people of state pensionable age; and how much this would cost in each of the next 10 years. [99670]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 29 November 1999]: There are an estimated 3 million households consisting only of people of state pensionable age but below the age of 75, of which approximately 100,000 qualify for the existing concessionary television licence. The estimated cost of providing free television licences to all such households is approximately £290 million a year at current licence fee levels. Costs in future years would depend on the number of households consisting solely of pensioners below the age of 75 and the level of the television licence fee, which is not fixed for the next 10 years.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many households comprising one or more people aged over 75 years are currently in receipt of a concessionary television licence. [100316]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 29 November 1999]: Detailed figures are not available, since records do not distinguish between beneficiaries who have attained the age of 75 and those who have not. However, it is estimated that approximately 500,000 households currently in receipt of a concessionary television licence include a person aged 75 or over.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport on what date the scheme to provide free television licences to pensioners over the age of 75 will be introduced. [99860]

Janet Anderson: We will announce full details of the scheme, including the starting date, in the near future.

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many households with members over the age of 75 years will receive free television licences from August 2000; and how many households with members between the ages of 60 and 75 years will not receive free television licences. [100785]

Janet Anderson: Over three million households include a member aged 75 or over and will therefore benefit from the free television licences announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We hope to announce details of the scheme, including the starting date, shortly. An estimated three million households consist only of people of state pensionable age but below the age of 75, of which approximately 100,000 qualify for the existing £5 concessionary television licence.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how many people aged 75 years and over in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire will receive free television licences; and if he will make a statement; [101129]

(2) how many pensioners in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire will benefit from free television licences for those aged over 75 years; and if he will make a statement. [100591]

Janet Anderson: As at mid-1998, the latest date for which figures are available, the estimated number of people in Shrewsbury and Atcham County District aged 75 or over was 7,900 and the estimated number in the County of Shropshire 23,300. As the Government have announced, every pensioner aged 75 or over will receive their television licence free of charge.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if it is the policy of the Government that households with one or more people aged over 75 years should be able to enjoy free access to the digital services of the BBC. [100317]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 29 November 1999]: All BBC public service channels are and will continue to be available free-to-air to all licensed households with the necessary receiving equipment.

Corporate Assets

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what his estimate is of the current value of property (a) in Scotland, (b) in England, (c) overseas and (d) in total held by (i) the BBC, (ii) the ITC, (iii) the Radio Authority, (iv) Channel 4, (v) the S4C and (vi) the Office of the National Lottery; and what is the value of other assets held by these bodies. [99826]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The value of property and other assets held by these organisations is:

£ million

	Property
	England	Scotland	Overseas	Total	Other assets
BBC	434.8	8.0	15.1	477.90	1,407.0
ITC	2.5	0	0	2.5	1.7
Radio Authority	0	0	0	0	0.53
S4C	0	0	0	11.0	3.6
OFLOT	0	0	0	0	0.93
Total	507.3	8.0	15. 1	561.40	1,413.76

Note:

These figures are the latest available (1998–99). The total value of property held includes that held in Wales and Northern Ireland. S4C hold property only in Wales. OFLOT became the National Lottery Commission on 1 April 1999.

New Earnings Survey (Tourism)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport following the publication of the Government's New Earnings Survey, what action his Department is taking to reverse the trend of falling incomes among the lower-paid workers in the tourism industry. [100258]

Janet Anderson: It is not possible to draw conclusions about tourism as a whole from the New Earnings Survey because there is no single tourism industry. Average weekly earnings for people with manual occupations associated with tourism activities grew between 1998 and 1999 by at least the average increase in manual earnings for the economy as a whole.

Carn Brea Leisure Centre

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received regarding Kerrier District Council's decision to close Carn Brea Leisure Centre in Cornwall. [100228]

Kate Hoey: I have received numerous letters about the proposed closure of Carn Brea Leisure Centre. The majority of these have come from local schools and those in the surrounding area, which will lose the important swimming facilities provided by Carn Brea when the Centre closes. I also met a delegation of Leisure Centre users, led by my hon. Friend, on 23 November to discuss their concerns about the Centre's closure.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list those individuals and companies who have expressed an interest in (a) purchasing and (b) leasing the Millennium Dome after the end of the Millennium Experience. [99321]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 24 November 1999]: The competition to find a sustainable use for the Dome beyond the Millennium Experience was launched in March of this year. It is being managed on behalf of the Government by English Partnerships (EP), the urban regeneration agency for England, in co-operation with the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC), the operating company for the Millennium Experience.

Initially, more than 60 organisations responded and their ability to deliver a possible future use for the site was assessed before issuing the invitation to a long short-list of 12. Those 12 organisations were asked to submit outline ideas by the end of October. Nine responses were received and assessment of their proposals are under way. Details of the nine responses remain commercially confidential.

The Government hope to make an announcement on the final short-list early in the new year. A final decision on the successful bidder will be made in the summer of 2000.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish a list of those invited to attend the Millennium Dome on 31 December, other than those described as ordinary members of the public. [99336]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 30 November 1999]: I hope the hon. Member will understand that for reasons of security it is not possible to publish a list of those invited to attend.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what advice his Department is giving to the Millennium Experience Company on the disposal of the Millennium Dome after 31 December 2000. [100261]

Janet Anderson: The Competition for the future use of the Dome was launched in March 1999, and is being run on behalf of the Government by English Partnerships (EP), the urban regeneration agency for England, in co-operation with the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC).

Officials from the Department for Culture, Media and Sport (DCMS) and the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions (DETR) are monitoring all stages of the competition and advise Ministers accordingly.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many accidents at work have been recorded so far during the construction and preparation of the Millennium Dome, broken down by quarter and by type of accident. [99337]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 1 December 1999]: Accidents reported by the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) under the requirements of the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995 (RIDDOR; SI 3165) are as follows and cover the period 1 August 1997 to 10 November 1999:

	1997	1998	1999
1st Quarter
Major Specified Injuries[1]	—	1	0
Three Day Reportable Injuries[1]	—	1	1
2nd Quarter
Major Specified	—	1	0
Three Day Reportable	—	0	5
3rd Quarter
Major Specified	0	0	2
Three Day Reportable	3	0	4
4th Quarter
Major Specified	1	2	[2]2
Three Day Reportable	0	1	[2]4

[1] As defined under RIDDOR (Major specified injuries include any break of bones except fingers or toes; three day reportable injuries are those where the injured person does not report for work for a three day period after the date of the accident)
[2] To date
Note:
There have been no fatalities on the site.

The accident frequency rate for the Dome site, which takes into account the number of injuries, the normal working life-span of employees and contractors and the number of hours worked, is below the national average established by the Health and Safety Executive. NMEC has provided Safety Induction Training for over 13,000 employees, contractors and sub-contractors. For a construction and work programme of the size and complexity of the Dome the RIDDOR figures reflect a laudable safety record.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will break down the construction costs of each zone within the Millennium Dome. [99338]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 1 December 1999]: The New Millennium Experience Company considers the construction costs of each zone to be commercially sensitive. Release of the information could prejudice the company's ability to obtain optimum value for money from the range of procurements applicable to each zone, and potentially its relationship with contractors. The Shareholder of NMEC supports this view as do I.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proposals for the content of the Millennium Experience were received by ministers and the New Millennium Experience Company from the National Book Committee; and what response was given. [98824]

Janet Anderson: Clive Bradley of the National Book Committee wrote to the Minister without Portfolio on 27 March 1998 with proposals for how the importance of the written English language might be reflected in the Millennium Experience, and suggesting some authors who might play a role. The Minister passed the letter to NMEC for their consideration and asked Mr. Bradley to keep him informed of developments. No further correspondence can be traced.

Mr. Bradley also wrote to Jennie Page, NMEC Chief Executive, about the role of the book sector in millennium activities, and included proposals prepared by the Children's Book Group of Publishers Association linked to the theme and content of certain zones in the Dome. Ms Page explained that it was unlikely that the proposals would be taken forward in the precise format outlined, but that they would be fed into the creative process by those in the company with day-to-day editorial control of the relevant zones. Ms Page said that she was interested in exploring the future of books as part of the focus on literacy in the Learning zone and also the function of books as a tool to help us expand our minds in the Mind zone. She said that she would welcome any further views the National Book Committee might have on these issues and asked that they be addressed to the named zone editor who would coordinate NMEC's response. NMEC are unable to trace any further correspondence.

Digital Television

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many households have digital television in (a) the UK and (b) each other EU country. [100047]

Janet Anderson: By the end of September, BSkyB had signed up 1.8 million subscribers and ONdigital had signed up 411,000 subscribers in the UK. Information about the number of UK households which have digital television without subscribing to digital pay-tv services is not available. My Department has no readily available information on the numbers of digital television households in each EU country.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on his plans for securing access to the Internet through digital television. [100136]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 30 November 1999]: As we take forward plans to switch analogue television transmissions over to digital, the Government will consider whether internet access might be guaranteed as part of a core package of services available to all viewers. We are also working with the industry on a public information campaign which will inform consumers about the benefits digital television has to offer; the services available, including internet access, and the equipment they will need.

Sydney Paralympics

Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assistance his Department has provided to paraplegic athletes in their preparations for the Sydney Paralympics in 2000. [99843]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 29 November 1999]: In preparation for the Sydney 2000 Paralympic Games, the British Paralympic Association (BPA) has received a World Class Performance funding total of £455,030. Paralympic athletes—who include paraplegic competitors—will also benefit from the BPA's Core Preparation Programmes funding and should be in receipt of both personal subsistence and core programme capital if their sport has made a successful application for World Class Performance funding.

The funding support to date for each Paralympic sport, which includes paraplegic programmes, is as follows:

Sport	Period of award	Combined performance and subsistence
Athletics	1 May 1998–31 December 1999	2,171,522

CABINET OFFICE

Public Bodies

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many executive agencies and non-departmental public bodies were in existence; what was their total annual running cost; how many employees they had; how many board members they had; and how many were in existence per sponsoring department in each of the last five years. [101066]

Mr. Stringer: The number of executive agencies in existence in each of the last five years is as follows:

Year	Number of agencies as at 31 December
1994	[1]104
1995	[1]111
1996	[1]131
1997	[2]142
1998	[2]142

[1] Figure includes HM Customs and Excise and Inland Revenue which are departments operating fully on Next Steps lines.

[2] Figure includes HM Customs and Excise, Inland Revenue, Crown Prosecution Service and Serious Fraud Office which are departments operating fully on Next Step lines.

The Next Steps Agencies in Government Review 1995 and 1996, and the Next Steps Report 1997 and 1998, provide details of the total annual running cost and the number of employees for each agency. The Next Steps Agencies in Government Review 1994 also provides details of the number of employees for each agency. Details of the total annual running cost for each agency in existence in 1994 is not centrally held. Executive agencies do not have board members.

The number of non-departmental public bodies in existence in each of the last five years is as follows.

Year	Number of NDPBs as at 1 April
1994	1,345
1995	1,227
1996	1,194
1997	1,128
1998	1,073

The Government's annual publication "Public Bodies" for these years provides the relevant details for each body. Copies of these publications are in the Library of the House. "Public Bodies 1999", which is due to be published later this month, will set out the figures for 1999.

The Department is at present implementing resource accounting. Values have been derived from audited accounting information. The first year of published resource accounts will be in respect of 1999–2000.

Executive Agencies

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office which executive agencies were (a) established and (b) abolished in (i) 1998 and (ii) 1999. [100623]

Mr. Stringer: A list of executive agencies which were established and abolished in 1998 and 1999 is set out as follows:

Agencies established in 1998

Debt Management Office

Defence Communication Services Agency

Forest Service

Maritime and Coastguard Agency[1]

Agencies Abolished in 1998

Security Facilities Executive Agency[2]

Agencies Established in 1999

Defence Aviation Repair Agency[3]

Defence Housing Executive

Defence Procurement Agency

Defence Storage and Distribution Agency[4]

Defence Transport and Movements Agency[5]

Agencies Abolished in 1999

Government Property Lawyers[6]

Departmental Estate

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) what his estimate is of the current value of land and property held by the Cabinet Office in (i) Scotland and (ii) in total; [99727]

(2) what his estimate is of the current value of land and property (a) in Scotland and (b) in total held by each of the executive agencies within the responsibility of his Department; and if he will give the total value of assets held by these bodies. [99728]

Mr. Stringer: The total current value of the land and property held by the Cabinet Office, excluding executive agencies, is £69,715,000, none of which is in Scotland.

The current value of assets held by each executive agency within the responsibility of the Minister for the Cabinet Office in the requested categories is given in the table.

Executive agency	Value of assets: Land and property: In Scotland	Value of assets: Land and property: Total	Value of assets: Total assets
Civil Service College	0	8,003,000	9,567,000
Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA)	0	0	1,386,000
Government Car and Despatch Agency (GCDA)	0	0	2,560,000
Property Advisers to the Civil Estate (PACE)	699,000	1,683,000	18,667,000
The Buying Agency (TBA)	0	0	527,000
Central Office of Information (COI)	0	0	1,295,000
Total	699,000	9,686,000	34,002,000
PACE: Surplus land and property on the Civil Estate for disposal	2,200,000	52,699,000	—

[1] The Maritime and Coastguard Agency was launched as a result of the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions merging the Marine Safety Agency and the Coastguard Agency.

[2] On 14 May 1998, the then Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office, Peter Kilfoyle, announced that the Security Facilities Executive Agency was no longer a viable organisation and that it would cease to be an executive agency from 1 July 1998.

[3] Defence Aviation Repair Agency was launched as an agency incorporating the RAF Maintenance Repair Organisation and Naval Aircraft Repair Organisation.

[4] Defence Storage and Distribution Agency was launched as an agency incorporating the majority of the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency.

[5] Defence Transport and Movements Agency was launched as an agency incorporating the Defence Transport and Movements Executive.

[6] Following an evaluation of Government Property Lawyers (GPL) and a Prior Options Study, the Attorney-General concluded that against the background of a declining work load, the business of the GPL Agency had become non-viable and there was no longer a requirement to maintain a central conveyancing function in the public sector.

In addition to those agencies above which were abolished, in 1998 the Historic Royal Palaces Agency changed its status to that of a Non-Departmental Public Body. The Social Security Contributions Agency was incorporated in Inland Revenue in 1999 as an Executive Office (National Insurance Contributions Office).

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Organic Farming

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of whether the additional sum he has allocated for organic conversion will provide for all those farmers who have already begun the investments required for certification. [100792]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 30 November 1999]: Information provided by the organic sector bodies shows that the additional funding will be sufficient to provide for all farmers in England who had applied to them for registration by 4 October when the Organic Farming Scheme (OFS) was suspended. Registration with an organic sector body is a condition of entry to the OFS. A number of farmers who applied for registration after 4 October will also have been able to submit applications for aid.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to promote meat products produced from animals raised to high standards of animal welfare. [100761]

Ms Quin: For species such as pigs, where animals produced in the UK are subject to higher statutory welfare standards, we have been encouraging retailers, caterers and public procurement authorities to source their supplies to British standards. These high welfare standards offer the domestic pig industry a strong marketing advantage. This is recognised by the Meat and Livestock Commission, the body responsible for promoting meat and meat products, which has made welfare an important part of its British Quality Standard for pigmeat scheme.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the enforcement regime for animal welfare legislation for farm animals. [100762]

Mr. Morley: Our approach to enforcement of the law on farm animal welfare is kept under regular review. The recent report on this subject from the Farm Animal Welfare Council and the secondment to MAFF of local authority enforcement officers contribute to this process.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received in the last six months suggesting changes in the legislation on animal welfare for farm animals. [100763]

Mr. Morley: I have received a number of representations in respect of farm animal welfare legislation, in particular in response to consultations on the draft Welfare of Farmed Animals Regulations and on the Welfare of Animals (Transport) Order 1997.

Fishing Sectors

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy on vessels from the Republic of Ireland fishing in the British sector of area VIIa and south west of the Isle of Man. [100728]

Mr. Morley: The rights of vessels from the Republic of Ireland to fish within UK six to twelve mile territorial waters are set out in Annex I of EU Regulation 3760/92.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in respect of vessels from the Republic of Ireland fishing in area VIIa and South West of the Isle of Man, what (i) surveillance and (ii) boardings have been carried out in the last 12 months; what conservation measures must they comply with; to what extent they are obliged to comply with conservation measures introduced by the UK; how many vessels from the Republic of Ireland have licences to fish these waters; and how these licences were acquired. [100729]

Mr. Morley: From January to November 1999, the total number of Republic of Ireland (ROI) vessels sighted in Area VIIa (which includes the water South West of the Isle of Man) was 87. Five boardings were made. These vessels must comply with the relevant EU Technical conservation measures for the area, including, for example, minimum landing sizes. They are not obliged to comply with additional conservation requirements laid down in our domestic legislation. Details of the number of ROI vessels licensed to fish in Area VIIa and the terms on which these licenses were granted are held by the authorities in Dublin.

Floods (Bye Report)

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made by the Environment Agency in respect of its action plan following the Easter 1997 floods and the subsequent report of Sir Peter Bye. [100784]

Mr. Morley: The Environment Agency produced an Action Plan for implementing the recommendations in the Independent Report on the Easter 1998 Floods, chaired by Sir Peter Bye.

The Chairman of the Environment Agency has provided me with a report of progress up to the end of September 1999. Copies have been placed in the House Libraries.

I am pleased to note that the Agency remains on course for completing the substantial work programme set out in the Action Plan to the agreed timetable.

Key developments since the Agency's last report, which covered the period to end of June 1999, are as follows.

Indicative flood plain maps for all watercourses with a catchment greater than 10 square kilometres in England and Wales have been delivered to over 450 local authorities.

Pilot work on flood warning awareness has been analysed and brought together to form the basis of the 1999 public awareness campaign which commenced on 18 October and to which I was pleased to lend my support. The first phase of the campaign focused on raising awareness of flood risk and self help measures to reduce flood damage. Future elements will repeat and reinforce these basic messages and introduce new and additional information to improve public understanding.

The head of the Agency's National Flood Warning Centre has been recruited and the programme is in place for the centre to be operational by the end of the year.

The results of a review of the Agency's internal management have been translated into a project plan which will see the core flood defence roles and responsibilities harmonised across the Agency by the end of December 1999, with full implementation by April 2000.

Work continues in other important areas such as the project to implement the operational changes to the colour coded flood warning messages by September 2000.

The Agency continues to work with local authorities in inspecting and recording the condition of all flood defences. Details of defences owned and/or operated by the Agency and local authorities are being collated. However, one area of uncertainty is the inspection of flood defences owned and/or operated by third parties. The question of how to identify such defences, and the scale of the inspection exercise that will be required, is currently being considered by the Agency in partnership with other operating authorities.

The Agency continues to make good progress in implementing the Easter Floods Report and I will ensure that the House is updated on future progress.

Farmers (Diversification)

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to assist farmers to diversify their businesses. [100275]

Mr. Morley: Funding to encourage a wide range of agricultural activities, including farm diversification, is available in the six areas designated under the English Objective 5b Structural Fund Programmes which are due to close on 31 December 1999. The European Council Rural Development Regulation (1257/1999), which applies from 2000, enables member states to support projects to encourage diversification of agricultural activities, among other things. A decision on the implementation of the Regulation will be made shortly.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with (a) the Treasury and (b) the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions about securing an 80 per cent. discount from climate change levy rates for protected horticulture. [100459]

Ms Quin: We have discussed the potential impact of the levy on protected horticulture with both Departments.

Animal Feed

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evidence he has received as to whether transgenic plant DNA is broken down in commercial processing and treatments in animal feed. [100167]

Ms Quin: Ministry-funded work has confirmed that DNA is degraded during the processing of most animal feed materials. For example, extracting oil from oilseeds caused complete degradation of the DNA in the by-products. This work, and a further current study, has concerned commercially available feed ingredients as an indicator of what would happen to transgenic plant material.

Post Offices

Mr. Webb: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the principal activities of his Department and its agencies which provide business for (a) Crown post offices and (b) other post offices; if he will assess whether the level of business generated in each case is likely to increase or decrease over the next five years; and which new areas of business for post offices are likely to be developed by his Department and its agencies over the same period. [99559]

Mr. Morley: My Department and its agencies do not have activities or services which provide business for post offices, and currently no specific areas of business are foreseen, but the targets for electronic delivery of services (50 per cent. by 2005 and 100 per cent. by 2008) set out in the Modernising Government White Paper represent a real opportunity for additional business for the Post Office network across all public services delivered by central Government.

Beef Exports

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimates his Department has made of the losses incurred by British farmers as a result of French and German import restrictions on British beef since 1 August. [98750]

Ms Quin [holding answer 22 November 1999]: It has not been possible to sell British beef in France or Germany since March 1996, and inevitably it will take time to build up sales when these countries lift their import restrictions. Any estimate of sales lost since 1 August would be entirely speculative.

Brixham Port

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions he has paid a visit to Brixham in South Devon since May 1997; and if he will visit the fishing port before 2000 to discuss with local fishermen their quota problems in Area VII. [100800]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 1 December 1999]: Since 1997, I have had frequent discussions with fishermen, including those from the South West, on a wide range of matters. I shall be visiting Brixham on 6 December 1999.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Farming

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will establish an inter-departmental task force on problems facing the farming industry in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [100057]

Mr. Mandelson: Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Industry and Universities

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what assessment he has made of the correlation between the geographical locations of industry and of universities; [100644]

(2) how many students, normally domiciled in Northern Ireland, are enrolled in full-time first degree university courses; and how many full-time first degree places are available in Northern Ireland. [100660]

Mr. Mandelson: Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Departmental Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Solicitor-General how many research contracts have been let by his Department since May 1997; what is the value of each contract; and in each case whether the contract included (a) a departmental veto over publication of the research results, (b) departmental control over the date of publication of the research results and (c) a requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments. [100154]

The Solicitor-General: The Law Officers' Departments comprising the Treasury Solicitor's Department, the Crown Prosecution Service and the Serious Fraud Office, have let no research contracts since May 1997.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Aid Projects

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the aid projects supported by her Department in (a) Morocco and (b) Ghana, in each of the last five years, indicating those which also received ECGD assistance. [100248]

Clare Short: The following lists all projects undertaken in the last five financial years at costs greater than £1 million.

Morocco: Tetouan Gas Turbines Project—completed

European Aid (Central America)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the (a) nature and (b) destination of the 250 million euros aid voted in the European Council for reconstruction and rehabilitation in Central America. [101109]

Clare Short: Following the European Council's approval of 250 million euros in post-Mitch reconstruction aid for Central America in May 1999, the European Commission developed a programme of reconstruction, which was agreed by member states in November. The programme will provide Honduras (119 million euros), Nicaragua (84 million euros), El Salvador (28.5 million euros) and Guatemala (18.5 million euros) in three areas:

reinstating, improving and extending infrastructure and equipment in the education, public health, environmental sanitation and housing sectors; strengthening educational, public health and sanitation services, including the management capacity of the relevant government institutions, in order to improve efficiency, quality and access, for the most vulnerable sections of the population; strengthening local government and civil society by providing support for the drafting and implementation of rehabilitation and development plans and for the preparation of a framework for risk prevention and to lessen the impact of this type of natural disaster.

Departmental Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many research contracts have been let by her Department since May 1997; what is the value of each contract; and in each case whether the contract included (a) a departmental veto over publication of the research results, (b) departmental control over the date of publication of the research results and (c) a requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments. [100162]

Clare Short: The number of research contracts let since May 1997 is very large, running into hundreds. Recording them and listing the value of each would involve disproportionate cost. The Department for International Development's (DFID) net expenditure on research was estimated at £112 million in 1997–98 and £116 million in 1998–99.

Source:

SET Statistics 1999, published by the Office of Science and Technology

The standard contracts for research projects funded by DFID make no provision for departmental veto over publication, for control over the date of publication. Nor do they contain any requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Portcullis House

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee if he will make it his policy to prohibit the provision of accommodation to civil servants at Portcullis House. [99863]

Sir Sydney Chapman [holding answer 29 November 1999]: In accordance with the Resolution of the House when it approved the brief for the project, Portcullis House will provide office accommodation for 210 hon. Members and for a similar number of their staff. The question of offering any of the space to Government Departments for use by civil servants does not arise.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what categories of persons it is proposed will be allocated accommodation at Portcullis House. [99883]

Sir Sydney Chapman [holding answer 29 November 1999]: The office space in Portcullis House will be occupied by 210 hon. Members and their staff. The only exceptions are two offices to be used by the Clerks Department to provide support services for Select Committees using the adjacent Select Committee rooms, and by the office services and maintenance management staff responsible for the building.

Parliamentary Estate (Expenditure)

Mr. Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, how much has been spent on works within the Parliamentary Estate since 1 May 1997; what further sums are anticipated to be spent; and if he will list the amounts broken down by project, indicating the original estimated budget per project. [100504]

Mr. Kirkwood [holding answer 30 November 1999]: Expenditure against the Works Votes of both Houses including rents, rates, fuel and overheads but excluding Portcullis House has been as follows:

Year	Voted sums	Outturn
1997–98	49,017,000	[1]48,852,000
1998–99	51,013,000	50,002,000
1999–2000 (forecast expenditure)	55,088,000	[2]53,652,000
2000–01 (forecast expenditure)	[3]57,876,000	[3]57,876,000

[1] Excluding legal fees
[2] Forecast
[3] Estimate

These sums covered 510 projects in 1997–98 and 419 projects in 1998–99. The number of projects planned for 1999–2000 is 422. The larger projects during this period were:

Project description	Original estimate	Outturn
Norman Shaw North PDVN Lower Floors	1,150,000	1,180,333
Norman Shaw North PDVN Upper Floors	1,654,600	1,854,600
Refreshment Department Members and Strangers Cafeteria	7,042,800	6,776,428
Refreshment Department Stores and Changing Rooms	9,070,000	8,974,800
Fire Compartmentation 1997–98	1,400,000	1,376,844
Fire Compartmentation 1998–99	1,300,000	1,173,447
Fire Compartmentation 1999–2000	1,250,000	1,250,000
Basement Fire Alarm	2,300,000	2,299,553
PDVN Phase 3 1997–98	5,000,000	5,001,857
PDVN Phase 4 1998–99	5,120,000	5,975,000
PDVN Phase 5 1999–2000	7,000,000	6,625,565
Committee Room Refurbishment Phase I	861,668	872,600
Committee Room Refurbishment Phase II	1,343,000	1,122,339
Royal Gallery Roof Overhaul	4,125,660	3,783,021

For Portcullis House the total expenditure to April 1999 was £149 million. The remaining forecast expenditure and contingency is £86 million, so the project is expected to be completed at least £15 million below budget.

DEFENCE

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what motor mileage allowance rates his Department offers to (a) ministers and (b) civil servants using their own vehicles for official business; and what has been the cost of each in each of the last five years. [98722]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Ministers and MOD civilians are paid the same Motor Mileage Rates if they use their private vehicles for official duty. Reimbursement for motor mileage for official travel in private vehicles is paid at different levels. The higher (Standard) rate is restricted to journeys that would be impracticable by public transport, taking into account the overall cost to the Department. It reflects the full cost of travel by car. The lower (Public Transport) rate is set at a level which reflects the average cost of travel by public transport and is paid for all other official travel by car.

The rates applicable in the current tax year are as follows:

Standard rates of motor mileage allowance

Pence per mile

Car engine capacity	Up to 4,000	Over 4,000
Up to 1000cc	28	17
1001cc-1500cc	35	20
1501cc-2000cc	45	25
2001cc and over	63	36
Public transport rate of motor mileage allowance
All cars		26.5

Details of Motor Mileage Allowance payments to Ministers are not held separately from those paid to MOD civilians and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The total costs of Motor Mileage Allowance claims paid to MOD civilians, including Ministers, are:

Financial year	Actual cost
1994–95	11,500,000
1995–96	12,200,000
1996–97	12,700,000
1997–98	12,100,000
1998–99	11,800,000

Kapton Insulation

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what advice he has received about the safety of Kapton wiring in military aircraft; and what actions he has taken. [100924]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 27 July 1999, Official Report, column 197W.

Gurkhas

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for increasing the number of Gurkhas serving in the UK armed forces. [101334]

Mr. Spellar: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen), on 1 December 1999, Official Report, column 191W.

Depleted Uranium Munitions (Yugoslavia)

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what (a) advice and (b) help is given to civilians in Yugoslavia who might have been exposed to contamination by the radioactive dust left by depleted uranium munitions. [99719]

Mr. Spellar: We are not aware of any civilians in Yugoslavia who might have been exposed to contamination by the radioactive dust left by depleted uranium munitions.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what protection and advice is provided for British ordnance officers engaged in dealing with depleted uranium munitions in Yugoslavia. [99718]

Mr. Spellar: No British personnel are currently engaged in dealing with depleted uranium munitions in Yugoslavia. However, as a precaution, Service personnel are given appropriate guidance during Kosovo pre-deployment training.

Civilian Posts

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many posts have been civilianised in the Directorate of Naval Resources during the last 12 months. [100290]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Arising from the reorganisation of the Central Staff, the Directorate of Naval Resources and Plans was formed on 2 August 1999 comprising elements of the Directorate of Resources and Programmes (Navy), staffed by 17 civilian personnel, and the Directorate of Navy Plans, staffed by 18 military and four civilian personnel. The new Directorate has 20 staff, 11 military and nine civilian personnel overall. One military post was civilianised as the new organisation was formed.

Defence Estates Agency

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many staff are employed at the Defence Estates Agency HQ at Sutton Coldfield. [100289]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The number of Defence Estates staff employed at Sutton Coldfield as of 1 December 1999 is 392, consisting of 162 Head Office staff and 230 Central Business Unit staff.

Project Capital

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the value of work put out to consultants working on Project Capital in each of the last three years. [100285]

Mr. Spellar: PricewaterhouseCoopers were appointed the Project Capital Accounting System Integrators in 1996. As such, they act as project managers, systems developers, implementers and advisers.

Total payments made on these activities over the last three years were as follows:

1996–97	10,725,000
1997–98	28,242,000
1998–99	40,279,000

Income Support

Mr. Trend: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence under what circumstances service men in HM forces may receive Income Support. [100336]

Mr. Spellar: Service personnel are eligible to receive social security benefits paid by the DSS on the same basis as civilians. It is, however, unlikely that any service personnel would be eligible for Income Support, given the qualifying criterion requiring a claimant to be working for less than 16 hours per week.

Type-45 Destroyers

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the first vessel of the Type-45 destroyer programme will be delivered; and when he expects the last one to be completed. [100757]

Mr. Kilfoyle: On current plans, the first Type-45 destroyer will enter into service with the Royal Navy in 2007 and we expect that the last will enter service in 2014.

Kosovo

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many, and what kind of, strike aircraft were redirected from combat air patrols to offensive operations as a result of the deployment of the HMS Invincible Task Group to the Kosovo theatre of operations. [98564]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 30 November 1999]: The Sea Harriers based aboard HMS Invincible conducted 102 combat air patrols. As a result, it was possible for multi-role aircraft which might otherwise have been tasked with such duties to be switched to alternative missions. Given the size and complexity of the operation, however, it is not possible to quantify precisely how many aircraft and planned missions were directly affected in this way.

St. Malo Declaration

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the discussions taking place, and the countries concerned, regarding the St. Malo declaration. [100835]

Mr. Hoon: At St. Malo in December 1998, the UK and France launched a major initiative aimed at building European security and defence. In conjunction with the member states of the European Union, NATO and the Western European Union, we are continuing to make good progress both in defining the improvements in capabilities needed and the necessary consultation and decision-making arrangements for responding to crises. The UK and France made a joint declaration on 25 November calling for a further decisive step to be taken at the Helsinki European Council on 10–11 December.

RAF Menwith Hill

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when a minister from his Department last visited RAF Menwith Hill. [101132]

Mr. Spellar: Since 1 May 1997, no Minister of this Department has visited RAF Menwith Hill.

Common Foreign and Security Policy

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures are under way through the Common Foreign and Security Policy consequential to the Cologne Summit to (a) modify and (b) unify European capabilities in (i) intelligence, (ii) strategic transport, (iii) command and control and (iv) defence industries; and if he will make a statement. [100999]

Mr. Hoon: We are committed to strengthening Europe's military capabilities such that European nations are able to assemble, deploy rapidly and sustain the right mix of armed forces for specific NATO or EU-led operations.

We believe that European nations, co-operating together, should be able to undertake the most demanding crisis management operations up to Corps level. At the UK/French Summit in November 1999, we called on European member states to commit themselves to this goal at the Helsinki European Council. Additionally, we called for capability goals to be set and established in the fields of command and control, intelligence and strategic lift, and announced some bilateral measures to enhance our capabilities in these areas.

We also reaffirmed our conviction that strengthened European defence capabilities need to be supported by a strong and competitive European defence industry and technology.

Further discussions on these issues will be held by the EU Heads of State and Government at the European Council in Helsinki on 10–11 December.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future membership and remit of the (a) political and security and (b) military committees, established at the Cologne summit. [101001]

Mr. Hoon: At the Cologne European Council, Heads of State and Government approved a report by the German Presidency which noted that, to support defence decision making, the EU might require a Political and Security Committee and a Military Committee.

The membership and role of these bodies will be discussed by the EU Heads of State and Government at the European Council in Helsinki on 10–11 December.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the establishment of an EU (i) situation centre, (ii) satellite centre and (iii) Institute for Security Studies, with reference to (a) function, (b) budget and (c) security clearance rating. [101002]

Mr. Hoon: At the Cologne European Council, Heads of State and Government approved a report by the German Presidency which noted that, to support defence decision making, the EU might require a situation centre, a satellite centre and an Institute for Security Studies.

Such bodies already exist under the auspices of the WEU. The future of these bodies, and of the relationship between the WEU and EU, will be further discussed by the EU Heads of State and Government at the European Council in Helsinki, on 10–11 December, and over the coming months.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the development of a central intelligence and analysis agency for the EU consequential to the Cologne Summit. [101105]

Mr. Hoon: We are committed to strengthening Europe's military capabilities so that European nations are able to assemble, deploy rapidly and sustain the right mix of armed forces for specific NATO or EU-led operations.

The EU must be able to draw on intelligence and analysis capabilities in order to undertake a crisis management operation. We are discussing with our Allies and Partners, both in NATO and in the European Union, the best way of achieving this.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the appropriate decision-making bodies referred to in section 2 of the Cologne Presidency report on Strengthening of the Common Foreign and Security Policy. [101000]

Mr. Hoon: The decision-making bodies referred to in section 2 of the Cologne Presidency Report are detailed in section 3 of the same Report.

EU Rapid Reaction Force

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which countries have agreed to contribute to the European Union Rapid Reaction Force; and what each nation will make available in terms of (a) personnel, (b) logistics, (c) ships, (d) aircraft, (e) artillery, (f) main battle tanks, (g) other armoured vehicles and (h) intelligence and surveillance capability. [101101]

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the UK units for tagged service within an EU framework, consequential to the Cologne Summit. [101104]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 2 December 1999]: At the recent UK/French Summit, we called on EU member states to commit themselves to being able to undertake, co-operating together, crisis management operations up to Corps level. In particular, this will mean developing the capabilities of existing national forces, from which such a deployment could be drawn case-by-case for specific NATO or EU operations. We are not creating a standing European Rapid Reaction Force.

This proposal will be discussed by EU Heads of State and Government at the European Council in Helsinki on 10–11 December. EU member states have not identified any national contributions that might be made available for EU-led operations if they agree this aim.

HMS Ocean

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what problems have been identified with the cooking facilities and supply of hot water on HMS Ocean. [100879]

Mr. Spellar: No significant problems have been identified with the cooking facilities or supply of hot water on HMS Ocean.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects HMS Ocean to be in full working order; and if he will make a statement. [100878]

Mr. Spellar: HMS Ocean has been in operational service since 12 March 1999. While the ship has experienced some equipment difficulties, this is not unexpected in the early period of operational life. The Department, the shipbuilder and the equipment manufacturers are working together to improve reliability. This ship has met her busy operational programme.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of repairs and alterations to HMS Ocean carried out since she was handed over to his Department. [100880]

Mr. Spellar: This information is not readily available and I will write to the hon. Member. A copy of my reply will be placed in the Library of the House.

Naval Training Establishments

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has for the future of (a) HMS Collingwood, (b) HMS Centurion, (c) HMS Dryad and (d) HMS Sultan; and if he will make a statement. [100876]

Mr. Spellar: My Department has no plans which might affect HMS Collingwood, HMS Dryad, HMS Sultan and the Centurion site in the immediate future. With specific regard to Collingwood, Dryad and Sultan, these Naval training establishments form part of the Naval Recruiting and Training Agency, whose Chief Executive is under a constant remit to review his estate usage to ensure efficiency targets are achieved. Accordingly, the Chief Executive has commissioned an internal strategic review to develop a number of innovative, imaginative, and far reaching options for the future of naval training and to propose the size and shape of the Agency for the future. In Portsmouth, HMS Collingwood, HMS Sultan, HMS Dryad and HMS Excellent are all being considered as part of this review.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much money has been spent in each of the last three years on (a) HMS Collingwood, (b) HMS Centurion, (c) HMS Dryad and (d) HMS Sultan; and if he will make a statement. [100877]

Mr. Spellar: The amount of money spent on HMS Dryad, HMS Collingwood and HMS Sultan over the last three years is as follows:

£ million

	Financial Year 1996–97	Financial Year 1997–98	Financial Year 1998–99
HMS Collingwood	27.395	27.472	26.978
HMS Dryad	23.402	22.255	23.632
HMS Sultan	40.350	35.404	36.460

These figures are the final cash outturn figures and include the cost of maintaining the buildings and equipment, major capital works (detailed separately), Service manpower costs and civilian manpower costs.

The following sums were spent on major capital works:

£ million

	Financial Year 1996–97	Financial Year 1997–98	Financial Year 1998–99
HMS Collingwood	0.183	0.614	1.235
HMS Dryad	1.063	0.578	0.581
HMS Sultan	2.259	0.448	0.122

Centurion Building was transferred under a full repairing and insuring lease on 1 January 1998 to Electronic Data Systems (EDS) Defence Limited, as part of a PFI contract. The MOD has not incurred any direct costs arising from maintenance or alterations to this building since that time.

TAVR (Solihull)

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will report progress on the securing of new premises for the sea, army and air cadets who parade at the TAVR centre in Haslucks Green Road in Shirley, Solihull. [101062]

Mr. Spellar: An alternative site nearby has been identified for the Army Cadet Force, Air Training Corps and Sea Cadet Corps detachments currently based at the Territorial Army Centre, Haslucks Green Road, Shirley. A joint facility will be constructed on this site for the Army Cadet Force and the Air Training Corps and a separate facility on the same site will be constructed for the Sea Cadet Corps. It is hoped that the new accommodation for the cadets will be completed by April 2001, and I can confirm that all three units will continue to parade at their present location until then. The Secretary of the West Midlands Reserve Forces and Cadets Association will continue to keep the hon. Member informed of progress on this matter.

RAF Chinook Crash

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the continuing involvement of the Air Accident Investigation Branch in the 1994 RAF Chinook crash on the Mull of Kintyre. [101195]

Mr. Spellar: The Air Accidents Investigation Branch are available for consultation by my officials as the need arises.

Air-to-air Missile Contract

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a statement on the contract for the Beyond Visual Range Air-to-air Missile; [101331]

(2) what account he has taken of the use and sales abroad of the Eurofighter in determining his decision on supplying the contract for the Beyond Visual Range Air-to-air Missile. [101332]

Mr. Hoon: We are currently evaluating the Best and Final Offers we have received in response to the BVRAAM competition. The evaluation will take fully into account the implications for potential sales of Eurofighter of the different proposals received, together with all other relevant factors such as missile performance, cost, industrial impact and overall value for money.

US Army Chinook

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library reports he has received from the United States authorities relating to the US Army Chinook CH-47 barrel roll incident in 1998. [101400]

Mr. Spellar: No. The information that we received from the US Army Authorities about the incident was provided in confidence. I am therefore withholding it under Exemption 1c (information received in confidence from foreign governments) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Salisbury Plain

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he or his officials have had with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport about the extension of the Stonehenge World Heritage Site boundaries into the Salisbury Plain training area, including Robin Hood's Ball. [101399]

Mr. Kilfoyle: My officials have not had direct discussions with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport (DCMS) on the proposed extension of the World Heritage Site (WHS). However members of Defence Estate, Land Command and DCMS staff sit on various working groups run by English Heritage connected with the Stonehenge World Heritage Site (WHS) Management and Master Plans. A number of these groups have considered the boundaries of the World Heritage Site.

HMS Glasgow

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how long HMS Glasgow will continue with its current deployment as part of the UN mission in East Timor; [101297]

(2) what role HMS Glasgow and her crew have played in the humanitarian effort in East Timor. [101296]

Mr. Hoon: HMS Glasgow sailed to East Timor on 18 September as part of the combined Task Group, and carried-out escort duties in the initial stages of the INTERFET deployment. She landed a working party to assist the Gurkhas with humanitarian aid tasks on 25 September. The ship's medical company also came ashore to assist in the setting up of a clinic. HMS Glasgow left East Timor on 30 September, and arrived home in Portsmouth on 10 November.

MOD Police

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the average number of sickness hours, per officer, per month, among MOD police as a whole in each of the last 12 months. [101639]

Mr. Spellar: The average number of sickness hours per Ministry of Defence police per officer per month is shown in the following table:

Month	Hours
November 1998	10.1
December 1998	9.8
January 1999	10.4
February 1999	9.6
March 1999	10.1
April 1999	8.6
May 1999	8.5
June 1999	9.7
July 1999	10.0
August 1999	10.0
September 1999	10.2
October 1999	10.8

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the average length of employment at AWE Aldermaston of MOD police officers whose service there ended in the last five years. [101640]

Mr. Spellar: This information is held in files that have been archived and so I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House when it is available.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of MOD police at Aldermaston left their job (a) by retirement with immediate pension rights, (b) voluntarily, but without immediate pension rights and (c) compulsorily during (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [101641]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is shown in the table:

	1997	1998	1999
Percentage of officers that left their job with immediate pension rights	2.97	3.56	3.38
Percentage of officers that left their job voluntarily but without immediate pension rights	0	1.98	1.35
Percentage of officers that left compulsorily	0	0	0

The figures do not include officers that were posted away from AWE Aldermaston to other MOD police stations.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Meat Hygiene Service

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the level of Meat Hygiene Service charges. [101638]

Mr. Nick Brown: On 1 December, the Government announced that Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) hygiene inspection charges for the whole of 1999–2000 would be held at the levels set for 1998–99. This will result in a saving to the meat industry of some £7 million in charges in 1999–2000. The Government have also given a commitment that the rates of MHS hygiene inspection charges in 2000–02 should not rise by more than the level of inflation above the levels charged in 1999–2000.

This will bring benefits across the livestock industry and demonstrates the Government's commitment to helping the sector through its present difficulties.

Departmental Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many research contracts have been let by his Department since May 1997; what is the value of each contract; and in each case whether the contract included (a) a departmental veto over publication of the research results, (b) departmental control over the date of publication of the research results and (c) a requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments. [100148]

Ms Quin: The number of research projects placed since May 1997 is 1,317. The total value of these projects is approximately £254 million. Detailed information is being placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Written agreements, contracts or memoranda of understanding cover all projects. The Department's policy is to encourage its contractors to make the results of research available to the public, to industry, and the wider research community, including through peer-reviewed scientific papers and a range of other routes. The Ministry's approach is that information should be released, save where disclosure would not be in the public interest. We publish details of MAFF-sponsored R & D projects on our website (www.maff.gov.uk) and copies of scientific reports are normally available on request. Overall policy on the release of Government information is set out in the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. There is no requirement that contractors incorporate departmental amendments to their research results though final reports are sometimes discussed with contractors as necessary.

BSE

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of BSE have been confirmed in each of the last 12 months (a) in each of the Government office regions and (b) in total. [99845]

Ms Quin: The following table gives figures for confirmed BSE cases by month of confirmation for the last 12 months for the State Veterinary Service (SVS) regions in England together with the regional totals. For Scotland and Wales, figures are given to the end of June 1999. From 1 July 1999, provision of figures for those countries became the responsibility of the devolved administrations, so no further details or totals can be supplied.

The total number of BSE cases confirmed in Great Britain for the year ended 31 October 1999 was 3,274.

It must be noted that expressing cases by month of confirmation does not reflect the occurrence of disease at that particular time. The interval between slaughter of the suspect and confirmation of the disease may be six to eight weeks for routine cases, but could be considerably longer in cases where additional tests or further on-farm investigations are requested.

The high number of confirmed cases in the first five months of 1999 is a consequence of accelerated diagnosis in order to provide material for an EU research project. Many of these would have been confirmed in April or May under normal procedures.

Number of BSE cases confirmed in each region by month of confirmation from November 1998 to October 1999

Meat Labelling

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make representations to the European Commission calling for French and Belgian beef imports to be labelled with the country of origin as a guide to consumers. [99753]

Ms Quin: The European Commission has recently put forward proposals for an EU scheme for compulsory origin labelling of beef. These are under discussion with European partners. In principle, compulsory labelling of beef will benefit consumers but will have a cost implication for the supply chain. The Government will consider the UK position on the proposals in the light of negotiations, but in principle we see advantages in labelling.

GM Varieties

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what plans he has to use his powers to revoke any national list entries in respect of GM varieties as a result of the farm-scale GM evaluations; [99986]

(2) what estimate he has made of the compensatory payments to which maintainers of GM varieties on the national list may be entitled upon revocation of their listing after farm-scale evaluations. [99987]

Ms Quin: There are no genetically modified plant varieties on the UK National List at present, so the questions do not arise.

Food Surpluses

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the level of food surpluses in storage in each member state of the European Union, broken down by country and quantity involved. [100836]

Ms Quin: The latest figures where available, for intervention stocks for each member state, are broken down as follows (figures quoted in tonnes unless otherwise stated):

	Cereals 21.11.1999	Beef 31.7.1999	SMP 25.11.1999	Butter 25.11.1999	Olive Oil 11.10.1999	Wine (hectolitres) 31.10.1999

French Turkeys

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if a Government health warning will be issued on the risk of E. Coli and salmonella poisoning from eating French turkeys without adequate precautions. [101078]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The risk of food poisoning from poultry can be avoided by observing the simple rules of food hygiene, in accordance with on-going Government advice. We have no evidence to indicate that turkeys from France pose any greater risk than turkeys from elsewhere.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what quantity of turkey meat has been imported from France in each of the past three years; and what is the estimate for 1999. [101075]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 2 December 1999]: Official Overseas Trade Statistics show that UK imports of turkey carcase meat, offal and meat and offal preparations from France during 1996–98 and January to August 1999 were as shown in the table.

[1] January-August

It is not possible to make an accurate forecast of 1999 imports, since the September to December period accounts for a major, but not constant, proportion of annual imports (over 60 per cent. in 1998). However, overall turkey imports from France during January to August 1999 were nearly 5 per cent. higher than for the same period in 1998.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what checks are made on the welfare standards of turkeys imported from France. [101077]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 2 December 1999]: It is for the French authorities to check the welfare standards under which turkeys are reared in France against any relevant standards set by French law. The welfare of turkeys and all animals during transport is protected by the requirements of Council Directive 91/628/EEC as amended by Council Directive 95/29/EEC. This Directive is implemented in Great Britain by the Welfare of Animals (Transport) Order 1997 and enforced by local authorities.

Pig Farmers

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with the EU on measures to offer price or income support to British pig farmers. [101068]

Ms Quin [holding answer 2 December 1999]: None, as direct payments and similar supports to producers are not part of the CAP pigmeat regime. However, we have pressed the European Commission to reopen the aids to private storage of pigmeat scheme and to reinstate special refunds on exports of fresh and frozen pig carcases and cuts to Russia. Officials in the Department have also discussed with the European Commission the costs faced by British pig producers because of BSE and the possibility of introducing a pig offal disposal scheme.

Zinc Bacitracin

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his assessment of the effect of the suspension of the use of zinc bacitracin in animal feed on the incidence of necrotic enteritis and choloangiohepatitis in poultry. [98445]

Ms Quin: There are three authorised antimicrobial growth promoters still available for use in poultry production, with similar effects on the gut flora of poultry to that of bacitracin. Necrotic enteritis and choloangiohepatitis are not notifiable diseases and therefore statistics on their incidence cannot be provided.

Farm-based Tourism

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what studies he has (a) initiated and (b) received concerning the obstacles to developing farm-based tourism; what action he is taking as a result of these studies; and what funds are available to him to support such action. [100271]

Mr. Morley: No such studies have been initiated by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The Government's Tourism Strategy "Tomorrow's Tourism", launched earlier this year, recognises tourism's role in maintaining the viability of farm businesses. The European Council Rural Development Regulation (1257/1999), which applies from 2000, enables member states to support projects to encourage tourist and craft activities, among other things. A decision on the implementation of the Regulation will be made shortly. Schemes to provide advice and support for those farmers contemplating farm-based tourism have been supported through Objective 5b Schemes. These close at the end of the year.

PRIME MINISTER

Minister for Youth

Mr. Wood: To ask the Prime Minister if the Government will appoint a Minister for Youth. [99468]

The Prime Minister: While I keep ministerial responsibilities under regular review, I have no current plans to do so. Ministers in several Departments have responsibilities in this area, and work together on cross-departmental policies for young people.

Royal Gifts

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the gifts received by Her Majesty the Queen and registered as Government property since 1969. [100327]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 30 November 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 23 January 1998, Official Report, column 722W.

Representation of the People Bill

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Prime Minister if the Home Office has been given an exemption from his instruction to all Departments to undertake and publish a regulatory impact study of the financial and other effects of all proposed Government legislation, with particular reference to the Representation of the People Bill. [100676]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 30 November 1999]: No. A regulatory impact statement relating to the Representation of the People Bill was placed in the Library on 18 November to coincide with the Bill's introduction.

Gold Reserves

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 24 November 1999, Official Report, columns 613–14, who gave the advice to him and to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to which he referred and which led them to instruct the Bank of England to sell more than half of Britain's gold reserves. [100523]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 30 November 1999]: The Bank of England provided technical advice on the portfolio risks associated with gold and other assets, and the various techniques for selling gold.

Cologne Council

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the exchanges held with the President of the European Parliament at the Cologne Council. [101018]

The Prime Minister: The then President of the European Parliament, Jose Maria Gil-Robles, addressed the first session of the Cologne European Council, setting out the European Parliament's views on the main issues for discussion.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the form of changes required in work organisation and working time for the creation of jobs, as stated in section 10 of the Presidency Conclusions of the Cologne Summit. [101022]

The Prime Minister: The Presidency Conclusions of the Cologne European Council

> "invited the Commission and the member states to examine whether and how to . . . make changes in work organisation and working time help generate new jobs", as well as examining other areas. The Finnish Presidency held a conference on working time and work organisation in Helsinki on 11–12 October.

The Government believe that companies themselves are best placed to achieve changes in the organisation of work within the framework of minimum standards established by Government. The Government support fair minimum standards on working time, but we do not believe that there is a fixed amount of work in the economy and, therefore, do not consider that reducing working time for individuals will increase employment as a whole.

The Government are promoting a family friendly employment rights agenda which will help both women and men to combine work with family commitments. In turn, this will help employers to attract a diverse range of people who can fit the different working patterns required for the modern economy.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister when the European Council will release to the public, pursuant to section 36 of the Cologne Presidency Conclusions, a report on global year 2000 preventative measures. [101014]

The Prime Minister: As a result of the Cologne European Council the European Commission set up a High Level Working Group to look at cross border Y2K issues. The group has met regularly and has discussed a wide range of issues. The Commission issued a report on 26 November (COM 1999 639 final), a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Qualified Majority Voting

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister in connection (1) with what areas the Government expects extension of qualified majority voting will be raised during the forthcoming intergovernmental conference; and what is his Government's policy thereon; [101024]

(2) in what areas the Government support an extension of qualified majority voting at the forthcoming intergovernmental conference. [101025]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 9 November 1999, Official Report, column 486W.

European Employment Pact

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister what measures are planned under the three pillars of the European Employment Pact; if Parliament will be consulted; and what budget lines and finances will be available. [101019]

The Prime Minister: The European Employment Pact agreed at the Cologne European Council on 3–4 June 1999 brought together three processes. Two of these were the existing Luxembourg employment process and the Cardiff economic reform process. The third, new element was the macro-economic dialogue, termed the "Cologne process". The dialogue takes place biannually among social partners and fiscal and employment policy makers from existing institutions and considers the interaction between economic and employment policies.

All elements of the Pact are subject to the usual Parliamentary Scrutiny procedures. The Pact is an amalgam of three processes and therefore there are no new budget lines.

"Youth and Europe—Our Future"

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister what is his Government's policy towards developing EU action, pursuant to the memorandum, "Youth and Europe—Our Future"; and what type of projects are envisaged. [101020]

The Prime Minister: The memorandum "Youth and Europe—Our Future" was produced during the German Presidency of the Council of Ministers. It described a number of measures which, in the Presidency's view, would contribute to increasing the employability of young people in Europe. The Government welcomed this initiative and would consider on their merits any proposals for EU action that the European Commission or members states might put forward.

Downing Street Discussions

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the names of those present at the discussions at No. 10 Downing street on the evening of 21 October 1997. [101207]

The Prime Minister: As with previous Governments, it is not my practice to provide details of private meetings.

Joint Cabinet Consultative Committee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister what was the cost of servicing the Joint Cabinet Consultative Committee in the last year for which figures are available. [101211]

The Prime Minister: No separate costs for the servicing of the Joint Consultative Committee are identified.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister what rules of confidentiality apply to non-ministerial members of the Joint Cabinet Consultative Committee concerning discussions in that forum. [101213]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 20 January 1999, Official Report, column 485W.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister who sits on the Joint Cabinet Consultative Committee. [101210]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke) on 21 October 1998, Official Report, columns 1123–35W.

EU Commissioners

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the timetable for the handover of Commissioner portfolios from the temporary incumbents. [101017]

The Prime Minister: The new Commission was sworn in on 17 September.

Social Exclusion Unit

Ms Squire: To ask the Prime Minister if he has received the review of the Social Exclusion Unit; and if he will make a statement. [101681]

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Prime Minister what reviews have taken place of the work of the Social Exclusion unit since its inception; and what decisions have been taken on the long-term future of the unit. [100696]

The Prime Minister: I established the Social Exclusion Unit (SEU) in December 1997. Its remit is to help improve Government action to reduce social exclusion by producing "joined up solutions to joined up problems".

Most of its work is on specific projects, chosen by me following consultation with other Ministers and suggestions from interested groups.

Since its inception, the unit has focused on the following priorities: truancy and school exclusion, rough sleeping, poor neighbourhoods, teenage pregnancy and 16–18-year-olds not in employment, education or training. The unit has reported to me on each, with a full analysis of the problem and concrete recommendations for action, all of which I have accepted. These are now Government policy and are being implemented.

I announced in December 1998 that, as the unit was set up on a time-limited basis, its success would be reviewed in the summer 1999, and a decision announced about its longer term future and work programme.

During the summer, this review was undertaken by KPMG, working with members of the SEU. The review took evidence and opinions in writing and face to face with a large number of individuals and organisations with an interest in the work of the unit. The review has now reported to me and the full review report will be published to coincide with this announcement.

The consultation showed that there is overwhelming support for the continued existence of the SEU, and a widespread belief that it has been a success in terms of operation and its effect on wider Government policy, although it is too early to judge the impact of the SEU on the ground.

In particular, the quality of the unit's reports was considered exceptional and its working practices, with a mix of civil service and external staff, was seen as a strength. The approach could be used more widely across the whole of Government. It is also clear that the unit's work has done much to raise the profile of social exclusion as a policy issue within and outside Government.

It is clear from both from the quality of the unit's work and its impact so far that there is a role for it to play for some years to come. I have therefore decided that it will continue in existence, and be reviewed again at the end of 2002.

In the short term, I have set the unit the following new priorities as a result of this review. They are:

to complete the current programme of work to develop the national strategy for neighbourhood renewal, including oversight of the work of the 18 policy action teams. The unit will be closely involved in establishing the arrangements for implementation of the strategy after it is announced in the summer of 2000;

to work closely with HM Treasury and other Government Departments to ensure that the 2000 spending review reflects the priority the Government gives to tackling poverty and social exclusion; and to bolster the arrangements for monitoring implementation of past reports. I have asked the Minister for the Cabinet Office to chair the Ministerial Network on Social Exclusion, which will be given a new remit to chase progress across Government on implementation of past SEU reports, as well as acting as an informal sounding board for the unit's future work programme. I have also expanded the Network's membership to enable it to meet this new remit.

The membership of the Ministerial Network is:

Mo Mowlam (chair), Cabinet Office

Wendy Alexander MSP, The Scottish Executive, Development Department

Hilary Armstrong, Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions

Paul Boateng, Home Office

Yvette Cooper, Department of Health

Lord Falconer, Cabinet Office

Patricia Hewitt, Department of Trade and Industry

Kate Hoey, Department for Culture, Media and Sport

Jane Hutt AM, National Assembly for Wales, Health and Social Services

Estelle Morris, Department for Education and Employment

Jeff Rooker, Department of Social Security

Andrew Smith, HM Treasury

Baroness Blackstone, Department for Education and Employment

Arrangements for Network representation from Northern Ireland will be announced shortly.

I will announce a new work programme for the unit in the summer of 2000, once it has finished its current project to develop the national strategy for neighbourhood renewal.

The full review report will be placed in the Library and on the SEU website.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Restraining Equipment

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department takes the United Nations' Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners into account before granting export licences for oversize cuffs, jumbo cuffs and other restraining equipment. [98542]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 22 November 1999]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) on 23 November 1999, Official Report, columns 84–85W.

Inward Investment

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total number of jobs (a) created and (b) safeguarded by inward investment projects in the areas covered by each of the Government Offices for the Regions in each year since 1996. [100463]

Mr. Caborn: The figures in the table are based on information provided by companies at the time of the announcement of the decision to invest in the UK. They are based on the companies' best estimate, at that time, of the number of jobs to be created/safeguarded by the investment in its first three years.

There is no requirement to notify the Department and so the figures include only those projects where the Department's Invest in Britain Bureau, the relevant Regional Development Agency in England or the Government Office were involved or which have come to their notice.

Government Offices for the Regions

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people are employed at each of the Government Offices for the Regions; and what are their annual administration costs. [100465]

Mr. Caborn: The number of staff in post in each Government Office at 1 November 1999 and their administrative costs for the 1998–99 financial year are as follows:

	Staff	Administrative costs (£000)
South East	245	8,561
South West	213	6,985
London	378	13,238
North East	254	8,619

Post Offices

Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many post offices were closed or relocated in (a) the Vale of Glamorgan and (b) Wales in (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [100475]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand from the Post Office that the numbers of post offices closed or relocated in Wales since 1997 are as follows:

	Closed	Relocated
1997	23	12
1998	27	8
1999 to date	24	1

The Post Office tell me that they do not hold such information on a Parliamentary constituency basis.

Arms Exports

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimates have been made of the financial costs to Her Majesty's Government of promoting or providing financial cover for arms exports for the current financial year. [100581]

Mr. Caborn: No specific estimate is made for defence claims however £400.8 million is included in our published estimates this financial year to cover all claims payments.

All claims are recoverable. Authorised claims during the financial year to end September 1999 amount to £128.7 million of which £59.9 million are defence related.

Small Business Service

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by how much the resources of the Small Business Service will be reduced as a result of his decision not to establish a payroll service as an integral part of the Small Business Service. [100739]

Ms Hewitt: The level of resources for the Small Business Service will be considered over the next few months.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the advice given to the Small Businesses Service on how to enhance co-operative forms and businesses and small enterprise. [101070]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 2 December 1999]: There is no separate advice specifically for co-operatives. The Small Business Service, through the network of Business Link franchises, will provide advice and business support services to help all types of small and medium-sized enterprises.

WTO (China)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his policy towards the accession of China to the WTO, indicating the role accorded to human rights issues. [101107]

Mr. Caborn: The Government will continue to support the European Commission's efforts to negotiate an agreement with China regarding the terms of its accession to the World Trade Organisation. We will be seeking to ensure that the Commission's approach to that negotiation continues to take into account the interests in the Chinese market of UK exporters and investors, both actual and potential, and maintains the integrity of the WTO as a multilateral system of rules agreed by and equally applicable to all members.

The Government believe that a more liberal approach to international trade and membership of the World Trade Organisation will bring benefits to, and improve living standards in, the Chinese economy and that social, environmental and political improvements in China will follow as a result. The Government fully support China's accession on the terms outlined above and looks forward to her becoming a WTO member in the near future.

EU-US Trade Relations

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the form of the early warning system for the resolution of disputes under the Transatlantic Dialogue, referred to in section 84 of the Cologne Conclusions; and which institutions are involved in that dialogue. [101108]

Mr. Caborn: A joint statement on an early warning mechanism was agreed at the EU/US Summit in Bonn on 21 June 1999. Both sides underlined the need to identify, provide early warning of, and facilitate the resolution of, potential bilateral EU/US disputes. Any side may raise with the other any issue that might have an impact on EU/US relations. The two principal groups in which this dialogue and exchange of information takes place are the Transatlantic Economic Partnership Steering Group and the New Transatlantic Agenda Task Force. Co-ordinating this work, the Senior Level Group of officials reviews early-warning items in preparation for the six-monthly EU/US Summits. The Transatlantic Legislators' Business, Consumer, Environment and Labour Dialogues have also been invited to contribute to the process by identifying problems and offering proposals for resolution.

ECGD

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of ECGD cover was made available to (a) the aerospace industry, (b) sales of military aircraft, (c) sales of defence-related equipment and (d) civil aircraft sales, in each of the last five years. [100509]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 1 December 1999]: The table lists by financial year the percentage of ECGD cover made available for each of the sectors requested.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was (a) the value of receipts to and (b) the value of payments from the ECGD in connection with aerospace projects for businesses receiving ECGD cover, in each of the last five financial years. [100508]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 1 December 1999]: The information requested is available only since 1996. The details are as follows:

£ million

Year	(a)	(b)
1996–97	26.9	10.8
1997–98	58.8	4.5
1998–99	38.0	23.1
1999–2000 to 30 September	12.3	55.5

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the value to the UK economy of the work of the ECGD over the last 10 years. [100510]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 1 December 1999]: No formal estimate of the value to the UK economy of ECGD's activities has been made in the last 10 years. However, since the privatisation of ECGD's short term business operations in 1991, the Department has facilitated approximately £30 billion of capital goods and project exports for UK exporters.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to publish the ECGD's Annual Report and Trading Accounts for 1998–99. [101474]

Mr. Byers: The Report and Accounts were laid before the House this morning. I am pleased to say that they demonstrate once more that British exporters, with Government support, have been successful in winning valuable overseas orders, despite 1998–99 being a difficult period for the global economy. Furthermore, they show that ECGD's finances are in a very healthy position, which must be good news for their ability to support further business while protecting the interests of the taxpayer.

Postage Rates (SMEs)

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the costs to small and medium-sized business enterprises trading in Europe of the increase in letter postage rates from the United Kingdom to Europe over the last six months. [101189]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Changes to postage tariffs are primarily a matter for the Post Office in consultation with the Post Office Users' National Council (POUNC) to whom the Post Office is statutorily required to refer major proposals for comment. The proposals are formally notified to my Department at the same time as they are referred to POUNC. The increase was prompted by increasing handling costs and is in line with the agreement, set out in the European Postal Services Directive, that prices should be geared to costs. It is still one of the cheapest rates in Europe.

Internet Shopping

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact on small businesses of fraudulent Internet transactions. [101323]

Ms Hewitt: Encouraging small businesses to use the Internet is a key part of the Government's commitment to making the UK the best place for e-commerce by 2002. We will monitor closely issues such as Internet fraud which may affect them.

The Government are working with the industry and consumers groups, in consultation with the OFT to develop a new body called TrustUK to accredit e-commerce codes and a "hallmark" that accredited codes may use on their websites. TrustUK will be operational by early next year.

The Electronic Communications Bill promotes high quality cryptography services which will allow people to have more confidence about whom they are dealing with on the Internet and to protect the confidentiality of data (e.g. payment details). The Government welcome the proposals by the Alliance for Electronic Business to meet the objectives of Part I of the Bill and ensure the appropriate standards for such services through accreditation under its T-scheme.

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advice his Department has issued to consumers regarding security of financial details when shopping on the Internet. [101324]

Ms Hewitt: The Department has published general advice on its website (http://www2.dti.gov.uk/cacp/ca/supply2.htm) about the precautions consumers should take when they shop on-line. This includes checking that businesses offer secure payment facilities.

DTI's Consumer Gateway (http://www.consumer.gov.uk) provides links to a range of consumer websites, including ones such as that run by the Office of Fair Trading, which offer detailed advice about shopping electronically.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies have been reported to his Department for attempting to evade the national minimum wage. [101300]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Over 3,400 complaints of non-compliance have been received to date by the National Minimum Wage Helpline.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to uprate the national minimum wage annually; and if he will make a statement. [101480]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I have no plans to uprate the national minimum wage annually. As with its introduction, any changes to the minimum wage rates will be made sensibly and taking account of the economic circumstances prevailing at the time.

SCOTLAND

Maintained Schools

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was spent per pupil in maintained schools in Scotland in each year for each of the last 20 years. [98578]

Dr. Reid: The available information is given in the table. Education in Scotland is now a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Net current expenditure per pupil in local authority schools

Year	Expenditure per pupil
1979–80	649
1980–81	838
1981–82	974
1982–83	1,069
1983–84	1,155
1984–85	1,223
1985–86	1,293
1986–87	1,426
1987–88	1,587
1988–89	1,753
1989–90	1,938
1990–91	2,098
1991–92	2,252
1992–93	2,385
1993–94	2,377
1994–95	2,421
1995–96	2,496
1996–97	2,510
1997–98[1]	2,537

[1] Due to changes in funding arrangements for pre-school provision, the nursery component for 1997–98 includes an estimated expenditure element.

Notes:

1. The per pupil figure relates to nursery, primary, secondary and special schools.
2. The figures are net current expenditure excluding costs of home to school transport, school meals, education authority central administration costs, and loan and leasing changes.
3. Figures derived from local authority financial returns (LFR 1).

Post Office

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the principal activities of his Department and its agencies which provide business for (a) Crown post offices and (b) other post offices; if he will assess whether the level of business generated in each case is likely to increase or decrease over the next five years; and which new areas of business for post offices are likely to be developed by his Department and its agencies over the same period. [99553]

Mr. Wilson: The Scotland Office currently has no activities which provide business for Crown or other post offices and I do not expect the position to change significantly over the next five years.

No specific areas of new business for post offices are foreseen but the targets for electronic delivery of services (50 per cent. by 2005, 100 per cent. by 2008) represent a real opportunity for additional business for the Post Office network across all public services delivered by central or local Government.

External Consultants

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been spent by his Department on external consultants and advisers since May 1997 funded from (i) his Department's programme provision and (ii) his Department's running costs. [99493]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 24 November 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 10 November 1999, Official Report, columns 626–27W. All expenditure by my Department on external consultants since May 1997 has been funded from running costs provision.

Highlands and Islands

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his liaison role in respect of the future of oil fabrication in the Highlands and Islands. [101439]

Mr. Wilson: I am, of course, extremely concerned about the impact of the job losses announced by Barmac, and the situation faced by all UK oil fabrication yards. These are issues being addressed by the oil and Gas Industry Task Force, of which I am a member. As agreed at its meeting last week, plans are already under way for a group to meet as soon as possible to clarify how they can together best help the industry adapt to the changes in the market.

This is being copied for information to the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy).

Barmac Oil

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to meet the management and unions at the Barmac oil fabrication yards. [101438]

Mr. Wilson: I will be meeting representatives of the management and work force of Barmac later this week. The Government and the Scottish Executive will continue to work together closely to tackle the problems resulting from the lack of new construction orders for oil fabrication yards.

This is being copied for information to the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy).

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Clay Pigeon Shooting

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what Government funding is made available for research into (a) materials used and (b) safety procedures for clay pigeon shooting. [100667]

Kate Hoey: None. The Government have not been asked to fund any such research.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the breakdown is by region of the number of tickets to the Millennium Dome sold within the first eight weeks for which tickets were on sale. [99334]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 30 November 1999]: Ticket sales and reservations are running ahead of NMEC's expectations. They passed the one million mark on 10 November. In February 2000 NMEC will release information about attendance at the Dome during January, and on a monthly basis thereafter.

Visitor Attractions

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people visited Britain's visitor attractions in 1998; and what is his estimate of the number of visitors in (a) 1999 and (b) 2000. [101159]

Janet Anderson: In 1998 there were 408 million visits to 6,164 tourist attractions across the UK.

My Department has no figures or forecasts for the number of visits to tourist attractions in 1999 or 2000. The British Tourist Authority has forecast that the number of holidays taken in the UK (by domestic or overseas visitors) will be over 10 per cent. higher in 2000 than in 1998. This suggests that there will be a strong demand for tourist attractions in 2000.

EU Recycling Directive

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what account he has taken of the EU Directive on Recycling in setting the terms of reference for his working party for the digital switch-over. [100863]

Janet Anderson: We have not set up a working party for digital switch-over, but we will be formally reviewing progress on availability and affordability of digital services every two years with industry, regulators and consumer groups. We expect many analogue television sets to be replaced by digital sets as part of the normal cycle of set replacement. Analogue sets need not be scrapped as they can be converted to digital by using a set top box.

Museum Staff

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people were employed in Britain's museums (a) in each of the past 20 years, (b) on 10 July 1997 and (c) on the most recent date available. [101312]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The most recent (1998) survey by the Digest of Museum Statistics (DOMUS) reports that 12,590 paid permanent staff (full-time equivalent), 2,775 paid temporary staff (full-time equivalent) and 25,506 volunteers were employed in 1,188 museums that responded to the survey. The 1997 DOMUS survey reported 11,245 paid permanent staff (full-time equivalent), 2,358 paid temporary staff (full-time equivalent) and 20,120 volunteers in 1,214 museums that responded to the survey. In July 1999 there were 1,761 museums with full or provisional registration. I am not aware of reliable or comparable figures that could be used to estimate the numbers over the previous 18 years.

WALES

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what motor mileage allowance rates his Department offers to (a) ministers and (b) civil servants using their own vehicles for official business; and what has been the cost of each in each of the last five years. [98714]

Mr. Murphy: Ministers travelling on official business may use a private car instead of an official car, and claim the mileage allowance in the same circumstances and on the same terms as civil servants in my Department, at the rates set out below:

Cars with engine capacity up to 1500cc is 35p per mile for the first 4,000 miles in a year, and 20p per mile thereafter in that year.

Cars with engine capacity between 1501cc-2000cc is 45p per mile for the first 4,000 miles in a year, and 25p per mile thereafter in that year.

Cars with engine capacity over 2000cc is 48p per mile for the first 4,000 miles in a year, and 32p per mile thereafter in that year.

A Public Transport Rate of 23.8p per mile is payable when a private car is used although there are more cost-effective modes of transport available.

Figures are not available before financial year 1996–97. For the years since then there may be an unidentified mix of expenditure, but as nearly as can be determined the costs of motor mileage for Ministers and civil servants have been as follows:

	Ministers	Civil Servants
For the Welsh Office
1996–97	9,555	293,792
1997–98	5,252	326,925
1998–99	9,424	389,408
1 April 1999–30 June 1999	1,006	112,269
For the Wales Office, following devolution
1 July 1999–20 November 1999	575	1,179

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much his Department has spent on civil servants' transport in each of the last two years. [98713]

Mr. Murphy: All travel undertaken by civil servants complies with the requirements of the Civil Service Management Code. I refer my hon. Friend to the answer provided by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office on 1 December 1999, Official Report, column 256W.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much his Department has spent on ministerial transport in each of the last two years. [98712]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Ministers are required, under the terms of the 'Ministerial Code' and 'Travel by Ministers' to make efficient and cost effective travel arrangements. For information on spend on the Government Car Service, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office on 1 December 1999, Official Report, columns 255–256W.

Post Office

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the principal activities of his Department and its agencies which provide business for (a) Crown post offices and (b) other post offices; if he will assess whether the level of business generated in each case is likely to increase or decrease over the next five years; and which new areas of business for post offices are likely to be developed by his Department and its agencies over the same period. [99552]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My Department uses the postal services for routine correspondence, but does not normally undertake any other activities which provide business for either Crown post offices or other post offices. It is not possible to assess whether levels of correspondence will either increase or decrease substantially over the next five years, and currently no specific new areas of business for post offices seem likely to be developed by my Department.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of households in Wales were workless at the latest date for which figures are available. [98494]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Labour Force Survey (Spring 1999) estimated the percentage of households in Wales of which no-one was in employment at 22 per cent.—based on households with at least one person of working age.

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the locations in Wales where consent has been given for genetically modified crop planting. [100898]

Mr. Hanson: There were four applications to release Genetically Modified crops at sites in Wales in 1998, two at Whitehouse Farm, Newcastle, Monmouthshire and two at Great Cumberland Farm, Llanishen near Chepstow. Crops were sown at the former and harvested in September last year. At the other site, the farmer subsequently withdrew his application and no sowing took place.

Since then there have been no further applications in Wales.

Since May this year, applications for the release and marketing of GMOs in Wales are made to the National Assembly for Wales.

Departmental Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many research contracts have been let by his Department since May 1997; what is the value of each contract; and in each case whether the contract included (a) a departmental veto over publication of the research results, (b) departmental control over the date of publication of the research results and (c) a requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments. [100158]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The term "research" covers a wide range of activities from scientific and engineering research through to consultancies and public opinion surveys. The information requested is not held centrally by my Department, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Fraud

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what new initiatives he intends to introduce to reduce the amount of fraud in claiming social security payments. [101418]

Mr. Rooker: We set out our strategy for combating fraud and reducing error in "Safeguarding Social Security", published on 23 March 1999. We are putting this strategy into practice with strong and sensible safeguards to ensure the right money goes to the right people. Among the new initiatives that carry this wish forward are the following:

New more robust powers for fraud inspectors in The Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Bill published on 1 December. These provisions give greater clarity and allow all benefit fraud investigations to proceed on the basis of common powers.

All payments will move to automated credit transfer (ACT) from 2003 as a modern, more secure and efficient method of paying benefits. This will virtually eliminate "instrument of payment" fraud and enhance security over the life of a claim. This is expected to yield annual fraud savings of around £140 million.

A regional radio campaign, from 1 November, costing some £500,000, with supporting adverts in local newspapers, to advertise the Benefit Fraud Hotline. This has led to thousands of extra calls to the Hotline.

Industrial Injuries Policy Group

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) when he expects the Benefits Agency's Industrial Injuries Policy Group will offer guidance to the agency in respect of the aggregation of life gratuities once the seven year period has elapsed arising from the case law CI/522/93, CI/1698/97 and CI/4766/97; [101046]

(2) on how many occasions and over what period of time the Benefits Agency's Industrial Injuries Policy Group has discussed guidance to be offered to the agency arising from case law CI/1522/93, CI/1698/97 and CI/4766/97. [101047]

Mr. Bayley: We are considering the implications of Commissioners' decisions CI/522/93, CI/1698/98 and CI/4766/97 which are about the aggregation of disablement assessments for Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit which have been compensated by life gratuities. Once we have considered the decisions, the Benefits Agency will issue guidance to District Offices.

Departmental IT Projects

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the information technology projects being undertaken by his Department and agencies responsible to his Department, including (a) the start date, (b) the planned completion date, (c) the current expected completion date, (d) the planned cost and (e) the current estimated cost; and if he will make a statement. [99628]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. The information that is available is in the table.

The projects listed are those currently being undertaken by the Department where the IT cost exceeds £5 million. Also listed are lesser value projects with an IT content that are deemed to be critical to the Department's business.

Housing Benefit Fraud

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to ensure that local authorities carry out adequate checks on housing benefit claimants in order to reduce the amount of bogus claims. [101419]

Mr. Rooker: We inherited a flawed system which placed far too much emphasis on the detection of fraud once it had occurred. Working in partnership with local authorities, we are transforming the delivery of Housing Benefit by emphasising the importance of getting it right to begin with and keeping it right during the life of a claim.

We are financing local authorities to focus on both the prevention and detection of fraud with the introduction of the Verification Framework. The Framework specifies the evidence which must be verified before a claim can be paid and sets out the checks which must be made during the life of a claim. We have made £100 million available to allow all local authorities to implement this important new initiative. So far, we have funded the implementation of the Framework in 223 local authorities. We want all local authorities to adopt the high standards set by the Framework and we have embarked on a programme to increase its take up, particularly among the highest spending authorities.

From 6 September 1999, with the application of Section 19 of the Fraud Act, all new claims for Housing Benefit are subject to tough new identity checks to ensure that all claimants can be linked with the appropriate National Insurance number.

As part of our strategy to ensure that local authorities have in place arrangements for the secure and accurate administration of Housing Benefit, we have instructed the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate to focus their attention on the 30 largest local authorities who between them account for almost a third of the total expenditure on Housing and Council Tax Benefit. These authorities will have been inspected or revisited by the summer of next year and a report will be published with recommendations on each authority which we will follow up. This will allow us to measure their progress in the fight against fraud.

We have also made good progress in preventing the significant amount of fraud which occurs when fraudsters make false claims and then redirect benefit mail from addresses at which they are not resident. The Royal Mail Do Not Redirect scheme was introduced nationally from 1 February this year and will stop the redirection of appropriately marked benefit mail. To date, over 200 local authorities have taken up this initiative and we are aiming that all authorities will adopt this service.

Poverty

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families were officially living in poverty (a) in each of the past 20 years, (b) on 1 May 1997 and (c) on the most recent date available. [101309]

Mr. Bayley: Poverty and social exclusion are complex multi-dimensional issues, affecting many aspects of people's lives; their income, health, housing, the quality of the environment, opportunities to work and to learn. There is no single measure which can capture the complex problems which need to be overcome.

We are determined to tackle the problems that condemn many individual and communities to poverty. That is why we set out our strategy for tackling poverty and social exclusion in our first annual report "Opportunity for all" (Cm 4445). The report includes a range of indicators that capture many of the aspects of poverty and social exclusion.

Information on the indicators, including definitions and baseline data, was placed in the Library on 21 September to accompany "Opportunity for all". One of the indicators monitors the proportion of people living in low income households. Further information on low income statistics are published (annually in recent years) in Households Below Average Income (HBAI). The results can be found in the HBAI publication for the relevant year in the Library.

Benefit Payments (Post Offices)

Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what representations he has received about the impact of changes in the way social security benefits are paid on the viability of post offices; [101376]

(2) what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry about the impact of changes in the way social security benefits are paid on the viability of post offices. [101374]

Mr. Rooker: We have received a number of such representations. Ministers and officials in this Department have had a number of discussions with their counterparts in the Department of Trade and Industry about the planned move to automated credit transfer for the payment of benefits.

Pensions

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate (a) the number and (b) the percentage of pensioner benefit units receiving income support in each of the last 10 years; if he will provide his estimate for the remainder of the public expenditure planning period; and if he will provide separate figures for single and married pensioners. [101079]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the tables.

Notes:

1. Pensioner benefit units in private households exclude claimants in Residential care and Nursing Homes.
2. Figures are rounded to the nearest thousand, percentages given to one decimal place.
3. Figures refer to benefit units, which may be a single person or couple.
4. Income Support for the unemployed was replaced by Income-based Jobseeker's Allowance from October 1996. Income Support figures from 1997 exclude unemployed.
5. Pensioners are defined as benefit units where either the claimant and/or partner are aged 60 or over.
6. Income Support figures are based on a 1 per cent. sample up to 1993 and a 5 per cent. sample thereafter.
7. All Percentages are Income Support benefit units expressed as a proportion of all pensioner benefit units (private households).
8. The percentages quoted are based on pensioner benefit units estimates for Great Britain private households taken from the Family Resources Survey (FRS) for 1993–94 to 1997–98 and the Family Expenditure Survey HBAI datasets from 1988 to 1992.
9. FRS estimates are based on sample counts that have been adjusted for non-response using multi-purpose grossing factors that control for region, Council Tax Band and a number of demographic variables. Estimates are subject to sampling error and to variability in non-response.
10. Details of all pensioner benefit units are not yet available for 1999 therefore no percentage is given for this year.

CSA Reform

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his oral statement of 29 November 1999, Official Report, column 5, if he will list the pieces of information which are currently required in order to assess liability for child maintenance; and if he will identify which of these will be required under his proposed reforms. [101036]

Angela Eagle: The current child support formula requires a wide range of information to be obtained, not only about the financial and family circumstances of the parents involved but also about their new partners. This can include details of their income from earnings, benefits or other sources, housing costs (such as mortgages, rent, service charges, council tax, home improvement loans, property and loan insurance), travel to work costs and clean break property settlements.

The new child support rates will require information to be obtained only about the non-resident parent's income and the number of children for whom he is responsible. The definition of what is to count as income will also be considerably simplified as set out in Annexe Two of the White Paper "Children's Rights and Parent's Responsibilities" (Cm. 4349) published on 1 July 1999.

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his written answer of 29 November 1999, Official Report, column 51W if the proposed amendment to Section 6(1) of the Child Support Act 1991 will apply in cases where a claim for income support or income-based jobseeker's allowance proves to be fraudulent. [101130]

Angela Eagle: As now section 6(1) of the 1991 Act will apply where a parent with care claims or is paid Income Support or income based Jobseeker's Allowance. If the payment of benefit subsequently turns out to have been fraudulent, section 6(1) will only cease to apply when payments stop.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Car Theft

23. Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to reduce the number of car thefts; and if he will make a statement. [99698]

Mr. Charles Clarke: On 22 September, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary launched the Vehicle Crime Reduction Action Team strategy document. That strategy is intended to deliver the Government's 30 per cent. vehicle crime reduction target by the end of March 2004.

Police (Crime Prevention)

25. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to encourage an increase in the proportion of time spent by police officers on fighting crime. [99701]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The deployment of police officers is the operational responsibility of Chief Constables. However, the introduction of best value into the police service from April next year and the requirement that year on year efficiency savings of 2 per cent. must be recycled into front-line policing should allow Chief Constables to allocate more officers to the essential job of reducing crime.

Information Technology systems being delivered under the National Strategy for Police Information Systems (NSPIS) and new radio technology for the police being provided as part of the Public Safety Radio Communications Project (PSRCP) will do much to free officers from administrative burdens.

The NSPIS Custody application draws much of the criminal history information required for effective administration of those in custody automatically from the Police National Computer, saving police time, effort and paperwork. The NSPIS Case Preparation system is designed to produce all the information needed by the police, courts, Crown Prosecution Service and other bodies to process cases automatically. This, too, will substantially reduce the administrative burden on police officers, freeing them for front line duties. Holmes 2 harnesses modern technology to make the best use of police resources used in the investigation of major crimes. NSPIS Crime automates the recording of crime reports, saving effort in compilation and making them easier to use in crime management and intelligence led policing. The National Management Information System (NMIS) provides an integrated set of tools to deliver the information commanders at all levels need to manage their resources as efficiently as possible to meet performance targets. NMIS will also enable data to be collected on a common basis to a standard format making it easier to collate and compare at the national level. This will reduce the burden on the police in producing returns and help Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary in their work.

The NSPIS applications will be interlinked so that information can be shared electronically, and transmitted to front line officers via the new Public Safety Radio Communication System. These new applications will help free officers from the burden of paperwork and free them for front line duties.

Electoral Reform

26. Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress in reform of electoral procedure. [99702]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Representation of the People Bill had its Second Reading on 30 November.

Sex Offenders

27. Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps the Government are taking to ensure that children and other members of the public are protected from sex offenders. [99704]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government are committed to protecting children and others from sex offenders. The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 contained strong additional safeguards in the new sex offender orders and extended supervision provisions. This session we are bringing forward proposals for a scheme to prevent unsuitable people, including sex offenders, from working with children as part of the Crime and Public Protection Bill.

Mr. Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out his Department's policy on the notification of hon. Members of the release of sex offenders into bail hostels within their constituency; and in respect of that policy if he will list (a) the number of category A sex offenders placed in bail hostels within England and Wales in each of the past two years, (b) the notification given to his Department, in each case, prior to the offender being placed in a bail hostel and the notification given, in each case, to the hon. Member for the constituency where the hostel was located and (c) on how many occasions the notification given to hon. Members was less than four days. [101359]

Mr. Boateng: Over the last two years, two sex offenders who were category A prisoners were released to hostel accommodation. Home Office Ministers were notified of the release arrangements two weeks before the first prisoner's release and five weeks prior to the second prisoner's release. The hon. Members for the relevant constituencies received notification seven days and 34 days respectively prior to their release.

In addition to the arrangements for category A prisoners, the Department has, since 1 April 1999, operated an Early Warning system within the prison and probation services in relation to the release of offenders in respect of whom there is a strong risk that a serious violent or sexual offence will be committed after release and where there are victim issues; difficulties with the supervision plan or accommodation; and where it is likely that the case will be subject to media attention. Prisons and probation services are asked to give the Department two months notice of the release of an offender who meets these criteria.

Thirty such cases have been notified to the hon. Members concerned. The information was passed on as soon as we knew what the accommodation arrangements were going to be. I did this in order to reassure hon. Members of the safeguards which have been put in place. This is particularly important if there is likely to be a hostile media reaction so that hon. Members are able to respond if necessary. Many hon. Members have been very supportive to the local agencies responsible for managing dangerous offenders in the community, for which I am grateful.

I am currently reviewing the arrangements for handling these cases. As part of that review, I shall be writing to hon. Members individually to ascertain which of them wishes to continue to receive information, in confidence, about the release of dangerous offenders and offering further briefing to anyone who would find it useful. We are committed to doing all we can to ensure public safety, especially where dangerous offenders are concerned and we will continue to work with hon. Members to bring this about.

WPC Yvonne Fletcher

28. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been reported to him by the Metropolitan police in the case of WPC Yvonne Fletcher. [99705]

Mr. Straw: The criminal investigation by the Metropolitan Police into WPC Fletcher's murder is continuing. They intend to pursue this investigation vigorously and the arrival of our Ambassador in Tripoli later this month should help that process. The Metropolitan Police continue to expect full co-operation from the Libyan authorities.

UK Passport Agency

29. Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the current backlog and turnaround times for passport applications are at the UK Passport Agency. [99706]

Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for improving the service provided by the UK Passport Agency. [99682]

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the current backlog and turnaround times are for passport applications at the UK Passport Agency. [99691]

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for improving the service provided by the UK Passport Agency. [99695]

Mrs. Roche: I refer my hon. Friends to the announcement the Secretary of State made earlier today.

Refugee Dispersal

30. Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the outcome to date of the policy of dispersal of refugees. [99707]

Mrs. Roche: We plan to bring in the new support arrangements in Part VI of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 on 1 April 2000. The National Asylum Support Service is currently drawing up plans for dispersal of asylum seekers. The statutory interim arrangements set out in Schedule 9 to the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 will come into effect on 6 December. These will underpin a voluntary dispersal scheme whereby asylum seekers seeking support from local authorities in London and Kent can be transferred on a voluntary basis to local authorities outside London and the South East.

Burglary

31. Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps the Government are taking to ensure the elderly are protected from burglaries. [99708]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The elderly, like all age groups, will benefit from the £250 million Crime Reduction Programme that was launched in July 1998 as an evidence-based approach to reducing crime, and from the Crime Reduction Strategy that we announced last week.

The Crime Reduction Programme includes the Reducing Burglary Initiative, under which more than £50 million will be used to support anti-burglary projects over three years covering some 2 million households in 500 areas with high levels of domestic burglary. Of the 63 strategic development projects already under way under this initiative, seven will specifically benefit the elderly.

In addition, we recently announced an £11 million project to provide security improvements for the homes of pensioners on low incomes in high burglary areas, in conjunction with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions' New Home Energy Efficiency Scheme, which starts in June. We plan to announce in the Spring how the improved security arrangements will operate.

This scheme, along with the Reducing Burglary Initiative, will be evaluated to help identify what works most cost-effectively in which circumstances. The results will be disseminated to all partnerships to help them tackle their own burglary problems.

Home Office literature on crime prevention already includes detailed advice to help the elderly reduce the risk of burglary, including burglary by fraudulent callers.
We are also in the initial stages of developing a national programme to combat distraction burglary (the victims of which are mostly very elderly). This will use widespread publicity and improved intelligence and detection methods and will involve the police, other organisations such as Neighbourhood watch and the public utility companies.

Metropolitan Police

32. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the current number of officers in the Metropolitan police. [99709]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that, on the 31 October, there were 26,290 officers in the Metropolitan Police Service.

Health Service (Prisons)

33. Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the operation of the health service in prisons. [99710]

Mr. Boateng: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith) on 29 March 1999, Official Report, columns 556–58W, a programme of reforms of the organisation and delivery of health services to prisoners. The Prison Service and National Health Service Executive, working in partnership, are establishing a Prison Health Care Task Force and a Joint Prison Health Policy Unit. These Units are implementing the recommendations of the Report on "The Future Organisation of Prison Health Care", published last March.

Trial by Jury

34. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations his Department has received on the number of people, in the last year for which figures are available, who opted for a trial by jury, as opposed to a magistrate, who changed their plea before the trial commenced. [99711]

Mr. Straw: I refer the hon. Member to the replies given to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Benn) on 25 November 1999, Official Report, column 181W, by the Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke).

35. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research findings he has obtained concerning abuse of the right to elect for trial by jury in either-way cases. [99712]

Mr. Straw: Research conducted by the Home Office showed that nearly 90 per cent. of convicted offenders who had elected Crown Court trial in 1989 had previous convictions and over a third had more than 10 previous convictions. Information is also available from the baseline data collected by the Home Office in 1998 for the evaluation of the pilot schemes to reduce delay in the criminal justice system. In a sample of nearly 1,000 cases in the six pilot areas, about 60 per cent. of those who elected for the Crown Court pleaded guilty before the trial started.

Public House Licensing

36. Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to make changes to the public house licensing regime. [99713]

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to make changes to the public house licensing regime. [99699]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We aim to publish a White Paper early in the new year setting out our proposals for reform, and to bring forward a Bill when Parliamentary time permits.

Severe Personality Disorder

37. Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had with the Department of Health on the matter of severe personality disorder. [99714]

Mr. Boateng: The Government's proposals on severe personality disorder form a single piece of work which is the joint responsibility of the Home Office and the Department of Health. Work on all aspects of the proposals is being taken forward jointly with ongoing contact between officials of the two Departments.

Police Resources (Greater Manchester)

38. Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on police resources in Greater Manchester. [99715]

Mr. Charles Clarke: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) on 25 November 1999, Official Report, columns 176–78W, the provisional funding settlement for the Greater Manchester Police for 2000–01. The police authority's provisional funding allocation is £386 million. This is an increase of 2.8 per cent. over 1999–2000, which is in line with the average increase in funding for England and Wales next year. It will be for the police authority to set the budget for the next financial year. It is for the chief officer to determine staffing levels within the overall resources available.

The Government are also making available additional resources, as part of a new ring-fenced Crime Fighting Fund, to enable the police to recruit 5,000 officers over and above the number that forces would otherwise have recruited over the next three years from April 2000. The Greater Manchester Police Authority will be able to make a bid for a share of this funding.

Right to Remain

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the time taken to determine whether an individual has the right to remain in the UK, having first entered on a visitor's visa. [99690]

Mrs. Roche: Visa nationals who obtain a visit visa from a British Diplomatic Post and are given leave to enter the United Kingdom for up to six months as a visitor are, under the Immigration Rules, expected to leave the country at the end of that period.

Non-visa nationals who are given leave to enter the United Kingdom for up to six months as a visitor are also expected to leave the country at the end of that period. They may, however, apply for further leave to remain under a different category in accordance with the Immigration Rules. Straightforward applications which can be dealt with under a fast track system can usually be processed within about six weeks. Other applications which require lengthy examination or further inquiries will take longer to decide. We cannot give an average length of time for processing such applications as each is considered on its individual merits.

Civil Servants (Transport)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his Department has spent on civil servants' transport in each of the last two years. [98698]

Mr. Straw: All travel undertaken by Home Office civil servants complies with the requirements of the Civil Service Management Code. The total spend on civil servants' transport in each of the last two years has been as follows:

1998–99	12,538,635
1997–98	12,950,486

Ministerial Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his Department has spent on ministerial transport in each of the last two years. [98697]

Mr. Straw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to her by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office, on 1 December 1999, Official Report, columns 253–56W. In addition, the Home Office spent, in 1997–98, £161,984 (of which £161,884 was capital expenditure) and, in 1998–99, £29,035 on transport services for Ministers.

Drug-related Crime

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been arrested for drug-related crime on Merseyside in each year from 1995 onwards; how many were charged; how many were subsequently convicted; and how many were aged (a) between 14 and 16, (b) between 16 and 19, (c) between 19 and 29 and (d) over 29 years. [99432]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 23 November 1999]: No information is collected centrally on drug-related crime, only on offences under various specific drug legislation, mostly the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971.

The following information is available:

(a) Recorded Crime

Notifiable offences of trafficking in controlled drugs recorded by Merseyside police is as follows:

	Number
1995	698
1996	563
1997	694

For 1998–99 the coverage of notifiable offences was extended and revised principles for counting introduced. The following was recorded by Merseyside police:

	Number
Trafficking in controlled drugs	729
Possession of controlled drugs	4,737
Other drugs offences	154

(b) Stop/searches under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act

Numbers of persons/vehicles stopped and searched for drugs and number of arrests made for drugs by Merseyside police is as follows:

	Stop/searches	Arrests
1995	5,357	1,066
1996–97	11,324	2,030
1997–98	15,613	2,557

(c) Persons cautioned, proceeded against and convicted:

Numbers of persons cautioned, proceeded against at magistrates courts and found guilty at all courts within Merseyside police force area for indictable drug offences[1] by age group 1995–98

Age and year	Total cautioned	Total proceeded against	Total found guilty
1995	1,170	1,810	1,485
1996	1,457	1,956	1,563
1997	2,033	2,311	2,030
1998	2,309	2,615	2,359
of which:
14–15 years of age
1995	74	19	13
1996	77	23	16
1997	116	22	16
1998	143	40	29
16–18 years of age
1995	361	212	174
1996	451	233	169
1997	544	270	240
1998	678	402	359
19–29 years of age
1995	630	1,129	941
1996	797	1,172	963
1997	1,111	1,339	1,162
1998	1,176	1,413	1,304
30 and over
1995	99	450	357
1996	130	526	414
1997	248	677	611
1998	295	759	667

[1] Trafficking in controlled drugs, possession of controlled drugs and other drug offences (principal offence basis)

There is no information specifically on the number charged. Figures on those cautioned and proceeded against are the nearest available centrally.

(d) Research

Home Office research involving the drug testing of arrestees strongly suggests that around a third of acquisitive crime is linked to drug taking. Further work is being conducted within this programme. The results of the next phase, including research on Merseyside, are due to be published by the end of June 2000.

Integrated Casework Directorate

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a copy of the Business Plan of the Integrated Casework Directorate of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate. [100490]

Mrs. Roche: I have placed in the Library a copy of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND) Report for 1999, published on Tuesday 30 November, which reports on performance during 1998–1999 and sets out our programme to meet the published targets for 1999–2000, 2000–01 and 2001–02. The Report focuses on IND's key objectives underpinning the Home Office Aim 6, as set out in the Public Service Agreement and Home Office Business and Expenditure Plans (Command Paper 4205).

I have also placed in the Library a detailed business plan for the Integrated Casework Directorate as given to staff in July. The document was at that time a draft and remains a living document subject to continuing review. For example, numbers of staff already recruited, and current recruitment plans, exceed those stated in the draft business plan.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the current backlogs are in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate for (a) asylum cases, (b) general and settlement cases, (c) illegal entry, deportation and European cases and (d) nationality cases. [100488]

Mrs. Roche: The current backlog of cases for the various categories is set in the table:

	Number
Asylum cases	94,305
General and settlement cases	[1]27,200
European cases	[1]940
Deportation and illegal entry cases	[1]18,100
Nationality cases	100,000

[1] Figures relate to cases in the Integrated Casework Directorate, excluding those currently being actioned in caseworking groups and local enforcement offices.

The backlogs are being tackled by various initiatives. We have introduced streamlined measures for dealing with general casework across all Case Management Units. We are successfully piloting new processes to speed up the consideration of asylum cases, both new and in the backlog.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what procedures he is planning to enable his Department to identify asylum cases involving children to ensure a faster turn-around time after 1 April 2000. [100487]

Mrs. Roche: We have developed new procedures for speeding up the consideration of asylum applications. New family cases involving dependent children are being given priority. A database is being set up to monitor progress.

Mental Illness

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is in respect of restraint of people with a severe mental illness by methods based on the infliction of pain. [100719]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The restraint of any person must be within the law, which requires that the force used to prevent crime or to apprehend a suspect must be reasonable in all the circumstances.

Police guidelines on restraint provide a range of options based on the use of an appropriate necessary level of force. It is not, of course, always possible to determine immediately whether a person who needs to be restrained or apprehended is suffering from mental disorder.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action is being taken in response to the recommendations of the Police Complaints Authority on raising officers' awareness of the nature and impact of severe mental illness and about officers seeking advice and assistance when dealing with someone who is mentally ill. [100716]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that officers in both the Metropolitan Police and other forces in England and Wales receive formal training on mental illness as part of their probationer training. It is open to chief officers to provide additional training on this subject if there is a particular need for it. Home Office Circular 12/95 sets out advice for chief police officers and others on dealing with mentally disordered suspects or offenders, including the need to develop effective contacts with other local services and agencies. We have noted the recommendations of the Police Complaints Authority and will assess whether there is scope for further guidance to the police.

Custody Officers (Training)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action the Government proposes to take in response of the recommendation of the Home Affairs Committee's (Fourth report, Session 1998–99, HC 81) about enforcing a requirement that all custody officers receive training before commencing duties. [100717]

Mr. Charles Clarke: It is essential that all police officers receive the training necessary to enable them to carry out their duties properly. The Government published options for future police training arrangements in a consultation document on 18 November. The principal aim of these proposals is to ensure that all officers and support staff are equipped to carry out their duties to common high standards. The Government will announce their final proposals early in 2000, shortly after the consultation period closes on 7 January.

Public Sector Openness

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on (a) the function and (b) the remit of the Advisory Group on Openness in the Public Sector. [100651]

Mr. Straw: The function of the Advisory Group on Openness in the Public Sector is to advise the Secretary of State on the steps needed to be taken ahead of legislation to create a culture of openness in all public services and lay the foundations for the implementation of a future Freedom of Information Act.

The remit of the Advisory Group is to:

advise the Home Secretary on proposals for promoting cultural change in the public sector to foster a culture of greater openness; assist in the development of training and education programmes for public servants to promote cultural change and facilitate the introduction of Freedom of Information; and undertake other tasks related to the implementation of Freedom of Information as directed by the Home Secretary.

The Group is chaired by the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), and the members are drawn from a variety of backgrounds. Some bring a specialist knowledge of an area of public service to the Group's work, while others have a particular interest in Freedom of Information on the management of change. Information about the Advisory Group, including information about its function and remit as well as accounts of its meetings, is published on the Home Office website.

The Group has today submitted its recommendations to me and I have placed a copy of the report in the Library.

Coroners' Services

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what consultations he has had with representatives of the Muslim and Jewish communities about the provision of coroners' services during the period between Christmas and the end of the Millennium holiday; [100586]

(2) what steps he has taken to ensure the adequate provision of coroners' services during the period between Christmas and the end of the Millennium holiday. [100587]

Mr. Boateng: The need for appropriate cover over this period has already been brought to the attention of the Coroners' Society and we expect to write to all coroners on this matter shortly. Coroners are required under the Coroners Rules to be available at all times to undertake duties in connection with inquests and post mortem examinations. (We have held no consultations with, nor received representations from, religious communities specifically during this period about cover). Responsibility for the availability of coroner services lies with the relevant coroner and the local council.

Emergency Planning (Holiday Period)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice he has issued to local authorities about emergency planning during the forthcoming Christmas and new year period. [100583]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Local authorities are expected to have generic emergency management arrangements. Recognising the unique features of this period, the Home Office has issued two additional guidance documents to local authorities and has made a major contribution to a range of Millennium specific seminars and workshops. In addition, a Millennium version of the "Exercise planners guide" was issued in January 1999.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the state of readiness of local authorities' emergency plans for the period by Christmas 1999 and new year 2000. [100582]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Each local authority is responsible for determining its own emergency planning arrangements. It should be able to respond effectively to any emergency at any time. However, the Home Office visited a range of local authorities to discuss the unique aspects of the Millennium date change period. On the basis of those visits, we are informed that local authorities are prepared for the period.

Immigration Rules

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are used to assess the validity of marriages in cases where the husband has been allowed residence in the United Kingdom following marriage. [100616]

Mrs. Roche: Before indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom is granted on the basis of marriage, we must be satisfied that the marriage is genuine and subsisting. Appropriate checks are carried out in order to ensure that these criteria are met. The validity of a marriage in cases where indefinite leave to remain has been granted would not normally be investigated unless there were strong grounds to believe that leave was obtained by deception.

Illegal Immigrants

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on co-operation between different Government agencies to (a) track down and (b) deport illegal immigrants. [100615]

Mrs. Roche: Staff in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND), including the Immigration Service (IS), work in co-operation with many other government agencies as appropriate, including the police, Benefits Agency and Contributions Agency, in detecting those who are suspected of being illegal immigrants or facilitating illegal entry. This liaison is allowed for under section 28(3) of the Data Protection Act 1994 which provides for the exchange of information where this is necessary to prevent or detect a crime.

The responsibility for deciding whether an illegal immigrant should be deported or otherwise removed rests with IND. No other government agencies are involved in this decision.

Jill Dando

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress of the police investigation of the murder of Jill Dando. [100589]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The investigation of crime within the Metropolitan Police District is an operational matter for the Commissioner. He tells me that this investigation is continuing, although no clear motive for the murder has yet emerged.

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when the Criminal Records Bureau will come into operation; and if he will make a statement; [100609]

(2) what is the estimated cost of establishing the Criminal Records Bureau; how many staff will be employed when it commences operations; and what is the estimated annual cost of running the Bureau. [100611]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The project to set up the Criminal Records Bureau is being managed within the framework of a Public Private Partnership. Final costs and staff numbers will depend upon the outcome of procurement action. This is under way. Bids were received on 19 November and are under evaluation. I have been reviewing the timetable of the project and I shall announce the outcome shortly.

Working Time Regulations (Police Exclusion)

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the potential impact on the health and safety of police officers of their exclusion from the Working Time Regulations. [100628]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Working Time Regulations do apply to the Police Service. However, while the regulations clearly apply to police officers and support staff, there are a number of defined exceptions covering circumstances routinely encountered by operational police officers and support staff. Regulation 18 specifically exempts those police duties which inevitably conflict with the limits and entitlements provided for. Regulation 20 applies to workers whose duration of working time is not measured or predetermined, or can be determined by the worker him/herself. Regulation 21 applies in a range of circumstances, including duties in security or surveillance.

Chief officers have a 'duty of care' towards their employees and, although forces do have local arrangements in place in respect of the Working Time Regulations, we are aware that chief officers may need guidance on the issue for operational purposes. The Home Office will issue guidelines following discussions with the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Health and Safety Executive.

Adlearn Foundation

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the findings of the Charity Commission Inquiry into the Adlearn Foundation. [100730]

Mr. Boateng: I understand from the Charity Commission that its inquiry began following the Commission's routine monitoring procedures.

The Charity Commission is satisfied that the way in which the trustees have now decided to wind up the charity is appropriate. I have asked the Chief Charity Commissioner to write to my hon. Friend, and I shall arrange for a copy of that letter to be placed in the Library.

Electrical Register

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the proposed restrictions on the use of the electoral register. [100831]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Annexe K to the Report of the Working Party on Electoral Procedures lists those who responded to the consultation exercise on this issue which was carried out in 1998.

Since publication of the Working Party's recommendation in July of this year, we have received a number of further representations from industries which make use of the electoral register, from members of the public and from hon. Members.

Intrusion Classification System

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he issues to police authorities on the use of CLASSIC (Covert Local Area Sensor System for Intrusion Classification); and if he will make a statement. [100845]

Mr. Charles Clarke: None.

Edwards Report

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the implementation of the recommendations of the Edwards report. [100850]

Mr. Straw: My intention is to publish a progress report early in the New Year.

Life Sentences (Murder)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people currently subject to life imprisonment for murder are awaiting the outcome of a review by him of his tariff. [101343]

Mr. Boateng: As at 30 November 1999, there were 94 people in custody in England and Wales convicted of murder who had submitted representations about the tariff set in their case and who were awaiting a decision by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department since 1983, in how many cases of people convicted of murder the tariff was set at less than 20 years; and what, in each case, was the reason for a tariff being set at less than 20 years. [101342]

Mr. Boateng: Tariffs of 20 years or more are reserved for the gravest types of murder including, for example, terrorist murders, murder by firearm in the course of robbery, the murder of police or prison officers and the sexual or sadistic murder of children. The great majority of murders do not fall into any of the gravest categories and the tariffs they attract are, therefore, normally less than 20 years. About 88 per cent. of all those convicted of murder and currently serving their sentence in custody in England and Wales have a tariff of less than 20 years.

2 Marsham Street

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the annual cost is of maintaining the blocks at 2 Marsham Street. [101153]

Mr. Straw: My Department took responsibility for the maintenance of 2 Marsham Street on 1 April 1999, as part of the Home Office Central London Accommodation Strategy. The budgeted cost of maintenance for the year to 31 March 2000 is £640,000 excluding Value Added Tax.

Most of this expenditure is related to health and safety issues.

A Winter Shelter under the Rough Sleepers Initiative is currently operating from 2 Marsham Street until 7 April 2000.

Chelmsford Prison

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the prescribed maximum capacity of Chelmsford Prison; and how many prisoners were held at the prison on the latest date for which information is available. [100713]

Mr. Boateng: On 1 December 1999, the operational capacity of Chelmsford prison was 469 places, and the number of prisoners held was 426.

Essex Constabulary

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) police officers, (b) constables and (c) civilian staff there are in the Essex constabulary; and what the equivalent numbers were for the two previous years. [101412]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information on police numbers is collected twice a year (March and September). The figures for September 1999 are not yet available. The information requested for each year since 1997 are set out in the table.

Year (as at 31 March)	Police Officers	Constables	Civilian support staff
1997	2,961	2,269	1,199
1998	2,929	2,264	1,253
1999	2,891	2,215	1,273

Porton Down

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost to date of the investigation by Wiltshire Constabulary into the Chemical and Biological Defence establishment at Porton Down; and how many (a) police officers and (b) civilians are employed on it. [99703]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The total costs to date are estimated at £80,000 as of 24 November. This figure includes all salaries, overtime, subsistence, travel, accommodation and purchase of additional computer and other equipment.

A total of 13 police officers (three on a part-time basis) and two civilian support staff are employed on the investigation.

Police (Disciplinary Notices)

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the officer heading the Operation Waller inquiry into Cleveland Police has issued Regulation 6 disciplinary notices concerning senior police officers; and if he will make a statement. [101421]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Cleveland Police Authority has not appointed an investigating officer to investigate its senior officers, so the question of Regulation 6 notices has not arisen.

Rural Policing

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many additional police officers will be required in each of the rural counties referred to in the report prepared by ORH Ltd.; [101173]

(2) if he will place in the Library the report prepared by ORH Ltd. relating to the provision of police forces in rural areas; [101171]

(3) if he will make a statement on the report prepared by ORH Ltd. relating to the provision of police forces in rural areas. [101172]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a Question from the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) on 25 November 1999, Official Report, columns 182–83W.

A copy of the Operational Research in Health Ltd. (ORH) report on the cost of providing policing services in sparsely populated rural areas, and a copy of the report's executive summary, is available in the Library.

The findings of the report were considered by a Home Office chaired Working Group—which included representatives of the police service, police authorities and local authorities—in July. There was no single view within the Working Group on the conclusions of the research report. There was general agreement that a sparsity factor had been detected, but less agreement about how to include it appropriately in the police funding formula.

In announcing funding allocations for police authorities for 2000–01, we set considerable store by stability in the grant system to help police authorities plan ahead. In the July 1998 White Paper, "Modern Local Government—In Touch with the People", the Deputy Prime Minister said that we would not expect to make fresh changes to the method of calculation of Standard Spending Assessments (SSAs) whilst a fundamental review of the SSA system across local government is conducted. This applies equally to police grant, as a common formula is used for distribution of police grant and SSA.

Our present intention is that, subject to consultation and approval by the House, we shall not make any changes to the method of police grant distribution for 2000–01. We do not, therefore, propose to make any substantive changes to the operation of the police funding formula for next year. Rural police forces will continue to benefit from the existing 'sparsity' element in the funding formula.

The research report made recommendations in respect of changes to the police funding formula. There were no specific recommendations in relation to police officer numbers in the rural forces. The powers for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to set police establishment levels for each force were removed under the Police and Magistrates Courts Act 1994. It is for chief officers of police to determine staffing requirements within the overall resources available. However, the new ring-fenced Crime Fighting Fund will enable the police to recruit 5,000 officers, over and above the number forces would otherwise have recruited over the next three years, commencing April 2000. Rural police forces will be able to apply for a share of this funding.

Mrs. Shephard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if the conclusions of his Department's report on rural policing were taken into account in his recent allocation of funding to police authorities in England; and if he will make a statement; [101169]

(2) when he received the report on policing in rural areas; and when he intends to publish its conclusions. [101170]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given to a Question from the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), on 25 November 1999, Official Report, columns 182–83W.

In announcing funding allocations for police authorities for 2000–01 we set considerable store by stability in the grant system to help police authorities plan ahead. In the July 1998 White Paper, "Modern Local Government—In Touch With the People", the Deputy Prime Minister said that we would not expect to make fresh changes to the method of calculation of Standard Spending Assessments (SSAs) while a fundamental review of the SSA system across local government is conducted. This applies equally to police grant, as a common formula is used for distribution of police grant and SSA.

Our present intention is that, subject to consultation and approval by the House, we shall not make any changes to the method of police grant distribution for 2000–01. We do not, therefore, propose to make any substantive changes to the operation of the police funding formula for next year. Rural police forces will continue to benefit from the existing 'sparsity' element in the funding formula.

The Home Office received the final report on the cost of providing police services in rural areas from the researchers on 6 May 1999, following which an executive summary of the report's conclusions were commissioned. The full report and executive summary were presented to a Home Office chaired Working Group, which included police representatives, on 8 July. The executive summary was sent to all police authorities in England and Wales on 21 July. A copy of the full report and the executive summary are available in the Library.

Ruth Ellis

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the death penalty on Ruth Ellis; and if he will arrange for further investigation by his Department. [101217]

Mr. Straw: Ruth Ellis was convicted of murder in 1955, for which the death sentence was mandatory. No appeal was lodged. The Home Secretary of the day concluded that there were insufficient grounds to justify the sentence not being carried out. The powers of the Home Secretary to refer alleged miscarriages of justice to the Court of Appeal were replaced in 1997 by new powers vested in the Criminal Cases Review Commission, which is now responsible for the investigation of cases of alleged wrongful conviction. I understand that an application for a review of Ruth Ellis's case has recently been submitted to the Commission. It will be for the Commission to decide in due course whether the case should be referred to the Court of Appeal.

Target Setting

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many targets have been agreed between his Department and (i) local authorities and (ii) other bodies apart from his own agencies and non-departmental bodies since May 1997. [99476]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 24 November 1999]: A very wide range of targets set by the Home Office impact, to varying degrees, upon local authorities and other bodies. The precise information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Examples of areas of activity for which such targets have been introduced since May 1997 include: reduction in the level of vehicle crime; reduction in the number of police officers taking medical retirement; and the recruitment, retention and progression of ethnic minority officers in the fire service, the police service and the probation services. Details of the ethnic minority employment targets are available in "Race Equality—the Home Secretary's Employment Targets. Staff targets for the Home Office, the Prison Service, the Police, the Fire and the Probation Services", published by the Home Office on 28 July 1999. A copy has been placed in the Library.

CABINET OFFICE

Modernising Government Action Plan

Mrs. Humble: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what progress has been made on the corporate IT strategy framework documents promised in the Modernising Government Action Plan. [101687]

Mr. Ian McCartney: In the Modernising Government Action Plan we are committed to publishing a corporate IT strategy for government in March 2000. I am now able to announce that I have published, as part of that strategy, a framework document on Call Centres. This document provides the public sector with guidelines on the issues they need to consider when using call centres, such as standards and accessibility. Over the next month I will be publishing further framework documents covering websites, smart cards, authentication and digital TV. I have arranged for copies of these frameworks to be placed in the Libraries of the House.

DOE Building, Marsham Street

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when she intends to demolish the former Department of the Environment building in Marsham Street, SW1. [100907]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated under the terms of the Framework Document to the Property Advisers to the Civil Estate. I have asked its Chief Executive, Mr. John Locke, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John C. Locke to Mr. Edward Leigh, dated 6 December:

The Minister of State for the Cabinet Office, Ian McCartney, has asked me as Chief Executive of Property Advisers to the Civil Estate (PACE) to respond to your Parliamentary Question about the demolition of 2 Marsham Street.

It remains our intention to demolish 2 Marsham Street as soon as practicable. You may be aware that, in connection with its Headquarters PFI project, the Home Office has made the property available to its bidders to consider as one of their options.

A decision by Home Office is now expected in late Spring next year. Pending this decision, Home Office has assumed management responsibility and is paying the holding costs of the property.

Public Bodies

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many non-departmental public bodies have been (a) established and (b) abolished since 2 May 1997. [100892]

Mr. Stringer: Data on numbers of non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) are collated on a financial year basis and published annually in the publication "Public Bodies", copies of which are available in both Libraries of the House. "Public Bodies 1998" reported a net reduction of 55 NDPBs on the previous year. "Public Bodies 1999", which is due to be published later this month, is likely to show a further reduction in NDPBs.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office which non-departmental public bodies were (a) established and (b) abolished in (i) 1998 and (ii) 1999. [100622]

Mr. Stringer: The following lists all the non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) that have been abolished or created in the financial years 1997–98 and 1998–99. The publication "Public Bodies 1998", which is available in both Libraries of the House, provides comprehensive information on each NDPB. "Public Bodies 1999" is due to be published later this month.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Unmarried Fathers

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to seek to amend the law to provide unmarried fathers with the same right of parental responsibility as married fathers; and if he will make a statement. [101085]

Jane Kennedy: The Government intend to introduce an amendment to the Children Act 1989 that unmarried fathers who sign their child's birth certificate jointly with the mother will acquire parental responsibility without further formality. This provision will be introduced when parliamentary time allows.

Departmental Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many research contracts have been let by his Department since May 1997; what is the value of each contract; and in each case whether the contract included (a) a departmental veto over publication of the research results, (b) departmental control over the date of publication of the research results and (c) a requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments. [100156]

Mr. Lock: The Lord Chancellor's Department has awarded 37 research contracts since May 1997 with a total overall spend of £1,003,776; details of these, including the cost of each contract are provided in the table. None of the projects was subject to a specific veto on publication of results or control over date of publication. A standard clause in research contracts is that > "the contractor shall always consider any representation from the Contract Manager for the revision of any publication, interim or final, of the results".

The Department retains the right to insert a disclaimer in published reports.

Immigration and Asylum

Mr. Malins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will publish the names and addresses of the solicitors' firms and other agencies which have been awarded block contracts by the Legal Aid Board to give advice, assistance and representation in immigration and asylum cases. [101295]

Mr. Lock: The Legal Aid Board has only recently offered contracts in immigration and asylum work to solicitors and other agencies and the exact number of contracted providers will not be known until the end of December 1999. Almost 500 contracts have been offered and the Board expects a high proportion of them to be taken up. From January 2000, the Board will be able to provide information on those contracted to do immigration and asylum work. It would not be right to publish the names and addresses of firms and agencies who have been offered contracts, but who have not yet decided to accept them, because to do so would be breaking the commercial confidentiality held between the Board and the suppliers. The names and addresses of those solicitors firms and other agencies awarded contracts will be placed in the Library in January 2000 and will also be set out in the Community Legal Service Directory. The Directory is expected to be published in April 2000.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Antartic Environmental Treaty

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made towards ratification of the Antarctic Environmental Treaty; and if he will make a statement. [100806]

Mr. Hain: The Environmental Protocol to the Antartic Treaty and its Annex I to IV entered into force on 14 January 1998. The United Kingdom's instrument of ratification of the Protocol was deposited on 25 April 1995. To give effect to the Protocol in UK law, the various Sections of the Antartic Act (1994) were brought into force between 1 November 1995 and 14 January 1998.

The fifth Annex to the Protocol, dealing with the Antartic protected areas system, is anticipated to enter into force in 2000, following approval by four remaining Antartic Treaty Parties. The UK approved V Annex in May 1996.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what actions he has taken to promote a peace process in Sri Lanka; and if he will make a statement. [100802]

Mr. Hain: We believe a lasting solution to the ethnic conflict in Sri Lanka can only be reached through a political settlement. We have made clear that we stand ready to help in the resolution of the conflict if both sides ask us to play a role.

Burma

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of Burma regarding (a) human rights, (b) religious freedom and (c) the detention of James Mawdsley. [100712]

Mr. Battle: Our Ambassador in Rangoon frequently raises our concerns with the Burmese authorities about human rights, including religious freedom, most recently with the Burmese Foreign Minister on 16 November. The UK also co-sponsored the UN General Assembly resolution adopted on 19 November, condemning the human rights violations and urging the Burmese regime to ensure full respect for all human rights and fundamental freedom. Our Ambassador in Rangoon, accompanied by Mrs. Mawdsley, visited James in prison on 20 November and remains in close touch with the Burmese authorities on his case.

Chechnya

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he raised matters relating to the Russian military activity in Chechnya and compliance with the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and additional protocols of 1977 at the OSCE Istanbul summit; and if he will make a statement. [100837]

Mr. Vaz: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has raised our concerns on Chechnya with Foreign Minister Ivanov, including at the OSCE Istanbul summit. We and our EU partners have reminded all parties to the conflict of the necessity to observe international humanitarian law.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Russian authorities over the invasion of Chechnya; and if he will make a statement. [101193]

Mr. Vaz: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has had regular discussions with Russian Foreign Minister Ivanov, most recently in a telephone conversation on 3 December, urging that Russia should seek a negotiated political settlement to the conflict. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has also written to the Russian President and Prime Minister underlining our concerns.

EU Policy (Northern Dimension)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the development of a Northern Dimension in EU policy; what areas are covered; what policies are concerned; and what budgets are involved. [101003]

Mr. Vaz: The development of a Northern Dimension to EU policy has progressed under the Finnish Presidency. I attended a conference in Helsinki on 16 November. The Commission are now drafting an Action Plan. Key policy areas concerned are energy, environment, nuclear safety, transport and cross-border co-operation. Activities will be financed through the EU PHARE, TACIS and INTERREG programmes.

Death Penalty

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what (a) national and (b) EU programmes are in progress to encourage states to abolish the death penalty. [101007]

Mr. Hain: The United Kingdom opposes the death penalty in all circumstances. Together with EU partners, we regularly call upon all states to abolish it. Where the death penalty is retained, we urge states to apply it only for the most serious crimes and to observe international minimum standards such as the non-execution of minors, pregnant women or the insane.

The UK, along with its EU partners, regularly carries out demarches in a number of countries including most recently, Trinidad and Tobago, Guyana, the USA, Iran, Ukraine, the Philippines and Uganda.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future role of the Deputy Secretary-General of the Council of Ministers. [101005]

Mr. Vaz: The Deputy Secretary-General will be responsible for the day to day running of the Council Secretariat and supporting the Secretary-General as appropriate.

EU Stability Pact

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make a statement on the development of a European Union Stability Pact for South Eastern Europe; what finances are involved; which Directorate-Generals are involved; which countries are concerned; what is the purpose of this agreement; what representations he has received from concerned parties; and what Common Financial and Security Policy considerations are covered; [101011]

(2) what staff will be required for the European Union Stability Pact for South Eastern Europe; at what cost; what nationalities will be eligible to join; and from which institutions the Special Co-ordinator will be chosen. [101012]

Mr. Vaz: The founding document of the Stability Pact for South-East Europe places the pact under the auspices of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE). The Special Co-ordinator for the Stability Pact (Bodo Hombach) was appointed by the European Union, after consultation with OSCE Chairman in Office and other Pact participants.

The Office of the Special Co-ordinator is in Brussels. The Office currently has 29 staff, many secondees from participant countries (including the UK). We anticipate that the UK's contribution to cover the costs of the inaugural Summit meeting of the Stability Pact, and the costs incurred in supporting the EU's Special Representative for the Stability Pact until 31 December 1999, will be approximately £225,000.

The Pact brings together the countries of the region, the EU, the USA, Russia, a range of other countries, many international organisations and International Financial institutions. It has been stressed at all Stability Pact meetings that there is a role for FRY when conditions permit. Meanwhile, Montenegro is fully involved in the Pact's work.

The Pact aims to promote peace, stability and democracy in the region. The EU plays a leading role in the Pact. But other international organisations and the IFIs also have a critical role to play. The Pact's strength is as a catalysing and co-ordinating organisation. It is not intended to be a grant-giving body. We will continue to support the implementing agencies (EU, OSCE, IFIs, etc.) through our regular contributions and on a case-by-case basis.

The UK has played an active role in the first meetings of the Regional Table and three Working Tables (covering Democracy/Human Rights, Economic Reconstruction/ Development/Co-operation and Security Issues). These and other meetings and regular bilateral contacts enable us to have a full exchange of views with all Pact participants and the Special Co-ordinator on all aspects of the Stability Pact process.

There was an informal meeting of Stability Pact Foreign Ministers in the margins of the OSCE Summit in Istanbul on 18 November. This provided a useful stock-taking opportunity. Overall progress has been good.

But the Stability Pact has been in existence for less than six months and although early wins are important, sustainable progress in the long-term is the real prize.

Charter of Fundamental Rights

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason the Charter of Fundamental Rights will identify those rights pertaining solely to EU citizens; and what voting procedure will pass the final document. [101004]

Mr. Vaz: The reference in the Cologne Conclusions on rights pertaining to EU citizens is designed to make the Charter an effective showcase of existing EU rights.

The decision-making process in the Charter drafting body is consensus-based. The Cologne Conclusions state that the European Council will propose to the European Parliament and the Commission that, together with the Council, they should solemnly proclaim a European Charter of Fundamental Rights on the basis of the draft document.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the proposals under discussion for the establishment of an EU agency for human rights and democracy; what is the relevant treaty base; if such will fall under the remit of the Common Foreign and Security Policy; and what timescale is envisaged. [101010]

Mr. Hain: In the Vienna Declaration of 10 December 1998, the EU undertook to consider various ways of strengthening its human rights structures. This year's Cologne Council suggested that the advisability of setting up an Agency for Human Rights and Democracy should be considered. We would give careful thought to any such proposal, including how an Agency would fit with existing Common Foreign and Security Policy mechanisms.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the types of rights planned for inclusion into an EU Charter of Fundamental Rights. [101009]

Mr. Vaz: The Charter drafting body has yet to start work. Its first meeting is on 17 December. But the Cologne Conclusions provide some indications of the ground that might be covered. We believe that the Charter should make it easier for EU citizens to know the civil and political rights which they already enjoy under the Treaties.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when his Department first received reports of moves by other EU Governments to propose an EU Charter of Fundamental Rights; and from what initial source. [101006]

Mr. Vaz: There was a specific reference to work on an EU Charter of Rights in the German Presidency Work Programme produced at the turn of the year.

European Security Charter

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the incorporation of Russia into elements of the European Security Charter. [101008]

Mr. Vaz: Like other OSCE participating states, the Russian Federation signed the European Security Charter at the OSCE Summit in Istanbul on 18–19 November 1999. The Charter, which as well as confirming participating states' adherence to previous OSCE commitments sets out principles for future security co-operation in Europe, was the result of lengthy negotiations amongst OSCE participating states, including Russia.

British Deaths (Nigeria)

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of procedures used by British High Commission staff to obtain police reports on the deaths of British citizens in Nigeria. [101363]

Mr. Hain: I am satisfied that the British High Commission in Abuja and the British Deputy High Commission in Lagos do all they properly can to obtain police reports on the deaths of British citizens in Nigeria.

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the occasions when British High Commission staff have met representatives of the Nigerian Government to ask for a copy of the complete police report on the death of Mr. Mark Davey. [101362]

Mr. Hain: British High Commission staff met representatives of the Nigerian Government on the following occasions:

15, 18 and 29 May 1998;
4 August 1998;
27 August 1998;
27 October 1998;
5 March 1999;
8 April 1999;
12 April 1999; and
21 September 1999

In addition, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office Permanent Under-Secretary and Head of the Diplomatic Service raised the issue with the Permanent Secretary at the Nigerian Ministry of Foreign Affairs on 16 February 1999.

The British High Commission has reminded the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on numerous occasions that a copy of the report has not been forthcoming. They have written to officials and Ministers on five occasions and sent Diplomatic notes to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on a further five occasions. I look for opportunities to raise this matter when I visit Nigeria early next year.

The British High Commission will continue to press the Nigerian authorities for a copy of the report.

Torture

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which member countries of the OSCE have failed to eradicate torture and cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment or punishment. [101366]

Mr. Vaz: The issue of torture was discussed at the Human Dimension session of the OSCE Review Conference in Istanbul on 9 November. It was noted that, while torture is prohibited in all OSCE participating states, instances of abuse persist in many parts of the region. No state should be complacent. Eradication of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is a constant process, requiring in particular effective human rights protection for detainees and investigation and punishment of offences.

The Government are funding work by the OSCE to address these issues, for example the production of a handbook on combating torture.

Indonesia

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Indonesia about wildlife conservation, with particular reference to orang-utans and Tanjung Puting National Park; and if he will make a statement. [99675]

Mr. Hain: The Government are concerned that forest degradation, including illegal logging in Indonesia and elsewhere, represents a critical threat to the survival of many species including orang-utans. Officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and other Government departments are in frequent touch with the Indonesian authorities on forest issues. The Government are working with other countries and international institutions to encourage Indonesia urgently to put in place systems to ensure the sustainable management of forests, and the protection of forest habitats. The Department for International Development appointed a Forestry Adviser to Indonesia in January 1999, who is working closely to this end with the Government of Indonesia and local communities.

Kosovo

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current situation in Kosovo; and how long he estimates UK troops will remain there. [101330]

Mr. Vaz: The situation in Kosovo has been transformed in the six months since the deployment of KFOR on 12 July.

KFOR has robust presence throughout Kosovo. The Serbian VJ and MUP forces have withdrawn and their reign of terror and repression has ended. The KLA have been demilitarised. But problems remain. KFOR are having to devote 50 per cent. of their manpower to the protection of minorities, with a permanent presence in Serb communities. Some 1,800 UNMIK police have been deployed covering 60 per cent. of Kosovo but further resources are needed. The murder rate has fallen but crime and violence remain too high. The UK is working with EU partners to help the UN Mission (UNMIK) more effectively to tackle organised crime.

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the proposed export of smoke and incendiary grenades to the Norwegian KFOR contingent in Kosovo; and what assessment he has made of its compatibility with the UN and EU arms embargoes in place in the former Republic of Yugoslavia. [101732]

Mr. Vaz: We have granted a licence for the export to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) of 2,000 incendiary hand grenades and 6,000 coloured smoke grenades for use in de-mining activities by the Norwegian KFOR contingent deployed in Kosovo. These goods are on the UK's military List.

UN Security Council resolution (UNSCR) 1160 imposed an arms embargo on the FRY. The only exception to this embargo is that UNSCR 1244 provides that prohibitions imposed by UNSCR 1160 shall not apply to the sale or supply of arms and related material for the use of the international civil and security presences in Kosovo. Equipment needed for de-mining activities is not covered by the EU arms embargo.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which of his current foreign policy objectives are aided by the ECGD. [101486]

Mr. Hain: ECGD aids the following foreign policy objectives:

Objective 2:

To improve, through international action, economic opportunities for a prosperous UK.

Objective 3:

To improve quality of life worldwide; and develop a strong international community.

Objective 4:

To increase the impact and respect for British foreign policy and values.

Objective 5:

To ensure the UK plays a strong role in a strong Europe, responsive to people's needs.

UN Security Council resolution 1244 established UNMIK and KFOR for an initial deployment of 12 months, to continue thereafter unless the Security Council decided otherwise. We believe the international presence should remain in Kosovo for as long as is necessary to ensure a secure environment for the people of Kosovo to live in peace.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contribution the ECGD makes to Britain's foreign policy objectives. [101485]

Mr. Hain: ECGD contributes to Britain's foreign policy Objective 2 (to improve, through international action, economic opportunities for a prosperous UK) by promoting an safeguarding UK trade and outward investment, and other economic, financial and technological interests overseas; and by developing and implementing arrangements to further free, fair and sustainable trade and economic relations. Objective 3 (to improve quality of life worldwide; and develop a strong international community) is assisted by ECGD encouraging growth and development through out the world; and by international action to protect the environment.

Objective 4 (to increase the impact and respect for British foreign policy and values) is contributed to by ECGD's involvement in multilateral bodies, such as the OECD and Paris Club, and through multilateral and bilateral debt, and debt relief initiatives; by ensuring that international considerations inform government policy-making; and by providing a response to the concerns of Parliament, the public, and the media. Objective 5 is supported (to ensure the UK plays a strong role in a strong Europe, responding to people's needs) by ECGD's involvement in promoting effective EU external policies in the field of export credits.

Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how nuclear test is defined in the context of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty; what the source is of the definition; and if he will make a statement. [101387]

Mr. Hain: The Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty does not set out a definition of a nuclear test. The obligations of parties to the Treaty are contained in Article I. These obligations are not to carry out any nuclear weapons test explosion or any other nuclear explosion, and to prohibit and prevent any such nuclear explosion at any place under its jurisdiction or control. State parties also undertake to refrain from causing, encouraging, or in any way participating in the carrying out of any nuclear weapon test explosion or any other nuclear explosion.

These obligations where drawn up in the course of the treaty negotiations.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty following the failure of the United States Senate to ratify the Treaty. [101389]

Mr. Hain: We have made clear our deep disappointment with the US Senate's vote against ratification of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. We will continue to work with the US Administration, and with other key countries, to bring the Treaty into force as soon as possible.

Russia

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what (a) UK bilateral and (b) NATO financial assistance is being (i) offered and (ii) provided to Russia in relation to (1) decommissioning redundant nuclear weapons and delivery systems, (2) destruction of chemical weapons and (3) other arms control systems; and if he will make a statement. [101384]

Mr. Hain: The UK has provided £35,900,000 in bilateral assistance to support the decommissioning of redundant nuclear weapons. This figure comprises £35 million for equipment to transfer warheads from the Former Soviet Union to Russia between 1992–95 and approximately £900,000 assistance on safeguards and materials accountancy. We have also announced a £5 million bilateral assistance programme to help Russia deal with its nuclear waste and spent fuel legacy. Specific projects are now being considered, but, before we can initiate projects on the ground, we need an adequate legal and financial framework for such assistance. This is under negotiation.

NATO does not provide financial assistance in these areas. At the Washington Summit this year, NATO said that it would consider options for confidence and security-building measures, verification, non-proliferation and arms control and disarmament. The Council in Permanent Session will propose a process to Ministers this month for considering such options.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury announced on 24 November that nuclear safety in the Former Soviet Union would be the subject of cross departmental study in the 2000 Cross-cutting review. The UK is also contributing to ongoing discussions in the EU on a "Joint Action Establishing a European Union Co-operation Programme for Non-proliferation and Disarmament in the Russian Federation."

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the high-level parliamentary visits planned this year to Russia, referred to at paragraph 19 of the paper dated 6 October prepared by his Department and supplied to the Foreign Affairs Committee. [101386]

Mr. Vaz: I refer my hon. Friend to the annexe of Parliamentary visits attached to the supplementary Memorandum submitted to the Foreign Affairs Committee on 2 December. The list of visits for 1999 is as follows:

Parliamentary Visits 1999

January

Ivan Rybkin, President Yeltsin's personal envoy to CIS, plus seven deputies for seminar on standards in public life, organised by Leeds University.

March

Nine MPs, House of Commons Defence Committee.

April

Alexander Shokhin, Chairman of Duma faction of "Our Home is Russia" Party, plus four deputies to London and regions.

North Atlantic Assembly delegation to Moscow.

Five Deputies, Duma Budget Committee (tax sub-committee).

May

Alexander Zhukov, Chairman, Duma Budget Committee plus four deputies Terry Davis, MP (as candidate for Secretary General Council of Europe).

June

Six deputies, Duma Budget Committee (tax sub-committee)'.

Three deputies, Duma Budget Committee (tax sub-committee)'.

Five deputies, Duma Information Policy Committee Nikolai Stolyarov, Deputy Chairman, Duma Foreign Affairs Committee plus four deputies.

Four Deputies, Duma Veterans Committee.

Nineteen deputies to UK for election study visit.

Five MPs to Moscow and Regions.

Six MPs to Moscow, for discussions on Kosovo.

Two deputies to UK (in group of Ministry of Labour officials and NGO representatives).

July

Vladimir Lukin, Chairman, Duma Foreign Affairs Committee, for opening of Scottish Parliament.

Nikolai Stolyarov, Deputy Chairman, Duma Foreign Affairs Committee for Inter-parliamentary seminar on security issues.

September

Lord Cromwell and Dr. Michael Clark, MP to Moscow, for meetings on democracy and governance.

Two Duma deputies, Ivan Rybkin and Viktor Sheinis, for a seminar on media and elections campaigns.

October

Eight MPs from the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee, to Moscow, St. Petersburg and Ekaterinburg.

November

Andrew Tyrie, MP to Moscow, for meetings on human rights issues.

' Separate visits

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reasons the United Kingdom made representations to the Russian Government about the prosecution of the journalists Nikitin and Pasko; and if he will make a statement. [101383]

Mr. Vaz: We, along with our EU partners, have been concerned that the trials of the environmentalists Nikitin and Pasko should be conducted fairly, justly and in accordance with the European Convention on Human Rights. We will continue to monitor both cases.

Russia (QMV)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason qualified majority voting has been introduced into the Common EU strategy on Russia; what was his policy on its introduction; what decisions henceforth will no longer be subject to unanimity; what decisions have been taken under the new procedure; and what is the procedure for restoring the unanimity principle. [101013]

Mr. Vaz: The Treaty on European Union, as amended by the Treaty of Amsterdam, which entered into force on 1 May 1999, provides for the European Council to decide on common strategies unanimously. It also provides for the Council to act by qualified majority when adopting joint actions, common positions, or taking any other decisions on the basis of a common strategy. If a member of the Council declares that it intends for important and stated reasons of national interest to oppose the adoption of a decision to be taken by qualified majority, a vote shall not be taken. The Council may, acting by qualified majority, request that the matter be referred to the European Council for decision by unanimity. No actions have yet been taken on the basis of the common strategy on Russia by qualified majority. We support the new arrangements for the common foreign and security policy put in place by the Treaty of Amsterdam.

Conventional Armed Forces in Europe Treaty

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the extent to which the Conventional Armed Forces in Europe Treaty has been (a) ratified and (b) implemented by the relevant states. [101385]

Mr. Vaz: (a) The Conventional Armed Forces in Europe (CFE) Treaty was ratified by all 30 States and entered into force in July 1992. The adapted CFE Treaty was signed in Istanbul on 19 November 1999. The adapted Treaty will not come into force until all 30 signatories have ratified. This could take some time. In the interim period, the original CFE Treaty remains in force.

(b) While there have been a number of examples of non-compliance, implementation since the Treaty came into force has generally been good. We and our NATO Allies continue to press for full compliance, and have made clear that our ratification of the adapted Treaty will depend upon the level of all Parties' compliance with limits that have been agreed.

State Visits (Policing)

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is standard practice for minutes not be taken of meetings held between officials of his Department and the Metropolitan Police on security matters relating to state visits. [101293]

Mr. Battle: It has not been standard practice to take minutes of such meetings.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he or his officials have had access to minutes taken by the Metropolitan Police of meetings between his officials and the police in relation to the visit of the Chinese President. [101354]

Mr. Battle: There are no such minutes.

Siobhain McDonagh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on those detained by the police during the state visit of the President of China to the UK. [101891]

Mr. Battle: Following a further review, I am now able to give figures for arrests for activities related to the State Visit in all police areas visited by the Chinese President. As I made clear in the Debate on the Address, no-one was charged. As the Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) said on 5 November 1999, Official Report, column 366W, 15 people were arrested in the Metropolitan Police Area. I regret that I may have implied during the Debate on the Address that there were no arrests. I can now confirm that, in addition to those above, one person was arrested in the City of London. There were no arrests in Cambridge. I reconfirm that no one was charged in any of these police areas.

Common Foreign and Security Policy

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the enhancement of non-military crisis response tools within the framework of the Common Foreign and Security Policy, as established in section 56 of the Cologne Presidency Conclusions; to what extent qualified majority voting will apply; what the role will be of (i) national Governments and (ii) the Commission in their deployment; and what is his policy towards the pooling of national civil resources and expertise complementing other CFSP initiatives. [100998]

Mr. Vaz: The Presidency have carried forward the conclusions of the European Council at Cologne on non-military crisis response tools, and will present a report to the European Council at Helsinki suggesting how the Cologne conclusions may be taken further. Decisions on any new arrangements in this area will be taken by consensus. No decisions have yet been taken on the roles of the Commission or of national governments in any new coordinating arrangements. We support better coordination of the various non-military crisis response tools at the disposal of the Community and member states as a way of strengthening the European Union's common foreign and security policy.

Bilateral Visits (US)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a list of major inward and outward bilateral visits to and from the USA since September 1998 compiled on the same basis as the annexe contained in the memorandum dated 5 October submitted by his Department to the Foreign Affairs Committee entitled "The FCO's Role in Promoting British Interests in Relations with Russia". [101388]

Mr. Battle: Once a complete list is available in the early part of next year, it will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Child Care

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has for the strengthening of early years development and child care partnership plans to ensure a comprehensive network of child care provision. [98727]

Ms Hodge: My Department issued planning guidance to assist the early years development and child care partnerships to draw up their updated plans for 2000–01 in September. The guidance emphasises that plans should be working towards comprehensive coverage of child care services. Between May 1997 and end of June 1999, this Administration has created 94,316 new child care places, compared with 74,053 new places created by the out of school child care initiative in the four years between April 1993 and April 1997.

Since September, we have held a series of 14 planning guidance conferences around England attended by over 900 partnership members. As part of an extensive programme of partnership support we have also made a series of two and three day strategic planning modules available to partnerships. These modules offer workshop sessions tailor made to suit the needs of individual partnerships and give an opportunity for partners to identify detailed strategies to implement their early years development and child care plan.

The wider programme of partnership support includes publication of a series of good practice guides, the setting up of quarterly, regional partnership meetings for partnership chairs, lead officers and members, and the issue of regular newsletters and information sheets to partnership members. We are currently assessing partnership training needs and will make training packages available to them by the end of this financial year.

Nursery Places

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list by local education authority the number of additional nursery school places created since May 1997. [100007]

Ms Hodge: Since September 1998, all four-year-olds have been eligible for a free early education place. Currently around 587,000, or 95 per cent., of these places are taken up.

In addition, we are making available £390 million over three years to almost double the number of three-year-olds in England able to access a free early education place. These resources will fund 190,000 new places by March 2002. From September 1999, £40 million of this new money has been allocated to the 57 local education authorities with the highest levels of social need, to create around 48,000 new, free places during 1999–2000. From April 2000, additional funding for three-year-olds will be distributed across all local education authorities, again prioritised by social need.

The table shows the number of places that we expect to be created across all authorities by 2000–01. We have yet to determine the allocation for 2001–02.

New Deal (Heywood and Middleton)

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many clients have joined the New Deal Voluntary Option since its launch (a) nationally and (b) in the constituency of Heywood and Middleton. [100295]

Ms Jowell: From the launch of the New Deal in January 1998 to the end of September 1999, 22,400 young people nationally, and 11 young people in Heywood and Middleton constituency, had left the Gateway to start the Voluntary Sector option.

Early Year Services

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the inspection system for early years services. [99096]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 29 November 1999]: On 2 December, the Care Standards Bill was introduced into another place. Part V of the Bill makes provision for the reform of the regulation of early years services. In particular, it enables the regulation of child care and early years education in England to be brought together under a distinct and new Early Years Directorate in Ofsted.

Part V also makes other important changes to the regulation of child care. For example, it provides for new and uniform national standards for child care. It introduces, for the first time, checks on people working with children aged 8 and over. It will also ensure that overnight care is properly regulated.

These measures will ensure greater consistency in child care provision. They will result in safer environments of a higher quality for children and less bureaucracy for providers. Parents will have access to more information and so make better informed choices. And they will have greater peace of mind knowing that unsuitable people are prevented from caring for their children.

LEA Administration Costs

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much was spent, in cash terms, by local education authorities in England on administration within their education budgets in the most recent year for which information is available. [100928]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table gives information by each local education authority in England for the financial year 1997–98 on central administration expenditure within the local education authorities education budgets.

Labour and Social Affairs Council

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the outcome of the Labour and Social Affairs Council held in Brussels on 29 November; and if he will make a statement. [100994]

Ms Jowell: I represented the UK at this meeting of the Council.

The Council approved the draft Joint Employment Report for 1999, the latest draft Employment Guidelines for 2000 and the latest draft of the Council Recommendation on the implementation of member states' employment policies. These elements were also agreed by the Joint ECOFIN/Social Affairs Council, held on the same day, at which the Secretary of State and I represented the UK. They will now be submitted to the Helsinki European Council on 10–11 December for agreement.

The Council reached political agreement on the Council Decision establishing the Employment Committee.

A Resolution on the employment and social aspects of the Information Society was adopted by the Council. This calls on member states to maximise the job potential of the Information Society through measures related to: learning and research; the world of work and public services.

In the absence of consensus on the provisions for employees involvement in the proposed European Company, Presidency efforts to find a compromise solution will continue in December.

The UK confirmed that it could only accept Article 63(4) as a legal base for extending Regulation 1408/71 (Co-ordination of Social Security Systems to Third Country Nationals). Some other member states supported Articles 42 and 308. The issue will be taken forward under the Portuguese Presidency.

Most member states called for varying degrees of extension of Regulation 1408/71 to cover Third Country Nationals and non-active persons. The UK argued in favour of simplifying the Regulation first and then extending it later as a separate exercise. Discussions will continue under the Portuguese Presidency.

The Council adopted Conclusions on a concerted strategy for modernising and improving social protection and agreed to the establishment of a Group of High Level Officials to exchange information and best practice and to write reports for the Council.

The Council noted a Presidency progress report on the Proposal for a Directive on Physical Agents (Vibration).

The Commissioner presented a package of measures to prohibit discrimination under the new powers of the Amsterdam Treaty (Article 13). There will be a discussion of the package in the appropriate working group in December in order to prepare the work of the Portuguese Presidency.

Employment Pact

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if section II 4 of the Resolution of the European Council on the European Employment Pact permits positive discrimination. [101099]

Ms Jowell: Section II 4 of the Resolution of the Employment Council does not permit positive discrimination and, in any case, has no legal effect.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the implementation of subsidiarity within the Employment Pact, with reference to individual projects planned. [101098]

Ms Jowell: The European Employment Pact is consistent with the principles of subsidiarity. The Pact is an amalgam of three non-binding processes, the existing Luxembourg employment process and the Cardiff economic reform process, and a third, new element, the macro-economic dialogue, termed the 'Cologne process'. There are no new individual projects planned.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his policy regarding the Macro-economic Dialogue, indicated in section 12 of the Resolution of the European Council on the European Employment Pact; and what discussions he has held on the dialogue. [101111]

Ms Jowell: The macro-economic dialogue referred to in section III of the Resolution of the European Council on the European Employment Pact takes place biannually among social partners and fiscal and employment policy makers at EU level. There are two elements, a technical working party which had their first meeting on 29 October 1999 and a political level ministerial meeting which took place for the first time on 8 November 1999. These meetings provided an opportunity for an initial exchange of views.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the Jumbo Council meeting referred to in the report to the Cologne Council on the European Employment Pact. [101113]

Ms Jowell: The Jumbo Council is the meeting of the Finance and Economic Policy Council and the Employment and Social Affairs Council. It meets every six months during each Presidency.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the measures for closer co-operation between EU states within the framework of the European Employment Pact; what new priorities are under discussion; and if he will make a statement on progress made under the Pact. [101110]

Ms Jowell: The European Employment Pact agreed at the Cologne European Council on 3–4 June 1999 brought together three processes. Two of these were the existing Luxembourg employment process and the Cardiff economic reform process. The third, new, element was the macro-economic dialogue, termed the 'Cologne process'. The Pact gives fresh impetus, through the macro-economic dialogue, to the promotion of long term, sustainable job creation in a climate of stability and steady growth.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many jobs his Department estimates have been created as a consequence of decisions taken through the Employment Pact. [101112]

Ms Jowell: The European Employment Pact gives fresh impetus to the existing Luxembourg employment process as well as introducing a macro-economic dialogue process which helps create a climate of stability and steady growth. The UK National Action Plan, produced as part of the Luxembourg process sets out policy initiatives for a medium term strategy to maximise job creation.

Teachers

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) maths and (b) science trainee teachers have been placed in the employment-based route to teaching schemes in each of the three terms of the 1998–99 school year; and what was the average cost per place in each of those terms. [100908]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 2 December 1999]: In the school year 1998–99, the number of training plans approved for the Graduate and Registered Teacher Programmes from people who had secured a placement to teach mathematics or science was as follows:

Term	Mathematics	Science
Autumn 1998	15	9
Spring 1999	9	11
Summer 1999	8	11

The average termly training grant for maths and science programmes approved during 1998–99 was:

Term	Cost (£)
Autumn 1998	1,075.41
Spring 1999	1,051.75
Summer 1999	1,206.53

Middle Schools

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the future of middle, deemed secondary, schools. [101177]

Ms Estelle Morris: Systems of organisation involving middle deemed secondary schools are traditional in some local education authority areas. We recognise that a variety of patterns of organisation are possible, and we support those that are in the best interests of education in the area. Any proposals to change the age range of a school by a full year or more will need to go through the formal statutory proposal process. If there are any objections, the proposals will be decided by a local school organisation committee or, if the committee cannot agree, by an independent adjudicator.

Unauthorised Absence

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average level of unauthorised absence (a) in schools in local education authorities with three-tier school systems and (b) nationally. [101176]

Ms Estelle Morris: Promoting regular school attendance is a key component in the Government's strategy to raise educational standards. Our recently published strategy document "Tackling Truancy Together" sets out our proposals to reduce days lost to education as a result of truancy. A copy has been placed in the Library.

In 1998–99, 0.6 per cent. of half days were missed as a result of unauthorised absence in maintained primary and secondary schools in those local education authorities in England which operated a three-tier system. This compares with an overall national figure of 0.7 per cent. of half days missed.

Head Teachers (Early Retirement)

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many headteachers are eligible to apply to be considered for early retirement under his proposals; and how many retirement packages can be provided from within the funding allocated for the scheme; [101395]

(2) who will determine whether headteachers applying for the Government's early retirement package meet his Department's criteria of not being able to carry forward the major changes envisaged in improving education; and how applicants will be judged against the criteria. [101393]

Ms Estelle Morris: £10 million of Standards Fund money has been made available for 2000–01 to support the early retirement of headteachers. A limit of £50,000 has been placed on the support available in any individual case. This will allow for at least 200 retirements to be supported by the scheme. Local Education Authority employers will determine which of their headteachers appear to meet the scheme's criteria and prioritise those for whom they are applying for support. This Department and OFSTED will consider the evidence provided by LEAs in support of each application and announce during January which applications have been approved.

Teachers' Pay

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the planned expenditure on performance-related pay for teachers over the next two years, broken down by category of expenditure, including (a) training, (b) cost of external assessors and advisers and (c) pay awards for teachers passing through the threshold. [101397]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Government have set aside up to £1 billion over the next two years to fund Green Paper proposals, the vast majority of which is for pay. We have announced a Standards Fund grant of £20 million in 2000–01 for introductory training for performance management and provisionally a further £8 million in 2001–02. We are considering what further training and support might be provided centrally for schools. The costs associated with this training and the external assessors and advisers will be subject to the outcome of negotiations. The Government has proposed to the STRB that teachers should receive up to £2,000 for passing the threshold. There will be no quota on threshold successes and it is not possible therefore to give a total cost in advance; this will depend upon the number of teachers who pass the threshold.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many applications have been received in response to his Department's advertisement for external assessors to operate under the teachers' performance-related pay scheme. [101394]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have received over 3,000 expressions of interest from people wishing to be an external assessor under our proposed threshold arrangements for teachers.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when Hay/McBer will complete its work on the threshold criteria under the teachers' performance-related pay proposals; and when he will publish the criteria. [101391]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has commissioned Hay/McBer to undertake research into the characteristics of effective teaching. In relation to the threshold, they will identify models of good practice which the Department will take into consideration in finalising its proposals for the threshold standards. He intends to invite views on the draft threshold standards early next year.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

DVLA

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will make a statement on the backlog of unopened post at the DVLA; and what operational problems exist at the DVLA; [99106]

(2) what the current waiting time is for driving licence applications; and if he will make a statement. [99105]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 22 November 1999]: Approximately 80,000 items of mail are received at DVLA daily. For security and operational reasons, DVLA post is never opened until the point of processing and therefore there is currently a four to five day queue of unopened mail, which is about normal for the time of year. The level of work awaiting processing is carefully monitored each day.

On the driving licence side, which accounts for 20,000 to 30,000 applications per day, the DVLA undertakes to issue driving licences, including return to the applicant, within three weeks—15 working days—from the date of receipt at the Agency. This three-week standard has been met or bettered consistently throughout the year.

In cases where a driver declares a medical condition—amounting to some 1,100 applications a day—because of the increased complexities the service standard is five weeks for a car licence and seven weeks for a bus or lorry licence. Some current cases in these categories are taking longer. Action is being taken to bring this service up to standard and the position is steadily improving.

There are no exceptional operational difficulties at the Agency. Over the pas 18 months, major changes to both driver and vehicle computer systems have been successfully introduced.

Ruddy Duck

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the direct cost is to his Department of each ruddy duck shot this season as part of the Central Science Laboratory's culling programme. [99592]

Mr. Mullin: The cost of the control trial is approximately £800,000 over four financial years. The aims of the control trail are to test the feasibility of eradicating the UK's population of ruddy duck within ten years, determining the financial cost of such a programme and indicating the number of birds needed to be culled each year to achieve this.

Additionally, the control trial aims to identify the factors which will impact on any national programme, such as whether compulsory access to land would be necessary, the distribution and numbers of ducks at various sites, methods of control dependent upon differing habitats and the number of visits needed to individual sites. Due to the many varied aspects and requirements of this control trial, a cost of controlling each individual duck was not requested from the contractors.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many ruddy duck have been shot by the Central Science Laboratory this season. [99598]

Mr. Mullin: The control trial is being undertaken in three areas of the country: Western Midlands, Anglesey where the control is all year round, and Fife, where the control is post-season only. The control trial does not focus on the numbers of birds culled, it looks at the wider picture of how the control is progressing given the various conditions, such as habitat, numbers of birds at each site, migratory movements, access to land, and number of site visits. However, between March and end of September 1999, with control only taking place in two of the regions, over 12 per cent. of the total national ruddy duck population was culled. At the conclusion of the first year, the contractors will produce a detailed report one aspect of which will be the number of birds culled.

River Thames

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions who has responsibility for search and rescue on the River Thames in the event of an emergency. [99624]

Mr. Hill: Her Majesty's Coastguard is responsible for the initiation and co-ordination of civil maritime search and rescue within the United Kingdom search and rescue region. That region includes all tidal waters within UK territorial limits, and so includes the tidal River Thames.

Within that, responsibility for search and rescue on the Thames is undertaken by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA), the Port of London Authority (PLA) and the Metropolitan Police; under detailed Memoranda of Understanding (MoU) between them, MCA retains overall responsibility and also handles incidents in the Thames estuary upstream to Canvey Island as part of its coastal operation. Under the MoU between MCA and the PLA, the PLA co-ordinates search and rescue incidents on the rest of tidal Thames, west of Canvey Island to Teddington Lock. PLA in turn have an MoU with the Metropolitan Police, covering the Thames between Crayfordness and Teddington, under which the Police assume responsibility for handling major incident in that area.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set out the division of responsibilities between the Marine Coastguard Agency, the River Police (Thames Division), the Fire Brigade and the Port of London Authority for safety on the River Thames. [99622]

Mr. Hill: The Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA) is responsible for developing, promoting and enforcing high standards of marine safety; for minimising loss of life among seafarers and coastal users; and for responding to maritime emergencies 24 hours a day. This responsibility applies to the River Thames where MCA is responsible for the initiation and co-ordination of search and rescue.

The Port of London Authority (PLA) is responsible for the maintenance of the safety of navigation and for the conservancy of the tidal Thames. Under a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) with the MCA, the PLA also co-ordinates search and rescue incidents west of Canvey Island to Teddington Lock. The PLA in turn has an MoU with the Metropolitan Police covering the Thames between Crayfordness and Teddington, under which the Police assume responsibility for any major incident in that area.

The Metropolitan Police Service (MPS) Thames Division is responsible for the prevention of crime and disorder, high visibility patrolling and emergency policing response, which includes saving or preserving life when called upon to do so. It has general responsibility for the co-ordination of the response to civil emergencies. Accordingly, the MPS assumes responsibility for any major incident between Crayfordness and Teddington. But it does not provide a dedicated search and rescue facility.

The London Fire Brigade (LFB) has designated responsibility for fire fighting and the provision of fire prevention information and advice. It has no designated responsibility for river rescue. With a view to increasing flexibility of river borne operations, it recently took delivery of two new fast response craft. While the primary purpose of these craft is for firefighting, they can be used to assist rescue operations and are equipped to do so. In the event of a serious incident on the Thames, the LFB would place their vessels and themselves at the disposal of the other relevant authorities to help rescue casualties.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions the Regional Marine Safety Committee has met; who are the members; what recommendations it has made on safety on the Thames; and how many recommendations have not been acted on. [99620]

Mr. Hill: The London District Marine Safety Committee covers safety on the Thames. It is chaired by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency and has met on 11 occasions. Its members are representatives of HM Coastguard; Norfolk County Council; London Fire and Civil Defence Authority; Environment Agency; Port of London Authority; Health and Safety Executive; Trinity House; the Metropolitan Police; P&O European Ferries; Stena Line; F T Everard and Sons; National Federation of Fisherman's Organisations; Royal Yachting Association and Upper Thames Passenger Boat Association.

The main purpose of District Marine Safety Committees is to keep under review the distribution of responsibilities for safety, rescue and control of pollution on inland and coastal waters. They facilitate communication between interested parties and resolve local issues quickly. In fulfilling this role the London District Safety Committee, its sub-committees and working groups have considered a wide range of issues, many relevant to safety on the Thames. Achievements include development of model guidelines for Port Emergency Plans; assisting in the development of two Codes of Practice, one for local authorities and one for users, on Personal Watercraft; providing guidance on manning scales for small passenger boats; development of an inland waterway boat activity matrix as a basis for risk assessment and development of emergency plans for stretches of water with significant usage.

The London District Marine Safety Committee has made recommendations of more general interest to the annual National Marine Safety Steering Group Committee and its successor, the Marine Safety Co-ordinating Committee. Of particular relevance was a recommendation on the need to introduce more specific regulation to control alcohol abuse; a public consultation document was issued on 2 December 1999.

Child Passengers (Risks)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the risk involved in children (a) travelling as car passengers and (b) travelling as motorcycle pillion passengers; and if he will make a statement. [100011]

Mr. Hill: There were 85 child car passenger casualties per 100 million km travelled between 1996 and 1998 in Great Britain. Of these, seven per 100 million km were fatal or serious.

The number of children identified in the National Travel Survey making journeys as motorcycle pillion passengers over the last five years has been too small to provide a reliable estimate for the population as a whole.

The absolute numbers of child passenger casualties in the past three years are as shown in the table.

Child passenger casualties (aged 0–15) in Great Britain: 1996–98

	1996	1997	1998	1996–98
Two-wheel motor vehicle passengers

Total	15,329	15,841	15,742	46,912

Croydon Tramlink

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when Croydon Tramlink will be fully operational and open to the public. [100437]

Mr. Hill: This is a matter for Tramtrack Croydon Ltd. (TCL), the private sector consortium which holds the concession to build, operate and maintain the tram system. I understand that TCL's latest programme has an opening date for the full system in February 2000.

Scooters

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made in enabling scooters to be conveyed on trains since February 1997. [100727]

Mr. Hill: The position is little changed. The majority of train operating companies and, indeed, other transport operators, will not carry scooters. The difficulty is that many are physically too big to be accommodated, or they are not sufficiently stable to travel safely.

We are continuing to work with the wheelchair manufacturing industry to develop a system of labelling mobility equipment which is transportable. This will help disabled people to choose a scooter or wheelchair to suit their particular lifestyle.

Auxiliary Coastguards

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in how many coastguard stations in the UK auxiliary coastguards have operated digital selective calling in the last 12 months; for what period the emergency has lasted; how many auxiliary coastguards have been trained in the last year; and where they are located. [100665]

Mr. Hill: There have been no occasions on which Auxiliary Coastguards have operated digital selective calling in emergency situations in the last 12 months. 73 Auxiliary Coastguards have been trained in the last year and details of where they are located is summarised in the following table:

Coastguard Region	Auxiliary Coastguards having received familiarisation	Location
West of Scotland and Northern Ireland Region	59 in total	Greenock, Ardossan, Campbeltown, Tarbert and Islay
North East Scotland	2 in total	Kirkwall and Wick
Eastern	0	—
West	0	—
South-East	0	—
South-West	12 in total	St. Marys, Isles of Scilly, Lizard, Lands End, Trevose Head

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many training courses have been given to auxiliary coastguards in the operation of digital selective calling. [100664]

Mr. Hill: The training of Auxiliary Coastguards to operate Digital Selective Calling is undertaken on the job as part of their annual training programme, therefore specific training courses are not necessary.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what funding has been made available to the Marine and Coastguard Agency for training auxiliary coastguards to operate digital selective calling in case of an emergency involving the failure of radio equipment. [100663]

Mr. Hill: Training of Auxiliary Coastguards who may be required to operate digital selective calling, eg in the case of an emergency involving the failure of radio equipment, is provided on the job. Funding for this would be met from the overall Auxiliary Coastguard budget which was increased by 6.5 per cent. for the financial year 1999–2000.

Rent

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he has taken to monitor the performance of the Greater Manchester Rent Officer Service in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [100769]

Mr. Mullin: Rent Officers are independent statutory officers, and my Department does not intervene in their decisions. Until recently, the conduct and performance of rent officers in Greater Manchester were the responsibility of the Chief Rent Officer for the Greater Manchester Rent Registration Area, under the supervision of a Proper Officer appointed by Manchester City Council. However, on 1 October the Rent Service was established as an Executive Agency of my Department. The Agency is committed to ensuring consistency and raising standards throughout the Rent Service.

Road Noise

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the list of the responses he has received to the Government's announcement of new measures to help alleviate noise on motorways and trunk roads. [100177]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 30 November 1999]: The Government's announcement of the budget and the criteria on 22 March this year to deal with some of the most serious and pressing cases of traffic noise on existing trunk roads did not invite responses. However, as a result of the announcement a further 43 sites have been brought to our attention, of which 23 have been taken forward for further study.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had recently with (a) the European Commission and (b) other EU ministers with regard to a common system of road noise measurement, and methods of alleviating road noise. [100172]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 30 November 1999]: Although there have not been recent Ministerial discussions on these issues, my Department is co-operating in a number of EU initiatives on noise, including work to finalise a Directive which, for the first time, would specify standards and limits for the noise generated by tyres.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on levels of noise nuisance to nearby residents which are caused by noise emanating from nearby motorways and trunk roads. [100216]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 30 November 1999]: The Highways Agency is currently undertaking detailed studies at a considerable number of locations with a view to identifying appropriate measures to reduce excessive levels of noise at nearby properties. The results of these studies are not yet available.

Untaxed Cars

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions with which agency the responsibility to pursue the owners of untaxed cars lies; and if he will make a statement. [100790]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 30 November 1999]: The responsibility for pursuing the keepers of unlicensed vehicles rests with the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency (DVLA). The Agency works closely with the police and traffic wardens to detect unlicensed vehicles on the public road. Where an offence has been confirmed, action is taken through out of court settlement or, in the more serious cases, by prosecution.

Last year successful action was taken against 475,000 tax dodgers with some £57.9 million recovered in fines and penalties. In addition, 125,000 evaders or potential evaders relicensed their vehicles as a direct result of enforcement action bringing in a further £15 million.

Road Diggings

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his policy on the use of permanent reinstatement materials by utility companies when they dig up paved roads and footways. [101135]

Mr. Hill: Utilities carrying out street works are required to reinstate the street in accordance with the Specification for the Reinstatement of Openings in Highways, which is a statutory code of practice published under the New Roads and Street Works Act 1991. The specification requires the permanent reinstatement to match the original surface materials as closely as possible.

Public Transport (Women)

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the initiatives taken since May 1997 on women and public transport usage, indicating in each case the (a) date of the initiative, (b) budget and (c) impact assessment carried out; and if he will make a statement. [100886]

Mr. Hill: As women are the main users of public transport, our "New Deal for Transport" is of particular importance to them. It has put a greater emphasis on providing better quality transport services; on providing safer public transport; on improving the quality of the pedestrian environment; and on promoting land-use policies which encourage local services. The Commission for Integrated Transport will also take full account of women's transport needs.

A number of initiatives have been—and will be—undertaken to improve the general availability and accessibility of public transport; for example, through Local Transport Plans, Bus Quality Partnerships and the national public transport information system. More specifically, we are finalising the production of a gender audit to assist transport planners and operators to develop and implement public transport systems that meet women's transport requirements and encourage sustainable development. The audit will be available in the new year.

We are also continuing to make use of consultations, research projects and disaggregated statistics to identify the impact of policy on women. We also require the inclusion of policy appraisal statements in each Ministerial policy submission.

A380 Kingskerswell Bypass

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will include the A380 Kingsherswell bypass in his review of future road building. [101049]

Mr. Hill: The A380 Kingskerswell bypass was withdrawn from the trunk road programme in 1996 and, indeed, the A380 no longer forms part of the Trunk Road Network. Responsibility for the promotion of any such scheme lies with Torbay Council and Devon County Council which would have to consider it within the context of their respective Local Transport Plans. The Authorities are currently undertaking a joint study along the A380 corridor, which is to be developed for inclusion within their final Local Transport Plans, due for submission in July 2000.

Countryside (Public Access)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to increase public access to woodlands and river banks; and if he will make a statement. [101215]

Mr. Mullin: The Government's plans, announced in March this year, to introduce a new statutory right of access on foot to specified categories of open countryside—mountain, moor, heath, down and registered common land—will be included in the countryside Bill which was announced in the Queen's Speech. At the Government's request, the Countryside Agency, the Countryside Council for Wales and the Forestry Commission have recently reported on the case for extending public access to other types of open countryside, such as coast, woodland and riverside. We are considering their views carefully before deciding how best to proceed.

London Underground

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what amount has been spent since 20 March 1998 on (a) legal, (b) financial and (c) other consultancy costs for the public private partnership for London Underground; and (i) what were the initial budgets and (ii) what are the future estimates for future consultancy work. [101082]

Mr. Hill: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given on 12 May 1999, Official Report, columns 154–55W. I shall shortly be reporting London Transport's expenditure on external consultants up to the end of the first half of the current financial year. London Transport will not know the overall requirements or costs for external advice until the Public-Private Partnership (PPP) transaction has been completed, but the Government are working with LT to ensure that we receive the best advice while minimising the overall costs of implementing the PPP.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list research published by the London Underground task force; and if he will make a statement on its future work programme. [101080]

Mr. Hill: The Task Force for London Transport has published no research. Its role is to ensure that the extra resources London Transport were given in July, translate into real improvements for passengers.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the findings of the task force set up to monitor improvements to London Underground indicating how often the task force has met and when. [100952]

Mr. Hill: The Task Force monitors investment in the London Underground to ensure the delivery of improvements to passengers; this work is on-going. The task force meets every month.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the number of delays to passenger services of 15 minutes or more for each line of the London Underground for 1998 and 1999. [100946]

Mr. Hill: London Underground Limited (LUL) are responsible for delays for the day-to-day running of their Underground network, including any delays to services. LUL have provided the information set out in the table.

Westminster Underground Station

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Westminster Underground Station on the Jubilee Line will open. [101081]

Mr. Hill: London Transport aim to open the Jubilee Line station at Westminster shortly before Christmas. It is, however, a deep and complex station, being constructed on a constricted site. LT cannot therefore guarantee the opening date at present.

Essex County Council Press Officer

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to the oral statement of the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Stretford and Urmston (Ms Hughes) of 24 November 1999, Official Report, column 731, on what evidence the Minister based her statement that an Essex County Council press officer contacted newspapers and other media outlets in Essex, indicating the media outlets contacted and the dates and means of contact. [100844]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The statement was based on information received from the County Council and the Programme Officer. The media outlets contacted were as follows:

Evening Gazette
Evening Echo
East Anglian Daily Times
Essex Courier
Epping Gazette
Herts and Essex Observer
Yellow Advertiser
BBC Essex
Essex FM
Anglia TV
BBC TV East
BBC Newsroom Southeast

All the above mentioned outlets were contacted on 3 November, by fax. Additionally, the Essex Chronicle was dealt with in the manner I alluded to in my oral statement.

Housing Stock

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he has in place to help local authorities in relation to large-scale voluntary transfer of housing stock. [101084]

Mr. Mullin: My Department has published comprehensive guidance on the stock transfer process, which is designed to assist local authorities who are transferring all or part of their housing stock to a Registered Social Landlord. Other measures in place include (a) the ability to use capital resources (i.e. provision for credit liabilities) rather than revenue to meet the cost of premium payments which arise when outstanding loans with the Public Works Loan Board are repaid early; (b) allowing authorities to capitalise for up to three years after transfer which additional rent allowance expenditure would otherwise fall on the general fund; (c) allowing authorities to value their stock using a discount rate of 7 per cent. rather than 8 per cent. as previously, thereby increasing the size of their capital receipt; and (d) guidance about warranties.

M6

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has for widening the M6 motorway between Preston and Birmingham. [101348]

Mr. Hill: I have no plans to widen the M6 between Preston and Birmingham.

My noble Friend the Minister with responsibility for roads and road safety announced on 23 March the programme of multi-modal and roads-based studies proposed in the Roads Review. The West Midlands to North West Conurbation Study, including the M6 between junctions 11 and 20, is in Tranche 1 of this programme. I have pleasure in announcing that this study has recently been awarded to consultants and will be completed by the summer of 2001.

The consultants will be asked to indicate a comprehensive range of strategies across all modes that could be used to tackle the traffic problems in the area, and encourage modal shift especially for freight.

As regards the M6 between junction 20 and the Scottish Border, the Highways Agency are seeking to develop a route management strategy study starting in the spring of 2000.

Transport Council

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what matters concerning air traffic control will be decided at the 9 to 10 December Transport Council. [101624]

Mr. Mullin: Although there will be an exchange of views on air traffic management at the Transport Council on 9 and 10 December, no decisions on any matters concerning air traffic control will be taken.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place a copy of the Commission Communication on air traffic delays which will be discussed at the Transport Council on 9 to 10 December in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [101610]

Mr. Mullin: A copy of the final version of the Commission's Communication on "the creation of a single European sky" will be placed in both Libraries of the House as soon as it is received.

Eurocontrol

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the final decision will be made on the EU membership of Eurocontrol; and if he will make a statement. [101623]

Mr. Mullin: Negotiations between Eurocontrol and the European Community on the terms and conditions for Community accession to Eurocontrol are still in progress. It is hoped to conclude them early next year.

Domestic Airline Routes

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the Government are doing to encourage competition in the main domestic airline routes in the United Kingdom. [101299]

Mr. Mullin: The Government believe that the interests of UK consumers are best served by ensuring that a framework exists within which airlines can compete freely to provide services. The UK strongly supported the creation of the European Single Aviation Market for scheduled, chartered and air cargo services, which came into force on 1 January 1993.

Within the Single Market, Community carriers may offer the services they wish and set fares according to their commercial judgment. It is therefore open for any Community air carrier to offer domestic air services on routes within the UK, if it considers that such services are commercially viable. It will often be the case however, in the UK as elsewhere, that demand on domestic air routes is insufficient to support competitive provision of services.

Housing Capital Resources

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends to make an announcement about the distribution to local authorities of housing capital resources for 2000–01. [101644]

Mr. Raynsford: Details of housing capital allocations for local authorities for 2000–01 will be announced tomorrow. I am arranging for tables giving individual Housing Investment Programme allocations to be placed in the Library of the House. These tables will also show the performance band in which each authority has been placed.

HEALTH

Nurses National Register

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many registered nurses have been struck off the national register held by the UK Central Council for Nurses and Midwives and subsequently reinstated, and in what time period this reinstatement occurred, since the creation of the UK Central Council for Nurses and Midwives for (a) all disciplinary issues and (b) cases involving care of the elderly. [98469]

Mr. Denham: In the period since 1 July 1983, when the United Kingdom Central Council for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting was first established, to 31 March 1999, 1,098 practitioners have been removed from, and 256 restored to the register. Further information on this and on cases involving care of the elderly is available from the UKCC.

Nursing Vacancies (West Surrey)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurse vacancies exist in West Surrey Health Authority. [99911]

Mr. Denham: The number of nurse vacancies in West Surrey Health Authority area as at 31 March 1999 is given in the table.

	Total vacancies	3 month vacancies
Qualified nurses	310	260
Unqualified nurses	50	40

Notes:
Total vacancies are those posts trusts were actively trying to fill.
Hard to fill vacancies are those posts that were vacant for three months or more at 31 March 1999.
Figures are rounded to the nearest 10 as hard to fill

Tooth Whiteners

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the removal of tooth whiteners from sale following its change of status from a medical device to a cosmetic. [100661]

Dr. Howells: I have been asked to reply.

I have received 51 representations on tooth whiteners, comprised of 32 letters from Parliamentary colleagues, seven Parliamentary questions and 12 letters from industry and the public following the confirmation from the Court of Appeal that these products are subject to the provisions of the Cosmetics Directive.

Avon Health Authority

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of Avon Health Authority's scheme to reduce out-patient waiting times by guaranteeing a number of out-patient appointments for each primary care group. [100641]

Mr. Denham: Avon Health Authority, working with local general practitioners and National Health Service trusts, is looking at ways of improving orthopaedic waiting times. As part of this work, the health authority is considering whether the successful pilot scheme, operated by North Bristol NHS Trust and North West Bristol Primary Care Group, which guarantees individual GP practices a specified number of out-patient appointments can be extended across the health authority area. No formal assessment of the North Bristol pilot scheme has been undertaken by the NHS Executive. We welcome local initiatives to reduce out-patient waiting times by involving PCGs.

Denplan

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS dentists have required their patients to take out insurance with Denplan in the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [100625]

Mr. Hutton: Information is not available on the number of dentists who decide to de-register some or all of their National Health Service patients, and at the same time offer to provide future care and treatment under a private arrangement, which may include an insurance plan such as Denplan.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the work of the Multiple Sclerosis Society Young Carers Project. [100830]

Mr. Hutton: While the Department has made no specific assessment of this project, we are aware of the valuable work of the Multiple Sclerosis Society in this and other fields. The Department is however, working closely with local authorities, health authorities, the voluntary sector, and young people themselves to implement our commitment to young carers as outlined in the National Carers Strategy.

Anaesthetists

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many operations have been cancelled in the last 12 months at Bolton Royal Hospital due to unavailability of an anaesthetist. [100921]

Mr. Denham: Over the last twelve months, no operations were cancelled at the Royal Bolton Hospital due to the unavailability of an anaesthetist. All consultant anaesthetist posts at the hospital are currently filled and two additional consultants are expected to be appointed early next year.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many operations have been cancelled at (a) St. Bartholomew's Hospital, (b) the Royal London Hospital in Whitechapel and (c) the Homerton Hospital in Hackney due to the lack of availability of an anaesthetist. [101409]

Mr. Denham: Since April 1999, St. Bartholomew's Hospital has cancelled an estimated three operations, the Royal London Hospital an estimated 14 operations and the Homerton Hospital no operations, due to illness or absence of anaesthetic staff, or because an anaesthetist was called away to deal with a clinical emergency. Currently, all consultant anaesthetist posts within the Homerton National Health Service Trust are filled.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to ensure the availability of anaesthetists, and to prevent operations being cancelled due to their absence. [101410]

Mr. Denham: At national level, numbers of higher specialist trainees in anaesthetics have been reviewed recently and we are satisfied there are sufficient to meet National Health Service demands for consultant anaesthetists over the next few years. Currently, there are enough higher specialist trainees in anaesthetics, for there to be around 1,280 extra qualifying for consultant posts by 2005. It will be for individual NHS trusts and health authorities who are accountable for the quality of the services they provide, to determine the number, grade and mix of staff they will require to deliver quality services in their location.

Health Expenditure (Leicestershire)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what capital projects have been approved in Leicestershire during (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99, (d) 1999–2000 and (e) 2000–01. [101056]

Mr. Denham: Figures are provided in the table. Capital schemes for 2000–01 are still awaiting approval.

Year	NHS Trust	Capital project	Amount £ million
1996–97	Leicester Royal Infirmary	Linear Accelerators	2.7
1997–98	—	—	—
1998–99	Leicestershire Mental Health Services[1]	Elderly Psychiatric Disorder/Elderly High Dependency Unit	9.2
1998–99	Leicestershire Mental Health Services[1]	Community Mental Health Teambase	1.1

Year	NHS Trust	Capital project	Amount £ million
1999–2000	Leicester General Hospital	Satellite Dialysis (Lincoln County Hospital site)	1.1
1999–2000	Leicestershire and Rutland Healthcare	Loughborough District General Hospital (Phase II)	9.4

[1] On 1 April 1999 Leicestershire Mental Health Services National Health Service Trust and Fosse Health NHS Trust merged to form Leicestershire and Rutland Healthcare NHS Trust.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what has been the average level of increase in percentage terms for health authorities for 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000; and what has been the percentage increase for Leicestershire Health Authority; [101055]

(2) what level of funding would be received by Leicestershire Health Authority if it was funded at 100 per cent. of weighted capitation. [101054]

Mr. Denham: Leicestershire Health Authority's weighted capitation target for 1999–2000 is £530.78 million.

The table shows the average cash increase for health authorities for 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000 and the cash increase for Leicestershire Health Authority.

Year	Average cash increase in percentage terms	Leicestershire Health Authority cash increase in percentage terms
1997–98	3.93	4.28
1998–99	4.70	5.19
1999–2000	6.60	7.15

Anti-bullying Policies

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, by region, those NHS trusts which have implemented anti-bullying policies. [100937]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 2 December 1999]: Bullying of staff, in whatever form it may take, is unacceptable and should not be tolerated by any National Health Service employer. Information on local anti-bullying policies is not collected centrally, but may be obtained from individual National Health Service employers.

The National Health Service depends on the skill and dedication of its staff. Providing staff with a good, safe working environment free from discrimination and harassment is a key priority for local managers.

Radiation

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken on whether persorption and translocation expose certain subgroups of the population to increased radiation doses. [100861]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The Department has funded, and continues to fund, research into the phenomenon of persorption (absorption of particulate material through the gut wall). This research has demonstrated that particulate material can be persorped and translocated in some animal models under very specific biological conditions. However, further work is required to determine whether this would increase the dose to those tissues affected.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken into the risks associated with ingestion and inhalation of radioactive particles. [100854]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) has a comprehensive programme of research on the biokinetics and dosimetry of inhaled particles, including human studies of particle deposition and clearance and animal studies of particle dissolution in the lung. Complementary studies on ingested particles have also been undertaken. These studies have the aim of improving estimates of dose and risk by providing information for the development of biokinetic and dosimetric models. In recent years, many of these studies have been carried out with partial support from the European Commission in multi-partner projects involving institutions in several member states. The NRPB has recently participated in a review of risks from ingested and inhaled particles, and in the development of a database of experiments on radionuclide biokinetics, undertaken for the European Late Effects Programme funded by the European Commission. The Department has also funded studies on the behaviour and effects of inhaled and systemically administered radioactive particles.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken on methods for assessing the relative biological effectiveness of Auger-emitting radionuclides. [100858]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The National Radiation Protection Board has undertaken studies of the biokinetics, dosimetry and relative biological effectiveness (RBE) of the Auger-emitting nuclide, zinc-65. The method used to compare the RBE of zinc-65 and x-rays was to measure chromosome damage in cultured prostate cells either incubated with zinc-65 or exposed to x-rays. The NRPB has recently contributed to a review of data on Auger-emitting nuclides, undertaken for the European Late Effects Programme, funded by the European Commission. The Department is also currently funding research into the effects of Auger emitters which is not yet complete.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the risks from low doses and low dose rates of ionising radiation; and what research his Department is (a) undertaking and (b) has commissioned on this subject. [100841]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 December 1999]: Since 1986, the Department and its predecessor, the Department of Health and Social Security, has administered the Radiological Protection Research Programme. The objective of this programme is to identify the research which is needed to inform policy development in the area of low level radiation exposure (both ionising and non-ionising), its effects, and the need to quantify the risk to public health and to implement appropriate preventative measures. The programme has funded many individual research projects designed to examine these aspects of radiation exposure. During that 14-year period, the Department has had a considerable number of representations on the effects of low level radiation exposure from both individuals and groups representing a large variety of environmental concerns.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department will commission research into the health effects of (a) ingested and (b) inhaled uranium as a result of exposure to ammunition containing depleted uranium. [100842]

Yvette Cooper: The Department has not commissioned any research into the effects of exposure to depleted uranium and has no plans to do so.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what epidemiological research his Department has (a) undertaken and (b) commissioned into the health effects of aqueous and atmospheric discharges of radioactive isotopes from licensed nuclear sites in England and Wales. [100843]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The Department is funding a project entitled "Geographical variations in childhood cancer incidence generally and in relation to nuclear installations." The contract is held by the Childhood Cancer Research Group in Oxford but is a multi-centre collaboration so that all cases of childhood cancer in Great Britain (England, Scotland and Wales) between 1969 and 1993 can be included in the study. The study will be looking at variations in incidence rate in relation to socio-demographic factors, clustering, population mixing, nuclear installations and parental preconceptual irradiation.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken on the relationship between the chemical form of specific radionuclides and their localisation in the body. [100860]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The Department has funded research into whether the chemical form (speciation) of particular radionuclides effects their uptake. Currently, the Department is funding a study of the gastro-intestinal uptake by critical populations of certain radionuclides found in the general environment, such as strontium. The results, when available, will be used to test the validity of uptake models.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how the radiation dose from plutonium incorporated in tracheo-bronchial lymph nodes is determined. [100853]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 December 1999]: There are two methods that are currently in widespread use by the radiation protection profession around the world. Both were developed by the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP). The first is the ICRP 30 Lung Model, the second the ICRP Human Respiratory Tract Model for Radiological Protection (HRTM). The approaches in both are broadly similar to each other, but HRTM is based on more recent information and understanding. In particular, the parameters used in the HRTM to calculate the amounts of inhaled materials retained in the tracheobronchial lymph nodes (TBLN) were based on numerous measurements of radionuclides in lungs and TBLN from tissues taken at autopsies.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken to establish whether plutonium isotopes concentrate in human gonads. [100856]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The Department has funded research to establish whether plutonium concentrates in human gonads. The project, using extremely low levels of a very pure form of plutonium-237 in volunteers, demonstrated that plutonium does not concentrate in human testes.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken into whether radionuclides concentrate in human gonads. [100855]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The Department relies on advice on this matter from the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB). As part of a programme of research on the biokinetics and dosimetry of radionuclides, NRPB have measured the retention of radionuclides in the testes of rodents and, in collaboration with the Paterson Institute for Cancer Research, studied mechanisms of uptake. Work has concentrated on the behaviour of naturally occurring and artificial alpha emitters and also Auger emitters, because of the importance of the relative position of the retained nuclide and target cells for these short range emissions. Most radionuclides do not concentrate selectively in the gonads. The NRPB's Assessment of Internal Doses to Subjects in the Health and Safety Executive Follow-up to Gardner Study involved calculating doses to testes from incorporated radionuclides for a group of Sellafield workers. As a part of this project, information relating to radionuclide retention in the testes was reviewed. Particular attention was paid to plutonium. From the data available, it was found that only between one thousandth and one ten thousandth part of the plutonium taken up by the body ended up in the testes.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken on the interaction between ionising radiation and other environmental agents. [100857]

Yvette Cooper: The Department has funded research in an attempt to examine the interaction between ionising radiation and other environmental agents, specifically the interaction between gamma rays and benzene. These experiments proved very difficult to perform in realistic biological systems and the results were inconclusive. Further information on the mechanisms of interaction between radiation and other environmental agents remains a priority for research.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken on methods for assessing the relative biological effectiveness of natural alpha-emitting radioisotopes. [100859]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The National Radiation Protection Board has undertaken experimental studies of the biokinetics and dosimetry of naturally-occurring alpha-emitting radioisotopes of thorium, uranium and polonium, with the aim of improving estimates of dose and risk from exposure to these radionuclides. An NRPB study of the relative biological effectiveness (RBE) of in-utero exposure of mice to plutonium-239 alpha emissions, chromosome damage in bone marrow cells of offspring was compared in animals exposed to either plutonium-239 or x-rays. This methodology is applicable to naturally occurring alpha-emitting nuclides and avoids large-scale studies of tumour induction. The Department is also funding studies in animals on the effects of inhaled radon. These studies, concentrating on dose and dose rate effects in the induction of lung cancer, will provide information for the assessment of RBE.

Audiology Services

Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made by the review into hearing aid and audiology services; and when he will receive the report of the review. [101142]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 2 December 1999]: The National Health Service Executive established a working group to take a closer look at hearing aid services and the part they play in a modern NHS. Ways of developing hearing aid services are currently being considered.

Childline

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of Childline; and if he will make a statement. [100945]

Mr. Hutton: The Department is committed to ensuring that voluntary organisations in receipt of section 64 funding gain maximum benefit from this financial support. The Department constantly keeps under review grants awarded, to check that the voluntary organisations such as Childline are performing effectively and the grants continue to take forward departmental policy priorities and objectives.

As part of this process, during the autumn of 1997, Childline had a routine but in depth inspection by the Department. The report was extremely positive, describing Childline as a significant national organisation. The monitoring, evaluation and review arrangements attached to grants received by voluntary organisations such as Childline, requires them to provide us with an annual report on the way the Department's funding has been used. The report gives a detailed account of what has been achieved during the preceding financial year.

Over its 10-year existence, Childline's achievements have been considerable. In particular, the agency has identified a previously largely unrecognised need; established a unique non-statutory service shaped from the start by children themselves in the way they used the service and the needs they expressed; built a good reputation becoming well respected and credible in the field; and maintained a very clear image to the public through the purity and consistency of its focus.

Cancer Treatment

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his estimate is of the (a) number of patients to be treated, (b) number of beds, (c) number of consultant surgeons and (d) revenue budget for the financial year 2000–01 for (i) the Royal Marsden Hospital in London and (ii) the Christie Hospital in Manchester. [101492]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not yet available. The National Health Service trusts responsible for the Royal Marsden and the Christie Hospitals are currently developing plans but are unable to give estimates due to the number of variable factors which will affect forecasts this far in advance.

Long-term Care

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish the Government's response to the report of the Royal Commission on long-term care. [101351]

Mr. Hutton: I refer my hon. Friend to the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the House on 2 December 1999, Official Report, columns 444–54.

Nurses

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS trusts have awarded the 12 per cent. pay rise to newly qualified nurses. [101355]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not centrally available.

All National Health Service bodies employing nurses on national contracts should have implemented the pay scales set out in Advance Letter (NM) 1/99 issued to the service on the 8 April 1999.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what financial incentives he has evaluated for E-grade nurses, ward sisters and charge nurses. [101356]

Mr. Denham: This year nurses got their biggest real terms pay rise for 10 years, and for the first time in five years the award is being paid in full without staging. Most E grade nurses, ward sisters and charge nurses received a 4.7 per cent. increase in basic pay.

Our proposals for modernising the National Health Service pay system were outlined in "Agenda for Change" published on 15 February 1999. Our aim is for a new pay system which properly rewards responsibility, competence and performance. For nurses these changes will mean a new career structure to replace the current clinical grades, which will provide better career progression and fairer rewards for developing new skills, taking on extended roles and team working. This is under active discussion with the trades unions.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he will take to stop experienced nurses from leaving the NHS. [101357]

Mr. Denham: The human resources framework "Working Together" sets out the Government's determination to improve the quality of working lives for all staff in the National Health Service and requires NHS employers to improve retention rates for all health professional staff. "Making A Difference" sets out a new vision for the future of nursing in the new NHS to ensure that nurses are able to develop satisfying and rewarding careers, including the introduction of nurse consultant posts. Significant progress has already been made to improve pay, tackle racism and inequality and create safe and healthy work places.

In September this year, Ministers launched a £1 million campaign called "Improving Working Lives in the NHS" as part of our wider agenda on supporting the family. Each region has appointed a high profile champion to lead a multi disciplinary task force to introduce more flexible and family friendly policies in the NHS. The "Improving Working Lives Champion" for Chorley is Kath Holbourn, Director of Nursing, Leighton Hospital, Middlewich Road, Crewe and can be contacted on 01270 612 351.

Medicines

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he intends to take in order to stop the practice of making medicines available by postcode area. [101358]

Mr. Denham: We have said many times we recognise and will tackle unacceptable variations in access to care and treatment. That is why we have set up the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE). NICE will reduce post-code variations by issuing authoritative national guidance based on evidence of the clinical and cost-effectiveness of treatments.

Primary Care

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when he will issue guidelines setting out which services primary care trusts will manage; [101411]

(2) if it will be possible for new primary care trusts to provide (a) acute elders' services, (b) children's services, (c) maternity services and (d) services for those with learning difficulties. [101408]

Mr. Denham: Only Level 4 primary care trusts will be permitted to directly provide primary health care services. The range and nature of these services will be defined individually, by the outcome of local consultation. PCTs will not be able to provide acute services; however, a key part of their role will be to commission these services from a secondary care provider. As existing guidance ("Primary Care Trusts: Establishing Better Services") states, PCTs will adopt the commissioning role previously employed by Health Authorities.

Guidance on the establishment, preparatory period and functions of PCTs is currently being prepared and will be issued in late December. This will further outline the PCT role in commissioning and developing community health services.

Care Homes

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were employed in England's care homes and day centres (a) in each of the past 20 years, (b) on 1 May 1997, (c) on 9 March 1998 and (d) on the most recent date for which figures are available. [101310]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not available centrally. Information is available on people employed by local authority social services care homes and day centres. The table sets out the whole time equivalent for staff employed in England's care homes and day centres on 30 September of each year since 1979.

Local authority personal social services staff employed in day centres and residential care homes on 30 September, 1979 to 1998

TREASURY

Personal Pensions

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will announce his decision on the abolition of the carry forward/carry back tax rules relating to personal pensions; and if he will make a statement. [101382]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The proposal to remove the carry forward and carry back facility forms part of the current public consultations on stakeholder pensions. We will announce our intentions when we have considered the responses to the consultation.

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the tax relief that will be saved as a result of his proposal to abolish the carry forward/carry back tax rules relating to personal pensions; and if he will make a statement. [101381]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The consultation proposal to remove the carry forward and carry-back facility is intended to simplify pension administration not to raise revenue. We would not expect the removal of carry forward carry back to save tax relief.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much the Exchequer is estimated to receive as pension contributions and compensation this financial year and in each of the following three years in respect of public sector employees who were mis-sold personal pensions between 1988 and 1994. [100917]

Mr. Andrew Smith: It is estimated that receipts of between £100 and £160 million will be received by the Exchequer this financial year, and in each of the following three years, as a result of public service employees who were mis-sold personal pensions being reinstated into public service pension schemes. The amount of receipts paid in match future liabilities. Any compensation paid into public service schemes will be matched by future benefits to pensioners.

Electric Shock Dog Collars

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many electric shock dog collars Her Majesty's Customs and Excise possess; and how many times they have been used, and on how many dogs, since July 1998. [101435]

Miss Melanie Johnson: HM Customs and Excise do not use collars which administer electric shocks to their dogs.

Appropriation Orders

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library a list of the Transfer of Appropriation Orders applied for by the Commission of the European Union and approved by, or awaiting the approval of, a meeting of a Council of Ministers, indicating for each the (a) budget reference purpose and amount of the original appropriation, (b) reason why it was not spent on the proposed purpose, (c) purpose for which it is to be spent and (d) parliamentary scrutiny to which it was subject. [101625]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Details of all transfers of appropriations dated up to 30 June 1999 have been deposited and are available in the House of Commons Library. Transfers since that date will be deposited in compliance with the usual procedures.

"Europe as an Economic Entity"

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will deposit in the Library a copy of the Commission report, "Europe as an economic entity"; and if he will make a statement on policy thereto. [101027]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The 1996 Commission report "The mutually beneficial effects of greater co-ordination of economic and structural policies (Europe as an economic entity)" presented a study of the employment history of the EU. The report highlighted the importance of the European single market for growth and employment across Europe and underlined the need for further structural reforms to Europe's product and labour markets. A copy of the report has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Tax Rate

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire will benefit from the 10p tax rate; and if he will make a statement. [101139]

Dawn Primarolo: Almost all of the individual income taxpayers in Shrewsbury and Atcham and in Shropshire will benefit from the 10p tax rate.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many businesses in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire will benefit from the reduction in capital gains tax; and if he will make a statement. [101128]

Dawn Primarolo: My right hon. Friend announced in the Pre-Budget Report that he would be consulting on the detail of a number of possible changes to the capital gains tax treatment of business assets. Any changes to capital gains tax would apply to all qualifying businesses in the area, but we have no specific figures for these.

Adlearn Foundation

Mr. Colman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on progress of the Inland Revenue investigation into the Adlearn Foundation. [100862]

Mr. Timms: The Inland Revenue has a statutory duty of confidentiality in respect of all taxpayer's affairs. I cannot reveal details of the Department's dealings with any taxpayer.

EU Pensions

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the current pensions liabilities of the European Communities; and what reforms to a private-based system are under consideration. [101035]

Mr. Timms: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by the Economic Secretary on 3 November 1999, Official Report, column 238W.

The Council has formally invited the Commission to present an assessment of future needs resulting from the pension scheme as well as a proposal to revise the scheme, by the end of June 2000.

Any reforms to a private-based system would have to be proposed by the Commission and they have not yet made any proposals for us to consider.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many families are projected to benefit from the working families tax credit for each of the first five years. [101329]

Mr. Timms: It is estimated that for 2000–01, the first full year of the Working Families Tax Credit, about 1.4 million families will be in receipt of the credit.

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many calls have been received by the Working Families Tax Credit Hotline since its inception from (a) Worcester, (b) Worcestershire, (c) from the West Midlands Region and (d) nationally. [100904]

Mr. Timms: The response line for the Working Families Tax Credit and Disabled Person's Tax Credit had handled 780,000 inquiries up to the 30 November. In the Central TV region the response line had handled about 120,000 calls. A more detailed breakdown is not available.

Children's Fund

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many children in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire will benefit from the new Children's Fund; and if he will make a statement.

[101125]

Mr. Timms: In the 1999 Pre-Budget Report, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that the Government will set up a new Children's Fund in the spending review in 2000. The Fund will support pioneering work by voluntary and community sector organisations working with low-income children and their families, building on the sector's access to communities and families that the statutory sector struggles to engage. The review will take place in forthcoming months and as yet resources have not been allocated to the Fund, but we expect children from all over England to benefit from the activities it will support.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Committee Room Facilities

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee how many of the main committee rooms of the House have induction loop facilities for the hard of hearing; and if these facilities are available on each occasion when a committee room is used. [101615]

Mrs. Roe: Fifteen committee rooms in the House of Commons are fitted with induction loops. These facilities are only available when the amplification equipment has been switched on by a trained operator for meetings that are being televised or recorded.

Lift Refurbishment

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what was the cost of the recent refurbishment of two lifts in Norman Shaw North. [101457]

Sir Sydney Chapman: The estimated cost for the refurbishment of lifts HOP122 and 123 at Norman Shaw North is £275,000.

DEFENCE

Procurement

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the original in-service date, (b) the current in-service date, (c) the actual or estimated cost, (d) the years of peak expenditure and (e) the prime contractor for the Endorsed Staff Targets for (1) Future Offensive Air System, (2) Bowman, (3) Barmine Replacement, (4) Area Weapon Effects Simulator, (5) Future Short and Very Short Range Air Defence Systems (SHORADS/VSHORADS), (6) Combined Arms Tactical Trainer, (7) Terrier, (8) Range Extension for Tactical Trunk Communications, (9) Future Engineer Tank, (10) Lightweight Mobile Artillery Weapon System (LIMAWS), (11) Next Generation Light Anti Tank Weapon (NLAW), (12) Formation Battle Management System, (13) Theatre Wide Area Communications Network (TWACN), (14) Future Carrier-Borne Aircraft, (15) Future Amphibious Support Helicopter, (16) SCOT Capability Upgrade (SCUG), (17) Naval EHF Satellite Terminal (NEST) Communication Programme, (18) Electronic Warfare Database and Rapid Reaction Facility, (19) Sonar 2087 and (20) EW 2000. [98481]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The information requested is as follows:

The basis for setting and approving in-service dates (ISDs) is currently under review in the context of the Smart Procurement Initiative. It should also be noted that costs quoted are for acquisition only, expressed in constant prices at 1999–2000 levels.

1. Future Offensive Air System (FOAS)—The original in-service date (ISD) was 2015. The current ISD is 2017. The current cost estimate is about £10 billion, though this should be seen as a broad estimate only. Years of peak expenditure are expected to be 2017–18 and 2018–19. The FOAS project is currently in the Concept phase. Contractors for the Concept phase studies include British Aerospace and Matra BAe Dynamics (UK).

2. BOWMAN—The original ISD was 1995. The current ISD is 2002, but this is under review. The current cost estimate is around £2.2 billion and the years of peak expenditure are expected to be 2002–03 and 2003–04. The prime contractor is ARCHER Communications Systems Ltd.

3. BARMINE Replacement—The original and current ISDs are 2010. The current cost estimate is £54 million, with peak expenditure in 2007–08 and 2008–09. The prime contractor is not yet known.

4. Area Weapons Effect Simulator—The original ISD was 1999. The current ISD is 2003. Current estimated costs are £99 million with peak expenditure in 1999–2000 and 2000–01. The prime contractor is Cubic Defense Systems, USA.

5. Future Short and Very Short Range Air Defence Systems (now known as Future Ground Based Air Defence—FGBAD)—The original ISD was 2015. The latest estimated ISD is 2020 but this will be considered further in the concept and assessment phases. The current cost estimate is around £4.5 billion. The peaks in expenditure will depend on the decisions made in the concept and assessment phases. The prime contractors for the two International Feasibility Studies—now completed—were Matra BAe Dynamics and Thomson-Thorn Missile Electronics. The planned further Concept work is likely to be placed on the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, who would be supported by the Rapier and High Velocity Missile Design Authorities.

6. Combined Arms Tactical Trainer—The original ISD was 2000. The current ISD is 2001. The current estimated cost is £247 million with years of peak expenditure in 1997–98 to 2001–02. The prime contractor is Lockheed Martin Information Systems.

7. TERRIER—The original ISD was 2005. The current ISD is 2009. Information on the current cost estimate is commercially sensitive and is being withheld under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. The two prime contractors for the competitive Project Definition phase are Vickers Defence Systems and Marconi Marine Land and Naval Systems.

8. Range Extension for Tactical Trunk Communications—We have assumed that this is a reference to the satellite extension to the PTARMIGAN trunk communications system which was brought into service in September 1997 at an actual cost of £24.5 million. The prime contractor was Siemens Plessey and peak years of expenditure were 1995–96.

9. Future Engineer Tank—The original ISD was 2001. The current ISD is 2006. Information on cost estimates is commercially sensitive and is being withheld under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. The three contractors for the competitive Feasibility studies are Vickers Defence Systems, Alvis Vehicles and Obrum, Poland.

10. Lightweight Mobile Artillery Weapons System (LIMAWS)—The original and current ISD is 2007 for the howitzer only. The other elements of the system are not yet sufficiently defined. Information on cost estimates is commercially sensitive and is being withheld under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. The prime contractor is Marconi Marine Land and Naval Systems.

11. Next Generation Light Anti-Tank Weapon (NLAW)—The original and current ISD is 2006. Information on cost estimates is commercially sensitive and is being withheld under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. The two prime contractors for the competitive Project Definition phase are Matra BAe Dynamics (UK) Ltd. and Bofors Carl Gustaf AB (Sweden).

12. Formation Battle Management System (FBMS)—The original and current ISD is 2002. The project is, however, linked with BOWMAN and revisions to that programme could impact on the ISD of FBMS. The current estimated costs are £74 million with peak expenditure in years 2001–02 to 2004–05. The prime contractor is British Aerospace Defence Systems Ltd.

13. Theatre Wide Area Communications Network (TWACN)—The TWACN original and current ISD is 2002. The cost estimate is commercially sensitive and is withheld under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. Expenditure is likely to peak in 2001–02 to 2004–05 once a prime contractor has been identified.

14. Future Carrier Borne Aircraft (FCBA)—The original and current ISD is 2012. Overall FCBA numbers and hence the total cost of the programme, which could be in the region of £5 billion to £7 billion, have yet to be determined. Peak expenditure is likely to occur in 2013–14 and 2014–15. We are participating in the Concept Demonstration Phase (CDP) of the US Joint Strike Fighter (JSF) programme. Lockheed Martin and Boeing are the prime contractors for JSF CDP, with several UK companies as sub-contractors. We are also undertaking feasibility studies covering navalisation of Eurofighter, other potential solutions and various ship/aircraft interface issues. A number of contracts have been placed with UK industry as part of these UK feasibility studies.

15. Future Amphibious Support Helicopter (FASH)—The provisional ISD is 2008. The current estimate of costs is around £1 billion with peak expenditure estimated to be in years 2009–10 to 2010–11. The prime contractor is not yet known.

16. SCOT Capability Upgrade (SCUG)—The original ISD was 2004. The current ISD is 2005. The cost estimate is commercially sensitive and is withheld under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. Expenditure is likely to peak in 2005–06 and 2006–07. A prime contractor has yet to be identified.

17. Naval EHF Satellite Terminal (NEST)—The original ISD was 2004, the current ISD is 2005. The cost estimate is commercially sensitive and is withheld under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. Expenditure is likely to peak in 2004–05 and 2005–06. A prime contractor has yet to be identified.

18. Electronic Warfare Database and Rapid Reaction Facility—There is at present no formal user requirement for this programme.

19. Sonar 2087—The original ISD was 2003. The current ISD is 2004. Current estimated cost is around £390 million with peak expenditure expected in years 2003–04 and 2006–07. The prime contractors are Thomson Marconi Sonar Ltd. and Babcock Defence Systems.

20. EW 2000—The original and current ISD is 2006. Cost estimates are commercially sensitive and withheld under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. Likely peak years of expenditure are 2003–04 to 2005–06. A prime contractor has yet to be identified.

Human Rights Act 1998

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are being taken to ensure that the current terms of service of young people in the armed forces are compatible with the Human Rights Act 1998. [100122]

Mr. Spellar: In line with other public authorities, my Department is taking steps to ensure that all personnel policies will be compatible with the main provisions of the Human Rights Act 1998 when they fully come into force on 2 October 2000.

Smart Procurement Initiative

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the Smart Procurement Initiative. [101194]

Mr. Hoon: This initiative, which is at the heart of our efforts to reform the way we procure and support defence equipment, is currently being implemented. The programme to roll out Integrated Project Teams (IPTs) with full industry participation is on course; all the teams will be fully operational by April 2000. The design and implementation of new arrangements to ensure effective relationships between IPTs, their new Equipment Capability Customer in MOD Headquarters and the Front Line Commands is also making excellent progress. We remain on track to achieve savings of £2 billion to which we are committed.

Departmental Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many research contracts have been let by his Department since May 1997; what is the value of each contract; and in each case whether the contract included (a) a departmental veto over publication of the research results, (b) departmental control over the date of publication of the research results and (c) a requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments. [100146]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 6 December 1999]: The Ministry of Defence conducts research on a wide range of matters. Details are not all recorded centrally, but information available indicates that since May 1997 the Ministry of Defence has placed over 740 research contracts at a total value of over £250 million, excluding those let by the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA). DERA has, in addition, placed some £300 million worth of extramural contracts on behalf of the Department. The total number of DERA contracts placed is not readily available. I am withholding the value of individual research contracts under exemption 13 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, as this information is commercially sensitive.

The Department generally retains control over the publication of research results, and the date of publication, except where ownership of results of work has been vested in contractors. There is no prohibition on publication except where justified under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. MOD and DERA would not seek to change the results of research.

Departmental Staff Targets

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will publish the seventh annual edition of the compendium of current staff targets and staff requirements. [101398]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 6 December 1999]: The MOD is working towards publication, and aims to issue an updated Compendium early in the new year. Since publication of the last Compendium in September 1998, the Department has undergone major organisational change in the implementation of the Strategic Defence Review. We wish to ensure that the Compendium will represent an accurate view to industry of future equipment needs throughout the MOD.

Iraq

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what reports he has received regarding the demolition of Iraqi munitions at the Khamisiyah depot in March 1991 and its possible effect on British troops; and if he will make a statement. [102057]

Mr. Spellar: The Government's 1997 'New Beginnings' policy statement set out the way forward for addressing the health concerns of Gulf veterans and included a statement of the MOD's commitment to review specific events in response to Gulf veterans' concerns that they were exposed to chemical weapons during the Gulf Conflict. The work reviewing the incident at Khamisiyah in March 1991 has now been completed and I am today publishing a detailed paper entitled "Review of the events concerning 32 Field Hospital and the Release of Nerve Agent Arising from US Demolition of Iraqi Munitions at the Khamisiyah Depot in March 1991". In conjunction with this I am also publishing a detailed paper to provide the background of how chemical warfare defence was organised in the UK during the Gulf conflict entitled "British Chemical Warfare Defence During the Gulf Conflict 1990–91)". Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

As a result of our review of the information on the Khamisiyah incident, we do not believe there is evidence that any UK troops were definitely exposed to Iraqi chemical agents on 10 or 11 March 1991. Although some British troops were located within the computer modelled composite plume footprint, such theoretical exposure would have been at a very low level. We judge that if such an exposure took place it would present no risk to health.

Kosovo

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions the United Kingdom exercised a national veto on proposed actions during NATO operations connected with Kosovo in 1999. [101336]

Mr. Hoon: The reply I gave to a similar question from the hon. Member on 30 November 1999, Official Report, column 85W, explained that NATO decisions are taken by consensus and outlined the procedure for consultation by national commanders in support of Alliance decision-making. Releasing details of the applications of these processes in specific operations would be harmful to defence, security and international relations. I am therefore withholding the information requested in accordance with exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on access to Government Information.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what articles of international law and international humanitarian law were used as the criteria for the United Kingdom's decisions establishing the legality of the choice of targets during the Kosovo conflict. [101335]

Mr. Hoon: The United Kingdom complied with the requirements of international law in its conduct of air operations in the Kosovo conflict, including its obligations under Articles 48 to 58 of the First Protocol additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the amounts and types of ordnance used (a) during the Kosovo conflict in 1999 and (b) over Iraq in 1999. [101337]

Mr. Hoon: During the period in question, the Royal Air Force used the following munitions in support of operations Allied Force and Bolton:

Kosovo (Op Allied Force)

226—Paveway II

18—Paveway III

531—RBL 755

230—1000lb Bombs

6—Alarm

Iraq (Op Bolton)

125—Paveway II

9—Paveway III.

I am withholding the information requested in respect of the Royal Navy's use of munitions during operation Allied Force under exemption 1 of the code of Practice on access to Government Information (National Security or Defence).

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what controls his Department exercises over the storage of nuclear weapons on private land. [101461]

Mr. Hoon: The Ministry of Defence does not store nuclear weapons on private land.

Uranium-based Munitions

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the environmental effects of the use of uranium-based munitions by NATO forces in Kosovo. [101200]

Mr. Spellar: The Government have not commissioned any assessment of the environmental effects of using such munitions in Kosovo but the Joint UN Environment Programme/UN Commission on Human Settlements issued its report "The Kosovo Conflict: Consequences for the Environment" on 5 October 1999. A copy of the report has been placed in the Library of the House. We are aware, however, of the concerns that have been expressed about the use of uranium-based munitions and have commissioned advice from officials within the Department on what further work we might do to improve our knowledge of how depleted uranium in ammunition behaves in the natural environment.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Mobile Phone Reception (Scotland)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those areas of the west coast of Scotland not covered for mobile phone reception. [99616]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested is not collected.

The cellular mobile operators have each met requirements to roll out services to an area in which at least 90 per cent. of the UK population lives. Aside from this requirement, the individual operators were free to make a commercial decision about their roll-out plans.

Vodafone and BT Cellnet are jointly currently constructing a mobile infrastructure within the Highlands and Islands, working alongside the local enterprise council.

Assisted Area Status

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what criteria were used in selecting wards eligible for assisted area status in Dumfries and Galloway; and what values were attached to each of the criteria for each ward. [100849]

Mr. Caborn: We used the criteria set out in Annex C of the "Government's Proposals for New Assisted Areas", which were published on 15 July. A copy was sent to every MP.

The Government have not published ward-based information as it could be disclosive of personal information.

ECGD

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the UK companies which have received support from the ECGD in each of the last five years. [100517]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 1 December 1999]: The companies are herewith listed.

The lists do not include the thousands of UK sub-contracts who have benefited from ECGD cover provided either to a UK main contractor or to a bank which makes payment to a number of UK exporters on behalf of overseas buyers. They do however include the UK Branches of overseas companies who have been the beneficiaries of ECGD guarantees.

Industrial Diseases

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the number of applicants in the following age bands who have made a claim for payment in respect of vibration white finger and chronic bronchitis and emphysema aged (a) 49 and below, (b) 50 to 59, (c) 60 to 69, (d) 70 to 79, (e) 80 to 89 and (f) 90 years and above. [101048]

Mrs. Liddell: As at 30 November, the age breakdown of claims made by ex-miners in respect of claims for compensation for VWF and respiratory disease is as follows:

Aged	Number
Respiratory disease claims received
49 and below	6,558
50–59	12,348
60–69	25,311
70–79	30,202
80–89	11,047
90 and above	2,556
VWF claims received
49 and below	15,780
50–59	13,364
60–69	14,382
70–79	8,414
80–89	925
90 and above	20

Telecommunications Council

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the outcome of the Telecommunications Council held in Brussels on 30 November; and if he will make a statement. [101168]

Ms Hewitt: I represented the UK at the Telecommunications Council on 30 November which adopted a Directive on a Common Framework for Electronic Signatures. I welcomed this as a major step forward towards clarifying the legal framework for electronic commerce.

In addition the Commission presented a number of recent Communications which were followed by preliminary exchanges of views.

In presenting the fifth report on implementation of the telecommunications regulatory package the Commission drew attention to progress towards implementation of the existing package of telecoms liberalisation legislation, and concluded that the successes of the existing regulatory framework had led to market growth with increased competition and lower tariffs. The Commission also drew attention to the remaining barriers to a single European market in telecoms, including a comparatively low level of harmonisation of Community licensing and interconnection regimes, incomplete implementation by some member states of Community cost accounting provisions, and the lack of competition in local access markets in all member states. Member states approved this general analysis.

There was a first debate on the Commission Communication on the review of the regulatory framework for electronic communications. In presenting the Communication the Commission summarised its approach to the review of the regulatory package which would apply to all electronic communications systems and said it would report on the outcome of its public consultation in April before making legislative proposals in May. In the following debate all member states recognised the need for swift action in the face of the pace of technological change, and simplification of the regulatory framework. A number, including the UK, stressed the need for a flexible framework with a minimum of regulation. I emphasised that strengthening competition in the market for communications services is vital to produce an environment in which e-commerce can flourish in Europe, and welcomed the Commission's recognition that regulation should be on a co-regulatory basis with business where possible. The Council adopted Conclusions endorsing the Commission's principles for the new regulatory framework as set out in its Communication.

The Commission also presented its Communication on the results of its public consultation on its Green Paper on radio spectrum policy. The Commission summarised the outcome of its consultation and the areas in which it indicated future legislative proposals. There was no discussion of the Communication: the Presidency concluded that the Council noted the Commission's intentions which would require further study when specific legislative proposals emerged in 2000.

There was also a debate on the information society of the future and how to build trust and create effective rules for electronic commerce. The Commission will produce guidelines on the use of self-regulation in this area for discussion at the Information Society meeting in Lisbon in April 2000.

The Council also noted, without discussion, the Commission Communication on implementation of Directive 97/47/EC on advanced TV standards. The Commission also provided an oral update on member states' preparation for the Millennium Bug in energy, transport and other fields.

Post Office White Paper

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will define the phrase, "undue cross-subsidy", in paragraph 28 of the Post Office White Paper. [101289]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The phrase "undue cross-subsidy" refers to any cross-subsidy from the monopoly to non-monopoly services which is intended or has the effect of being a breach of competition rules. It will be for the Postal Services Commission to regulate this and to make decisions based on the facts of any particular case.

Joint Infrastructure Fund

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to announce awards from round 2 of the Joint Infrastructure Fund. [101685]

Mr. Byers: I have today announced jointly with the Wellcome Trust and the Higher Education Funding Council for England details of the awards from round 2 of the Joint Infrastructure Fund (JIF). Over £320 million has been awarded to 45 successful applicants across 27 universities across the United Kingdom.

The projects awarded funding cover the broad spectrum of science and engineering. They range from projects costing £750,000 to over £30 million.

There are a further 3 rounds of the JIF with decision points in March and November 2000 and March 2001.

Details of the individual awards announced today are as follows:

Applicant		Project
Professor I. G. Priede	Aberdeen	Autonomous Marine Environment Research Stations (AutoMERS)
Professor P. St. J. Russell	Bath	Photonic Crystal Fibres: Fabrication, Technology and Applications
Professor H. R. Saibil	Birkbeck	Equipment and Refurbishment for Electron Cryomicroscopy and Protein Crystallography
Professor M. N. R. Ashfold	Bristol	Materials, Physical and Computational Chemistry for the 21st Century
Professor R. J. Mair	Cambridge	Centre for Geotechnical Process and Construction Modelling
Professor D. M. Glover	Cambridge	Cell Biology and Drosophilia Research in the Cambridge University Genetics Department
Professor Sir John Gurdon	Cambridge	Relocation and upgrading of Wellcome CRC Institute
Professor P. Sissons	Cambridge	Biology and Pathogenesis of Virus Infections
Professor T. W. Robbins	Cambridge	Centre for Behavioural Neuroscience
Professor D. G. Crighton	Cambridge	Centre for Mathematical Sciences
Professor A. J. Moses	Cardiff	Production, Evaluation and Applications of Advanced Soft Magnetics Materials and Devices
Professor A. I. Lamond	Dundee	Dundee Centre for High Resolution Imaging in Cell and Molecular Biology
Professor R. W. Richards	Durham	Multi-disciplinary Condensed Matter Chemistry
Professor T. D. Jickells	UEA	Laboratory for Global Marine and Atmospheric Chemistry
Dr. K. J. Heywood	UEA	Sampling Equipment for the UK Marine, Physics and Chemistry Community
Professor R. D. Kenway	Edinburgh	A World-Leading Computing Facility for Simulations of the Strong Interaction
Professor P. J. Sadler	Edinburgh	Edinburgh Protein Interaction Centre (EPIC)
Professor N. P. Franks	ICSTM	General Anaesthesia: From Molecular Actions to Neuronal Pathways
Professor M. Van Heel	ICSTM	An Integrated Multi-Disciplinary Centre for Solving Biopolymer Structures
Professor P. McGuffin	KCL (Institute of Psychiatry)	The Social, Genetic and Developmental Psychiatry Research Centre at the Institute of Psychiatry
Professor M. B. Steer	Leeds	Microwave and Millimetre-Wave Design and Instrumentation Facility
Dr. M. C. Bell	Leeds	Leeds Health Air Pollution, Noise, Health and Emissions Research Network (LANTERN)
Professor P. K. H. Maguire	Leicester	The Acquisition of Seismic Recording Systems to study "Rifting Processes: Inception, Transition and Spreading"
Professor P. P. Allport	Liverpool	The Liverpool Semiconductor Detector Centre

Applicant		Project
Professor J. S. Metcalfe	Manchester	Manchester Federal School Interdisciplinary Faculty for Management Research
Professor D. J. Vaughan	Manchester	Research Centre in Molecular Environmental Science
Professor A. J. Lyne	Manchester	Lovell Telescope—Forward to the 21st Century
Professor M. P. Young	Newcastle	Visual Neuroecology
Professor A. Ekert	Oxford	Interdisciplinary Centre for Quantum Information Processing
Dr. A. Cooper	Oxford	Ancient Biomolecules Centre
Professor W. G. Richards	Oxford	Chemistry Research Laboratory
Dr. B. T. Huffman	Oxford	Tevraton—Quick Access Resources for Computing T-Quarc
Professor R. A. North	Sheffield	Integrated Research in Molecular Life Sciences: co-ordinating Structural Biology, Developmental Genetics, Molecular Physiology and Molecular Microbiology
Professor D. J. Read	Sheffield	Plant Environmental Interactions: Scaling between Genes and Ecosystems
Dr. N. J. C. Spooner	Sheffield	British Underground Facility for Dark Matter and Neutrino Studies
Professor M. Bradley	Southampton	Combinatorial Centre of Excellence
Professor M. F. Land	Sussex	Refurbishment of Sussex Centre for Neuroscience
Professor E. A. Hinds	Sussex	Centre for the Measurement of Particle Electric Dipole Moments
Professor P. R. Jonas	UMIST	An Instrumented Aircraft Facility for Atmospheric Research within the UK University Community
Professor L. E. Davis	UMIST	Electromagnetics Centre for Microwave and Millimetre-Wave Design and Applications
Professor J. Collinge	UCL	Neurodegenerative diseases—from Molecule to Clinic
Professor L. K. Borysiewicz	Wales (College of Medicine)	Centre for Biomedical Research
Professor D. Bowles	York	Creating a New Research Infrastructure for Biosciences
Professor S. K. Bhattacharya	Warwick	Warwick Design and Innovation Research Centre (Innovative Manufacturing Centre Phase 3)

Note:
The JEC approved a total of 45 awards but support for one of these is dependent on a further site visit. Details of this award have therefore not been announced yet.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on plans for operating the national minimum wage. [101509]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Government asked the independent Low Pay Commission to monitor and evaluate the operation of the national minimum wage, with particular reference to its impact on pay, employment and competitiveness in low paying sectors and small firms. I look forward to reading the Commission's findings, which will be included in their report to the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State later this month, and we will consider carefully the recommendations it makes.

Entertainment Industry

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact of the Employment Relations Act 1999 on the working of the entertainment industry. [101087]

Mr. Alan Johnson: No regulatory proposal which has an impact on businesses, charities or voluntary bodies is considered by the Government without a thorough assessment of the risks, costs and benefits, a clear analysis of who will be affected and an explanation of why non-regulatory action would be insufficient. These effects are examined in Regulatory Impact Assessments (RIAs), which are published with legislative proposals.

The RIA which accompanied the Employment Relations Bill calculated a total recurring annual compliance cost to business of £60 million. No figures were prepared for individual sectors such as the entertainment industry. The Act's impact on an individual sector will depend on the scope of existing provision in that sector, whether this provision exceeds the statutory minimum in the Act, and the extent to which individuals take up their rights. However, views were received on the legislation from both management and unions in the entertainment sector.

The compliance costs need to be set against the benefits which the Act is expected to bring, contributing to improvements in employment relations across the economy, stimulating a more co-operative approach and thus contributing to enhanced economic performance, and helping people achieve a better balance between work and family life, with wider long term social benefits.

PLCs (German Takeovers)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many public limited companies in the UK have been taken over by companies based in Germany in each of the last three years. [101360]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Kidgell to Mr. Barry Sheerman, dated 7 December 1999:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your question on the number of public limited companies in the UK that have been taken over by companies based in Germany over the last three years. I am replying in Dr Holt's absence.

The ONS extracts information about acquisitions and mergers from detailed scanning of specialist journals and the financial press. We therefore tend to identify only the larger and/or more newsworthy acquisitions. The figures below may therefore understate the scale of German acquisitions of UK companies.

Year	Number of British Companies taken over
1997	5
1998	1
1999 first three quarters only	4

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

BBC World TV

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received about the removal of current affairs and analysis from BBC World TV programming. [99965]

Janet Anderson: We have received three representations from hon. Members and their constituents. I am afraid however it is a longstanding principle that the Government do not intervene in the BBC's programming and editorial issues, which are matters for the BBC Board of Governors.

ITV Franchises

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what his policy is in respect of the amalgamation of companies holding ITV franchises. [101458]

Janet Anderson: Media mergers are subject to general competition law as well as specific ownership provisions under the Broadcasting Acts 1990 and 1996. These are matters for the Independent Television Commission and the Office of Fair Trading.

Works of Art (Export Licences)

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many press releases were issued by his Department in relation to the deferral of export licences for works of art (a) from May 1997 to June 1998 and (b) from June 1998 to date. [101853]

Mr. Chris Smith: Between May 1997 and June 1998, 12 news releases were issued by the Department relating to the deferral of 20 export licences for cultural items.

From June 1998 to date, 15 news releases were issued relating to the deferral of 24 such export licences.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he has taken to publicise his Department's publication, "Export of Works of Art 1998–99". [101852]

Mr. Chris Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell) on 26 November 1999, Official Report, column 216W, when I said that the Reviewing Committee's Annual Report for 1998–99 was published on that day, and that copies had been laid before Parliament. I also issued a news release on the same day announcing its publication.

Lottery Terminals

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) who will own the lottery terminals which his Department has decided should become obsolete; and what value has been put on them; [101515]

(2) what extra costs will be incurred in terms of the provision of new lottery machines as a consequence of the decision that the existing ones should be replaced; and if this cost falls on (a) the sum available for good causes and (b) other budgets; [101517]

(3) what were the installation costs of the initial batch of lottery terminals; and what (a) direct and (b) indirect costs were met from public funds; [101516]

(4) who took the decision to scrap existing lottery terminals. [101514]

Kate Hoey: The decision to require the successful applicant for the new National Lottery licence to install new terminals was taken by the National Lottery Commission. The Commission is independent of Government.

The National Lottery terminals are the property of the National Lottery operator, Camelot Group plc, and will remain Camelot's property when the current operating licence expires. My Department does not hold information on the installation costs or the present value of these terminals. The full cost of purchasing and installing the terminals was met by Camelot from its operating costs: no part of the cost of the terminals was met from public funds.

The National Lottery Commission has a statutory responsibility to ensure that the National Lottery is run with all due propriety, to protect the interests of players, and subject to satisfying those two criteria, to maximise the amount the Lottery raises for good causes. The Commission took the view that a competition is the best way to ensure that the amount raised for good causes is maximised, and therefore insisted on new technology for National Lottery terminals to remove an obstacle to competition. The Commission's decision will have no impact on other budgets.

Indemnity Undertakings

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many indemnity undertakings were given by departments under section 16 of the National Heritage Act 1980 for the six month period ended 30 September; and what was the value of (a) any contingent liabilities in respect of such undertakings given at any time under that section which remained outstanding as at 30 September, (b) non-statutory Government indemnities in respect of loans handled by the Government Art Collection which remained outstanding as at 30 September and (c) non-statutory undertakings to Her Majesty in respect of loans from the Royal Collection which remained outstanding at 30 September. [102029]

Mr. Chris Smith: The provision for the Government Indemnity Scheme is made by the National Heritage Act 1980. The scheme facilitates public access to loans of works of art and other objects for public display made to museums, galleries and other such institutions by private owners and non national institutions. It does this by indemnifying lenders against loss or damage to their loan. Loans covered by the scheme must be for public benefit. The scheme also covers loans of such objects for study purposes within borrowing institutions where this would contribute materially to the public's understanding or appreciation of the loan. Examples of this are enhancing interpretation or explanation to the public of objects or bringing into the public domain the conclusions of any study.

In the six month period ended 30 September 1999, the following undertakings to indemnify were given under section 16 by the relevant Departments for objects on loan to national and non-national institutions:

	Number
Department for Culture, Media and Sport	592
Scottish Executive Education Department	101
The National Assembly for Wales	61
Department of Education for Northern Ireland	18

The value of contingent liabilities in respect of undertakings given at any time under section 16 and which remained outstanding is:

Department for Culture, Media and Sport	1,625,435,897
Scottish Executive Education Department	480,066,111
The National Assembly for Wales	66,972,145
Department for Education for Northern Ireland	8,523,168

The value of non-statutory Government indemnities to cover loans handled by the Government Art Collection and which remained outstanding as at 30 September 1999 is:

Value: £4,475,000.

The value of non-statutory Undertakings given to Her Majesty in respect of loans from the Royal Collection and which remained outstanding as at 30 September 1999 is:

Value: £274,848,263.

PRIME MINISTER

Joint Cabinet Consultative Committee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister (1) how many times the Joint Cabinet Consultative Committee has met in 1999; [101212]

(2) when he expects the next meeting of the Joint Cabinet Consultative Committee to take place; and what will be on the agenda. [101214]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 362W.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much his Department has spent on ministerial transport in each of the last two years. [98690]

Mr. Hill: Ministers are required, under the Ministerial Code and "Travel by Ministers", to make efficient and cost-effective travel arrangements. For information on spend on the Government Car Service, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office on 1 December 1999, Official Report, columns 255–56W.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much his Department has spent on civil servants' transport in each of the last two years. [99147]

Mr. Hill: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office on 1 December 1999, Official Report, columns 255–56W. This gave details of providing the Government Car Service, which included the costs for Ministers and Ministerial private office expenditure in DETR. All travel undertaken by civil servants in the Department complied with the requirements of the Civil Service Management Code.

The amount paid for other civil servants transport was not retained separately from other travel expenditure on the previous Department of Transport Accounting system which was in use until end of March 1999 so that a combined total for the two Departments for previous years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what motor mileage allowance rates his Department offers to (a) Ministers and (b) civil servants using their own vehicles for official business; and what has been the cost of each in each of the last five years. [99148]

Mr. Hill: Ministers, when travelling on official business, may use a private car instead of an official car, and claim mileage allowance in the same circumstances and on the same terms as their civil servants. Use of public transport is encouraged. The Department's aim of minimising journeys by car to reduce the environmental impact of transport activity has been publicised widely. Where public transport is available but a private car is used, a single flat rate of 24 pence per mile is payable. Where it is impracticable to use public transport, payment for the use of a private car is at the rate of 40 pence per mile for the first 4,000 miles regardless of engine size, and 24 pence per mile after that. Claims for payment have to confirm that each journey was arranged in the most cost effective way.

The amount paid for motor mileage was not retained separately from other travel expenditure on the previous Department of Transport accounting system so that a combined total for the two Departments could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Motorcycles (Child Passengers)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many children aged under 16 years regularly travelled as motorcycle pillion passengers in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [100012]

Mr. Hill: No estimate is available. The number of children identified in the National Travel Survey making journeys as motorcycle pillion passengers over the last five years has been too small to give any estimate for the population as a whole.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many children have been (a) killed and (b) seriously injured whilst riding as a passenger on a motorcycle, in each of the last 10 years. [100010]

Mr. Hill: The information requested is shown in the table.

Child motorcycle pillion casualties by severity: GB 1989–98

Corporate Assets

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his estimate is of the value of land and property (i) in Scotland, (ii) in the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas and (iv) in total within the responsibility of (a) the British Railways Board, (b) the British Waterways Board, (c) the Civil Aviation Authority and (d) London Regional Transport (including assets under construction); and what is the value of (1) plant and equipment, (2) vehicles and rolling stock, (3) investments and (4) other moveable assets held by each of these bodies. [99823]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The table which has been placed in the Library sets out the value of land and property (including assets under construction), plant and equipment, vehicles and rolling stock, investments and other assets within the responsibility of the respective bodies set out, as shown in their respective accounts for the year ended 31 March 1999. All figures relate to the group and to the United Kingdom. There were no properties held overseas. Where appropriate, the figure in respect of Scotland has been separately identified. Unless otherwise stated there were no investments held. The net book value should be considered to be current values as at 31 March 1999.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the current estimated value of land and property in (i) Scotland, (ii) the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas, and (iv) in total within the responsibility of (a) the Audit Commission, (b) the British Board of Agreement, (c) the Commission for the New Towns, (d) the Countryside Commission, (e) English Nature, (f) English Partnerships, (g) the Environment Agency, (h) general lighthouse authorities, (i) Trinity House Lighthouse Service, (j) Northern Lighthouse Board, (k) the Health and Safety Commission and Executive, (l) housing action trusts, (m) the Housing Corporation, (n) the Joint Nature Conservancy Committee, (o) the National Forest Company, (p) the Rural Development Commission, (q) the Traffic Director for London and (r) urban development corporations. [99811]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 26 November 1999]: Although not separately identified between Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom, information on the values of land and property is contained in the tangible fixed assets note of the individually published audited accounts of the bodies concerned. These accounts, which are published either as a White Paper Accounts or in the form of a glossy version, have been laid before Parliament and are available in the Library for inspection. Any additional information could not be provided without delay and without incurring disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the current value of land and property in (i) Scotland (ii) the United Kingdom (iii) overseas (iv) total within the responsibility of the (a) Coastguard Agency, (b) Driving Standards Agency, (c) Driving and Vehicle Standards Agency, (d) Highways Agency, (e) Marine Safety Agency, (f) Planning Inspectorate Executive Agency, (g) QEII Conference Centre, (h) Vehicle Certification Agency and (i) Vehicle Inspectorate. [99813]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The table which has been placed in the Library sets out the value of land and property within the responsibility of the respective bodies set out, as shown in their respective audited accounts for the year ended 31 March 1999. Marine Safety Agency and the Coastguard Agency formally merged on 1 April 1998. Their figures therefore appear combined. For the avoidance of doubt I should mention that the Driving Standards Agency, the Vehicle Inspectorate and the QEII Conference Centre are trading funds and not executive agencies of DETR. Value information for the Highways Agency is being developed as part of the implementation of resource accounting; this information is currently being audited and is not available. All figures are for the United Kingdom and none for overseas. Where appropriate, the figure in respect of Scotland has been separately identified. The net book value should be considered to be current values as at 31 March 1999.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the current estimated value of land and property in (i) Scotland, (ii) the United Kingdom (iii) overseas and (iv) in total within the responsibility of DETR central; and if he will further list the value of moveable assets within DETR central. [99812]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The table which has been placed in the Library sets out the value of land and property within the responsibility of DETR central and the value of other assets as shown in the Department's dry run resource accounts for the year ended 31 March 1999. The first year of published resource accounts will be in respect of 1999–2000. All figures relate to England and Wales. No assets are held by DETR Central in Scotland or overseas. The net book value should be considered to be current values as at 31 March 1999.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his estimate is of the value of land and property (i) in Scotland, (ii) in the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas and (iv) in total held by the Ordnance Survey; and what is the value of moveable assets and other assets held by this body. [99824]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 26 November 1999]: Estimates are as follows:

(i) Value of land and property held by Ordnance Survey in Scotland	[1]0
(ii) Value of land and property held by Ordnance Survey in the United Kingdom	14,950,000
(iii) Value of land and property held by Ordnance Survey overseas	0
(iv) Value of land and property held in total by the Ordnance Survey	[2]14,950,000
(v) Value of moveable assets and other assets held by Ordnance Survey	10,328,000

A31

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to increase traffic flow during the current road works on the A31 in the New Forest particularly during weekends; when he expects the road works to be completed; and if he will make a statement. [100522]

Mr. Hill: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Peter Nutt, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Nutt to Mr. David Atkinson, dated 7 December 1999:

The Transport Minister, Keith Hill, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about roadworks on the A31 in the New Forest.

It is not possible to relax the traffic restrictions on the A31 between Picket Post and Stoney Cross at this stage of the works. Traffic management has been designed to allow for maximum lane availability during peak periods. Greater traffic restrictions are needed at other times to allow the resurfacing and bridge maintenance works to be done safely.

During weekdays, two lanes are provided at peak times in the direction of greatest demand. At weekends, two lanes are provided eastbound from 1600 hrs to 2000 hrs. At all other times, a contraflow of one lane in each direction is used.

The work is due to be completed by 12 December, weather permitting.

Rents

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the standard reference rent established by the Rent Officer Service for each locality within Greater Manchester and Cheshire for four room and five room accommodation in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [100768]

Mr. Mullin: The available annual information is given in the table. Reference rents will differ from one year to the next because of differences in the type and condition of property covered each year. These figures are not included in the publication "Rent Officer Statistics" because the number of cases reported for each locality is too small a basis for reliable quarterly estimates.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if safety recommendations to be enacted in accordance with section 37 of the Cologne Conclusions will apply to the Channel Tunnel; and if cost compliance will be included by the UK delegates in working group negotiations. [100996]

Mr. Hill: The Transport Council has yet to consider any recommendations on tunnel safety. However, paragraph 37 of the Cologne Council conclusions refers to road tunnels. It therefore seems likely that any recommendations would not be directly applicable to rail tunnels such as the Channel Tunnel.

The independent, binational Channel Tunnel Safety Authority, which oversees all matters relating to safety in the Channel Tunnel, has studied the various investigations into the Mont Blanc Tunnel fire and has identified no immediate or urgent safety implications for the Channel Tunnel. The Safety Authority will study with interest any recommendations the Transport Council may make, once they are published, to see whether they have any implications for the Tunnel.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the provision of direct rail services between the north west and the rest of Europe via the Channel Tunnel. [101347]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 6 December 1999]: Such services are the subject of an extensive independent review, the results of which the Deputy Prime Minister is currently considering. A statement will be made in due course.

Road Surfacing

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the value of porous asphalt road surfacing as a means of reducing spray in wet weather. [101136]

Mr. Hill: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Peter Nutt, to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Richard Thorndike to Mr. Bob Blizzard, dated 7 December 1999:

You recently asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the value of porous asphalt roads surfacing as a means of reducing spray in wet weather. I am replying in the absence of the Chief Executive, Peter Nutt.

Research undertaken by the Highways Agency has assessed the value of using porous asphalt road surfaces, including the benefit of reduced spray. Work carried out in the 1980's has shown that porous asphalt can reduce spray by as much as 95 per cent. compared to conventional asphalt when new. This reduces to approximately 30 per cent. after about three years due to the clogging of the porous asphalt from road detritus. The reduction in spray and the better visibility it offers drivers in wet weather, could be expected to reduce accidents when using porous asphalt compared with conventional surfacing.

However, surveys carried out for the Highways Agency indicate that vehicles travel faster on porous asphalt in the wet than on conventional surfacing which increases the risk of accidents. This work is supported by an extensive accident survey report from the Netherlands. Where porous asphalt is widely used. Their survey demonstrates that porous asphalt was no safer than conventional surfacing. This was attributed to motorists driving at higher speeds on porous asphalt than conventional surfacing due to reduced spray and better visibility. The results of limited work undertaken by the Highways Agency are consistent with evidence collected in Holland.

As part of a strategy to reduce impact of road noise the Highways Agency is carrying out research into alternative types of low noise road surfacing. As a result, new types of surfacing are now being introduced, some of which are often confused with porous asphalt, given their spray suppressing properties. Research on porous asphalt and the new road surfaces is continuing and will include monitoring spray reduction and the benefits offered.

If it would be helpful, Graham Bowskill, our Head of Civil Engineering, would be pleased to discuss the performance of porous asphalt and other road surfacing with you. His telephone number is 0171 921 4746.

Petrol Emissions

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what emissions are produced from the use of a gallon of (a) unleaded petrol, (b) super unleaded petrol and (c) lead replacement petrol. [101093]

Mr. Hill: There is no fundamental difference in emissions produced by any of these grades of petrol, the primary combustion products being carbon dioxide (CO_2) and water vapour. Combustion of one gallon will produce approximately 10.7 kg of CO_2 and 4.3 kg of water. Small amounts of secondary combustion products can also be created, but the actual amounts will vary from vehicle to vehicle depending on the combustion efficiency of the engine in which the fuel is burned and the efficiency of any exhaust gas after-treatment that may be fitted. These secondary pollutants are mainly comprised of hydrocarbons (HC) arising from unburned or partially burned fuel, oxides of nitrogen (NO_x), carbon monoxide (CO) and particulates. Depending on the level of sulphur in the fuel, sulphur compounds can also be produced. Other compounds, resulting from the use of fuel additives such as, for example, potassium that is used in lead replacement petrol, may also be emitted in trace concentrations.

London Underground

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list (a) the EDP costs, (b) accommodation and telephone costs, (c) London Transport finance and HR services charges and (d) PFI contract costs incurred by London Underground Ltd. in 1997–98. [100934]

Mr. Hill: Figures for these items were given in my answer of 25 October 1999, Official Report, column 673W.

A more detailed breakdown of the costs referred to could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Seeboard Powerlink Consortium

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many miles of high-tension and control cables (a) have been and (b) will be transferred to the Seeboard Powerlink consortium under the Power PFI contract. [100932]

Mr. Hill: Under the terms of the Power PFI contract, approximately 1,000 miles each of high-tension and control cables (covering the entire Underground network) transferred to Seeboard Powerlink on 16 August 1998.

Seeboard Powerlink is responsible for the maintenance and renewal of these cables for the duration of the contract.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans have been agreed with the Seeboard Powerlink consortium for the retention of generating plant at (a) the Lots Road and (b) the Greenwich power stations. [100933]

Mr. Hill: Under the terms of the Power PFI contract, Seeboard Powerlink are working together with London Underground to close Lots Road Power station during 2001. Main power supplies for the Underground will then be obtained from the National Grid.

For the duration of the contract, Seeboard Powerlink will require Greenwich Power station to provide emergency power in the event of a failure of supplies from the National Grid. Seeboard Powerlink is responsible for maintenance and renewal during this period.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many London Underground sub-station staff were transferred to the Seeboard Powerlink consortium under the terms of the Power PFI contract. [100931]

Mr. Hill: Under the terms of the Power PFI contract, 315 London Underground employees transferred to Seeboard Powerlink, including 148 sub-station staff.

Comprehensive Spending Review

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the changes made to Comprehensive Spending Review spending plans for his Department since July 1998. [100891]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The following table sets out the spending plans within my Department's Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) as published in July 1998 (Table 8.1 of Cm. 4011) compared to the position following the 1999–2000 Revised and Summer Supplementary Estimates. For subsequent changes I refer the hon. Member to the answer which my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) on 5 November 1999, Official Report, columns 346–49W, and the Supply Estimates 1999–2000: Winter Supplementary Estimates published on the 18 November.

The changes between the CSR settlement and the present position for Housing and other and Regeneration, are the result principally of the establishment of the Regional Development Agencies (now included in the Regeneration line), which have taken over the administration of some programmes formerly included with Housing and other. The other changes are the cumulative result of a large number of: small technical (public expenditure classification) changes; transfers to and from other Departmental Expenditure Limits; and some minor transfers between programmes within my Department's DEL.

Concessionary Bus Fares

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the national minimum concessionary bus fare for pensioners has been budgeted for introduction before 2001–02. [100890]

Mr. Hill: The Transport Bill published on 1 December contains our proposals for the introduction of the standard minimum for local authority concessionary travel schemes for pensioners. The standard minimum concession cannot be implemented until the necessary primary legislation has been enacted, so the earliest practical introduction date will be 2001–02.

Departmental Reports

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the titles of departmental reports being prepared for publication in the next 12 months, giving in each case the estimated date of publication. [100889]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions is preparing DETR Departmental Annual Report 2000, which will be published in spring 2000.

A41 (Aylesbury)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of the completion of the A41 Aston Clinton bypass on traffic (a) volumes and (b) flows on the A41 through Aylesbury. [101117]

Mr. Hill: I have asked the acting Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Peter Nutt, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mr. Richard Thorndike to Mr. David Lidington, dated 7 December 1999:

I have been asked by the Transport Minister, Keith Hill, to reply to your recent parliamentary question about the impact of the A41 Aston Clinton Bypass on traffic on the A41 through Aylesbury. I am replying in the absence of the Chief Executive, Peter Nutt.

At present over 26,000 vehicles a day use the A41 through Aston Clinton. Our forecasts show that 70% of this traffic would divert onto the bypass. They also show that other local roads would not be adversely affected by the opening of the bypass nor would the A41 through Aylesbury.

Railway Finances

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on (a) how the debts of British Rail are to be managed and (b) the borrowing powers available to the Strategic Rail Authority. [100885]

Mr. Hill: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister is considering these matters with the Chairman of the Shadow Strategic Rail Authority and the Treasury.

Drivers (Mobile Phones)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers he has to prevent drivers of motor vehicles from using hand-held mobile phones whilst they are driving. [100901]

Mr. Hill: Drivers are charged with dangerous driving (Section 2 of the Road Traffic Act 1988) or driving without due care and attention (Section 3 of that Act) if using a mobile phone causes them to drive in such a manner; or with failing to exercise proper control of a vehicle (Section 104 of the Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1986.

Merseytravel Scheme

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the benefit of the Merseytravel concessionary fares scheme to the (a) elderly and (b) disabled. [101166]

Mr. Hill: I have not made any assessment of this scheme. It is for individual local authorities—in this case Merseyside Passenger Transport Authority—to decide whether to operate concessionary fare schemes and what level of benefit to provide.

Homelessness

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to commission research on the needs of older single homeless people accommodated and rehoused via local authority homeless services. [101186]

Mr. Mullin: Data are already collected on older households accepted as homeless by local authorities. Overall, the total number of such households has declined from 6,060 in 1993–94 to 3,700 in 1998–99. During this same period the proportion of these households, compared to other households accepted as homeless, has declined from five per cent. to four per cent.[1]

The Department has no plans for additional data collection or research in this area at present.

Greater London Authority

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for how long it is planned that the future Mayor of London will occupy the offices currently under conversion for him. [101155]

Mr. Hill: The Greater London Authority will remain in Romney House until the new headquarters building at London Bridge is completed. Negotiations on the agreement to lease and occupancy date are well advanced and I expect to make an announcement very shortly.

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the budgeted cost is of converting offices for the future Mayor of London. [101154]

Mr. Hill: The temporary home of the new Greater London Authority in Romney House was selected from the Department's estate and it is anticipated that the cost of refurbishment will be around £2 million. The offices will be re-used by the Department once the GLA moves to its new headquarters building in London Bridge.

Mr. Fitzpatrick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what response there has been to the consultation on the paper, "The Shape of Things to Come", concerning the organisational structure for the Greater London Authority. [102116]

Mr. Hill: The GLA Transition Team, under Dr. Robert Chilton, has advised me on the responses to the consultation exercise, and I have agreed some minor changes to the organisational structure originally proposed. A response document, entitled "Shaping up for the Mayor and Assembly" has today been published. A copy will be placed in the House Library.

Waste Recycling

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those local authorities which have met his target for recycling domestic waste. [101446]

Mr. Meacher: There is no recycling target which each individual local authority is expected to meet. There is a national goal to recycle or compost 25 per cent. of household waste as soon as possible, hopefully by 2005. By 2010 we hope to see 30 per cent. of household waste being recycled or composted, and in the longer term we hope to see a third of all households being dealt with in this way.

Under our Best Value Initiative performance indicators are being developed for local authority waste services. From these, authorities will be expected to derive targets for their own performance on waste, having regard to any national goals we set in the forthcoming National Waste Strategy. I emphasise, though, that local targets should take account of local assessments of the Best Practicable Environmental Option, and will not therefore necessarily be at the same level as our national goals. I fully expect some authorities to put forward targets that exceed those that we propose, and others to put forward lower targets.

From data supplied for the 1997–98 Municipal Waste Survey, it is clear that many authorities are doing excellent work on recycling and composting. From that data, the following authorities have recycling rates of 25 per cent. or over, and some are exceeding 30 per cent.:

Adur District Council
Chichester District Council
Chiltern District Council
Christchurch Borough Council
East Dorset District Council
Eastleigh Borough Council
Gosport Borough Council
Havant Borough Council
New Forest District Council
North Dorset District Council
Purbeck District Council
Reigate and Banstead Borough Council
South Bucks District Council
Tandridge District Council
Weymouth and Portland Borough Council

Note:

Recycling rates are calculated as the quantity of household waste collected for recycling, expressed as a percentage of total household waste. These calculations exclude recycling of building rubble, and make no allowance for home composting.

In non-unitary areas, the figures cover amounts collected within the area by both the Waste Collection Authority and the Waste Disposal Authority. In most cases, figures for total household waste (apart from amounts collected for recycling) are taken from returns from Waste Disposal Authorities.

I also know that a number of authorities who do not appear on this list have recently put in new schemes which are helping those authorities to be well on the way to achieving recycling rates over 40 per cent.

Waste Incineration

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his Department's liability for any health problems caused by the incineration of waste. [100942]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 6 December 1999]: The setting and enforcing of high environmental protection standards for waste incineration is a priority for the Government. Incinerators in England (and Wales) are regulated by the Environment Agency or local authorities under the Environmental Protection Act 1990. Whether a particular person or organisation would be liable for any damage caused by incineration would be for the Courts to decide in the circumstances of the particular case.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of the incineration of waste on (a) the Government's national air quality strategy and (b) local authority air quality strategies; and if he will make a statement. [100944]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 6 December 1999]: The recent review of the UK National Air Quality Strategy considered all stationary and mobile sources of air pollution, including waste incineration, in forecasting the future air pollution climate. A revised version of the Strategy is to be published shortly. Incineration plant are already tightly controlled under the provisions of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 through which EU waste incineration legislation is also implemented.

No national assessment has been made of the impact of incineration on local air quality strategies. In carrying out their local air quality management duties, however, local authorities will need to take account of the impact on air quality of any incineration processes in their areas. In drawing up any action plan or strategy to tackle local air pollution, authorities will wish to ensure that any additional reduction contributed by different sources (including any incineration processes) is balanced, proportionate and cost effective in relation to achieving the plan's objectives.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research the Government have commissioned into the possible risk to human health from the incineration of waste, indicating the publication date of each research document. [100943]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 6 December 1999]: The following recent Government sponsored research has addressed possible risks to human health specifically in relation to waste incineration:

Risk assessment of dioxin releases from municipal waste incineration processes HMIP/CPR2/41/1/181 Published by HMIP, 1996.

Cancer incidence near municipal solid waste incinerators in Great Britain, by SAHSU, Elliott P, et al. Published in the British Journal of Cancer 1996 volume 73, pp 702–710. (A follow up study is to be published in the same journal early next year).

A study of dioxins and furans in soil around four municipal waste incinerators in Hampshire, prepared by AEA Technology for the Environment Agency, 1996.

Risks from BSE via environmental pathways, prepared by DNV for the Environment Agency, 1997.

Health Effects of Waste Combustion Products, prepared by the Medical Research Council/Institute for Environment and Health for DTI, 1997.

The Department of Health's Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollutants has also published a number of reports which are relevant to possible health effects of waste incineration. These are:

Non-biological particles and health, Published 1995

Asthma and outdoor pollution, Published 1995

Quantification of the effects of air pollution on health in the UK, Published 1998.

The Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution's Seventeenth Report on Incineration of Waste (Cm 2181, 1993) also considered health effects of waste incineration. The Department of Health/Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions Air Pollution Research Initiative is currently examining the effects on health of some products of combustion, including particles. A report for the Environment Agency on clinicai waste disposal risk assessment is to be published shortly.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he has taken to ensure that the North West Regional Development Agency consults local authorities in non-assisted areas within the region. [101344]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 6 December 1999]: RDAs are expected to consult regularly with all local authorities in their regions and we will expect them to continue to consult on their activities as these progress.

Most recently, the North West Development Agency consulted with local authorities and other regional partners in drawing up its regional strategy.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance he has given to regional development agencies on discharging of their statutory obligation to promote sustainable development in their regional economic strategies. [101697]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Guidance on the formulation of the strategies was issued to the Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) on 31 March 1999. This outlined how the RDAs should seek to meet their statutory duty under Section 4 of the RDAs Act 1998, to contribute to the achievement of sustainable development in the UK, where it is relevant to its area to do so.

The guidance specifies that an appraisal of the contribution the strategy will make to sustainable development should be produced.

In addition to the guidance on RDAs' strategies, the Government have issued supplementary guidance to advise the RDAs more fully on sustainable development issues.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how the regional economic strategies of the regional development agencies will be monitored to ensure that the regional development agencies conform with statutory guidance (a) to take account of the needs of rural areas and (b) to promote sustainable development. [101698]

Ms Beverley Hughes: As set out in the guidance to RDAs on the formulation of their strategies, the Government Offices for the Region will provide the focus for an on-going dialogue with Government as each strategy develops and is reviewed. They will also provide a means of ensuring that each strategy enhances and supports national policies and programmes.

Transport Safety

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will complete his review of transport safety and accident investigation. [101846]

Mr. Hill: The review of transport safety arrangements, including accident investigation, is expected to be completed in the New Year.

Radioactive Waste

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on recent EU legislation allowing member states to recycle low-level radioactive waste into consumer products. [101694]

Mr. Mullin: The EURATOM Basic Safety Standards Directive Euratom 96–29 imposes a high degree of radiological protection revising earlier Directives setting basic safety standards for the protection of workers and members of the public against the dangers of ionising radiation. Article five of the Directive makes the disposal, recycling or re-use of radioactive substances subject to authorisation by the regulators.

With most materials containing some radioactivity it is important to set thresholds in regulations below which materials will be treated as outside the framework of control. The Directive therefore permits member states to set levels of radioactivity below which materials can be disposed of, recycled and re-used without needing prior authorisation. This concept is known as clearance, with clearance levels setting a threshold at or below which the levels of radioactivity are small and pose negligible radiological risk, irrespective of the volume and fate of that material. The Government have recently issued a consultation document on implementation of the Directive including the issue of clearance levels. Responses to this are still being considered and Government proposals will be made in due course.

In the UK, the sale or disposal of radioactively contaminated material is closely regulated by the Environment Agency (in England and Wales), the Scottish Environment Protection Agency (in Scotland), and Department of Environment (NI) in Northern Ireland under the Radioactive Substances Act 1993 to ensure that the levels of radioactivity involved pose insignificant risk to human health or the environment.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received concerning the recycling of low-level radioactive waste into consumer products. [101695]

Mr. Mullin: In response to a leaflet run by the Low Level Radiation Campaign (LLRC) about concerns of contaminated materials being reused and recycled into consumer goods, the Department has received 28 letters, 14 of which have been replied to by Ministers and 14 by officials. In addition, in response to a recent consultation exercise on implementation of the revised Basic Safety Standards Directive Euratom 96/29, further representations in support of the LLRC were received.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment has met with representatives of the LLRC when the matter of recycling low-level radioactive waste in consumer products was discussed.

Rolling Stock

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to strengthen the regulation of rail companies to ensure that adequate rolling stock is provided on peak-time rail services in order to avert over-crowding. [101346]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 6 December 1999]: Train Operating Companies (TOCs) have a general obligation to avoid excessive overcrowding on all services. London commuter TOCs and TOCs providing some commuter services into Edinburgh are subject to annual counts of Passengers in Excess of Capacity (PIXC) and must not exceed 4.5 per cent. above capacity in either the morning or evening peak and 3 per cent. in the combined morning and evening peaks. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister issued the Franchising Director with new Instructions and Guidance on 29 September 1999 in which he asked him to deliver improvements in services through re-negotiation of the terms of franchise agreements.

Blackpool to Manchester Line

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his policy is on the electrification of the Blackpool to Manchester line. [101345]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 6 December 1999]: Railtrack have told me that they believe there is no business case for electrification of the Blackpool to Manchester line unless external funding is available. They also say that no interest has been shown from any train operating company.

Brownfield Development

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the brownfield development sites in (a) Colchester borough and (b) Tendring district. [101631]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 6 December 1999]: The information is not available centrally. Provisional estimates, from the National Land Use Database, of the total amount of previously developed land that may be available for redevelopment by Government Office Region were published last May in the Department's Information Bulletin 500.

Landfill Gases

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what Government-sponsored research there has been into the health effects of burning landfill gases in the last 10 years. [101434]

Mr. Hill: Last year the Department commissioned the Small Area Health Statistics Unit at Imperial College to carry out a national study of adverse health effects around landfill sites. The results of this study are anticipated in approximately 18 months time. In September this year my right hon. Friend, the Minister for the Environment, launched a Government-funded research programme which will provide further information about potential harmful effects of substances which may be released from landfill sites.

Water Resources

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which body is responsible for ensuring that there are sufficient water resources for future large scale development under regional planning guidance. [101433]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 6 December 1999]: The consultation draft of Planning Policy Guidance Note 11—Regional Planning, published earlier this year, makes clear (para. 2.31) that the Regional Planning Bodies, in framing policies in draft Regional Planning Guidance, should consider with the Environment Agency and the water industry the availability of water resources. Regional Planning Guidance should help foster co-operation between local planning authorities, water companies and the Environment Agency to ensure that water supply sources are protected and that rates of development do not exceed the capacities of existing or planned water supply systems to meet projected demand.

Public Transport Costs

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the costs of public transport in (a) London and (b) other European capitals. [101510]

Mr. Hill: The cost to the Government of supporting London Transport is recorded in the Annual Report of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. The Annual Report also gives the cost of supporting train services, though it is not possible to identify separately the cost of supporting train services in London.

Costs incurred by London Transport in providing bus and underground services are published in their annual report and accounts.

The Government do not maintain statistics on the finances of public transport systems in other European capitals.

EU Structural Funds (Merseyside)

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the role of the public sector in providing match funding for the Objective 1 Merseyside Programme for (a) the current programme and (b) the programme for 2000–2006. [101840]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Merseyside has run a highly successful Objective 1 programme in the current round, and the Government welcome the new Objective 1 programme which will bring in more than £850 million in European funding. This will bring new opportunities to stimulate economic growth and encourage increased investment and jobs.

The position on match funding for the Objective 1 Merseyside Programme has not changed—it will continue to be the responsibility of grant applicants. This principle is an important element in ensuring local ownership and commitment, and helping integration of regional priorities and strategies. In this way, European funding is used alongside money already provided at the national and local level to help revitalise the area and achieve a better quality of life for those who live there.

The Government have provided, and will continue to provide, significant financial support for Merseyside through a wide variety of programmes. These include the Single Regeneration Budget and New Deal for Communities, as well as mainstream programmes such as the Revenue Support Grant for local authorities. Local partnerships can prioritise the use of these resources to fund projects jointly with the Structural Funds, thereby boosting their impact.

Regional partners can also seek to match their European funds with contributions from the voluntary and private sectors, as well as through loans from organisations such as the European Investment Bank.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Parental Rights

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will equalise the rights and the responsibilities of unmarried parents where both parents' names are given on the child's birth certificate and where there is financial commitment by both parents to the maintenance and welfare of the child. [101338]

Jane Kennedy: I refer my hon. Friend to the written answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) on 6 December 1999, Official Report, column 398W.

Family Law

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Lord Chancellor will publish the report on the consultation on the document, Contact between Children and Violent Parents. [101507]

Jane Kennedy: The consultation paper on the question of parental contact in cases where there is domestic violence was issued by the Children Act Sub-Committee of the Lord Chancellor's Advisory Board on Family Law in June 1999. The Advisory Board is an independent, advisory non-departmental public body. The consultation period was extended to 1 December and the responses are currently being collated for consideration by the Sub-Committee. The Advisory Board will consider in the new year the question of how and when the results of the consultation should be made public.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department which organisations responded to the consultation document, Contact between Children and Violent Parents, produced by her Department's Advisory Board on Family Law; and what issues they raised. [101506]

Jane Kennedy: The consultation paper on the question of parental contact in cases where there is domestic violence was issued by the Children Act Sub-Committee of the Lord Chancellor's Advisory Board on Family Law in June 1999. The Advisory Board is an independent, advisory non-departmental public body. Over 200 responses have been received and these are currently being collated and summarised for consideration by the Sub-Committee in the New Year. The Sub-Committee will consider the issues raised, the advice to be given and the question of how the results of the consultation should be made public.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much his Department has spent on ministerial transport in 1995–96 and 1996–97. [98715]

Mr. Bayley: The information my hon. Friend has requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, information dating from the establishment of the Government Car and Despatch Agency in April 1997 is available, and I refer her to the answer provided by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office, on 1 December 1999, Official Report, columns 255–56W.

Special Payments

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what changes he has made to the indicators of delay which have to be satisfied before a special payment can be considered since 1 May 1997; [101095]

(2) if he will publish in respect of each benefit payable the indicators of delay which must be satisfied before a special payment can be considered due to late payment. [101096]

Mr. Bayley: No changes have been made to the indicators of delay which have to be satisfied before a special payment can be considered since 1 May 1997.

The indicators of delay which must be satisfied in respect of each benefit before a special payment can be considered due to late payment are published in "Financial Redress for Maladministration". This document is available in every Local Office for the general public to read upon request. It is also available in the Library, at main public libraries and as a priced document from The Stationery Office bookshops.

Work-focused Gateway

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to extend (a) private and voluntary sector involvement in and (b) call centre facilities to all the single work-focused gateway pilot projects. [100873]

Angela Eagle: There are no plans to extend the private sector involvement or call centre facilities to the four 'basic model' pilots. The three pilot variants were chosen to test different methods of delivering the ONE service. We are monitoring the pilots carefully and have planned a full evaluation of the ONE service using qualitative as well as quantitative research.

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what recent assessment he has made of the performance of the single work-focused gateway pilot project in Clyde Coast and Renfrew; [100874]

(2) how many people (a) have attended an interview with a personal adviser and (b) been successfully placed in the employment option as part of the single work-focused gateway pilot project in Clyde Coast and Renfrew. [100875]

Angela Eagle: The early signs are encouraging; clients are pleased with the ONE service and the active support that it offers. It is helping people to make links with the labour market who might hitherto never have considered that work was even a possibility. It is not, however, meaningful to assess the pilots further at such an early stage or to draw any conclusions from the figures while the pilots are settling down. We are investing considerable resources in a thorough evaluation of the ONE service and when robust and reliable data are available we will make them public.

Benefit Administrator

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish in respect of all benefits payable the length of time which his Department expects to clear claims for that particular benefit. [101094]

Angela Eagle: The administration of benefits is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mark Fisher to Mr. Christopher Chope, dated 6 December 1999:

The Secretary of State has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about publication of benefit clearance times. As he is unavailable I am replying.

The Benefits Agency Customer Charter, which was published on 29 November, sets out national standards for a range of activities that customers can expect the Agency's offices to provide. This includes the length of time the Agency expects to take to clear benefit claims made by the Agency's main client groups, i. e. those of working age, pension age, the disabled and children. It also takes account of the need to balance accuracy and speed.

The information is set out in the attached table.

I hope this is helpful.

Charter standards: Time taken for decisions on claims and change of circumstances

Benefit	Claims (working days)
Income Support	13
Jobseeker's Allowance	21
Incapacity Benefit	30
Disability Living Allowance	53
Retirement Pension	60
Child Benefit	30

Income Support

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people living in the London Borough of Wandsworth are in receipt of income support. [101045]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of benefits is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 6 December 1999:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the number of people living on the London Borough of Wandsworth on Income Support (IS).

The information is not available in the format requested as the Benefits Agency does not collate information by local authority boundary. However, a figure can be obtained by identifying the postcode of customers living in the area.

The number of IS claims from within the London Borough of Wandsworth is approximately 18,500. This represents the number of IS claims, not the total number of beneficiaries of those claims. It is rounded to the nearest hundred cases, and is subject to a degree of sampling error. The sample size was 5% of the IS live load, taken from the IS Statistics Quarterly Enquiries, August 1999.

I hope this is helpful.

Parental Benefits

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many non-resident parents are exempt from payment of child support maintenance under regulation 26 of the Child Support (Maintenance Assessment and Special Cases) Regulations 1992 on the grounds that they have the family premium included in the calculation or estimation of their protected income level. [101202]

Angela Eagle: There are 44,440 non-resident parents on benefit who are exempt from payment of child support maintenance under regulation 26 because they are receiving the family premium.

Note:

29,240 on Income Support and 15,200 on income-based Jobseeker's Allowance.

Source:

August 1999 scan of Income Support and JSA Computer Systems.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of parents with care who will have the level of their maintenance assessments reduced under the proposed changes to the child support scheme and are (a) not in receipt of tax credits, Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance and (b) in receipt of tax credits but have a child support assessment under the current rules of less than £15 per week. [101201]

Angela Eagle: We estimate that, of the parents with care whose current maintenance assessment is higher than the liability worked out using the new rates, there are around 140,000 who are not in receipt of tax credits, Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance. On the same basis, there are around 10,000 parents with care who we anticipate will have a lower maintenance calculation under the new scheme who are receiving tax credit and have a child support assessment of less than £15 a week.

Notes:

1. New scheme maintenance modelled on August 1998 5 per cent. scan of the Child Support computer system.

2. Caseloads calibrated to forecast "A" day levels and are rounded to the nearest 10,000.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of disregarding the full amount of child support maintenance payment received in calculating entitlement to housing benefit and council tax benefit. [101203]

Angela Eagle: We estimate that the cost of fully disregarding maintenance payments in Housing Benefit (HB) and Council Tax Benefit would be about £30 million a year. This includes an estimate for the cost for cases who would become newly entitled as a result of the full disregard.

Notes:

1. Cost for existing claims based on data taken from May 1998 HBMIS dataset, a 1 per cent. survey of HB claims.

2. Cost for cases who become newly entitled is calculated from data taken from 1996–97 Family Resources Survey uprated to 2000–01 prices, benefits and earnings levels.

3. Costs and Caseloads are calibrated to forecast caseloads for 2000–01. The cost has been rounded to the nearest £10 million.

4. This cost will include a small element of spousal maintenance.

Council Tax Benefit

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to make the payment of council tax benefit and housing benefit faster and more efficient. [101367]

Angela Eagle: We are committed to driving forward improvements in the benefit services authorities provide so that they are faster, more accurate and more secure whilst also achieving value for money and taking account of the views and needs of local people. A comprehensive range of best value performance indicators for the delivery of Housing and Council Tax Benefit was included in the recent joint DETR and Audit Commission consultation exercise ("Performance Indicators for 2000/2001"). Indicators will be finalised by the end of 1999 and will cover the key aspects of local authorities' performance in delivering Housing and Council Tax Benefit.

A number of initiatives are also currently being developed and implemented in partnership with local authorities to improve the efficiency and speed of Housing and Council Tax Benefit delivery.

Remote Access Terminals are now installed in 346 local authorities. These terminals provide the authorities with direct access to relevant benefit information held by the Benefits Agency and contribute towards reducing the time it takes to process Housing and Council Tax Benefit claims.

The Department has now completed piloting the Electronic Transfer of Data in 20 sites. This initiative, if implemented nationally, will remove the need for approximately 20 million paper transactions each year between Benefit Agency and local authority offices, while reducing transfer time to two working days.

Child Benefit

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will instruct the child benefit centre to write to all recipients of child benefit reminding them of their right to claim benefit in cash from their local post office; and if he will make a statement of his policy on encouraging benefit payments to be made by direct transfer to a local bank account. [101327]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on 1 December 1999, Official Report, column 238W.

We do not intend to take active steps to move customers on to automated credit transfer (ACT) before 2003. Until then, the Department will continue, in the normal way, to provide customers with the information they need on benefit payment options, and customers will continue, as now, to be able to choose between payment by order book at post offices and payment by ACT.

Pensioners

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate (a) the numbers of those resident in North-West Norfolk who will or would benefit from and (b) the full-year cost to his Department of delivery to those people of (i) the increase in the basic state pension (1) as announced and (2) if it had been raised this year in line with the rise in earnings, (ii) the minimum income guarantee for pensioners, (iii) the £100 payment for pensioner households and (iv) the free television licence for those over 75 years. [101380]

Mr. Rooker: The information requested is not available at Parliamentary constituency level.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport is responsible for introducing the free television licence for the over 75s.

Benefits (Method of Payment)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) in preparing for the transfer of benefits business from the Post Office to banks, what agreement has been reached with the banks to manage their branch operations consistent with the special needs of low income customers; [101607]

(2) when benefits business is transferred from the Post Office to banks who will carry the liability for bank account charges, with particular reference to charges for ATM withdrawals. [101608]

Mr. Rooker: We have decided to move to automated credit transfer (ACT) from 2003 as a modern, more secure and efficient method of paying benefits. The Department will be arranging discussions with the banking industry on issues surrounding benefit recipients, charges and other matters in due course.

Savings Limits

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the value of suspended or party-paid endowment plans is taken into account in the calculation of savings for the savings limits in means-tested benefits. [101401]

Mr. Bayley: The surrender value of any policy of life insurance, including these types of policy, is disregarded in the assessment of entitlement to means-tested benefits (Income Support, Jobseeker's Allowance, Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit).

PRIME Contract

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place a copy of the PRIME contract in the Library. [101841]

Angela Eagle: The PRIME contract contains not only technical data but also information of a commercially confidential nature. It is therefore subject to a confidentiality agreement between the Department and the contractor, Trillium. The Department will, however, take the matter forward with Trillium, with a view to obtaining an acceptable solution to the publication or disclosure of the document.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if the PRIME contract with Trillium allows his Department to sub-let immediately surplus parts of the estate above the 2 per cent. per year which his Department is allowed to vacate without charge; [101842]

(2) if the PRIME contract with Trillium allows his Department to sub-let surplus parts of the estate above the 35 per cent. which his Department may vacate without charge. [101843]

Angela Eagle: Now that the Department no longer owns any freehold accommodation, and has transferred the risk of all former leasehold properties to Trillium, we can no longer sub-let to the open market. We believe, however, that we have negotiated sufficient flexibility with this contract to meet our changing business needs.

On 1 April 1998, at the outset of the PRIME contract just under 30 per cent. of the total estate (some 1,644,089 square metres including surplus space) was designated "flexible". This is accommodation which we are entitled to vacate over the course of the contract without charge.

Up to 2 per cent. of this flexible space can be released each year with any unused allowance being carried forward until required. In addition to this, a further 10 per cent. of the total estate can be vacated subject to a charge, to cover Trillium's "unavoidable costs".

Having already given back to Trillium some 10 per cent. of the estate that was surplus to requirements on day one of the contract, we effectively have a package in place that will allow us to vacate half of the entire estate.

In the first year of the contract, however, only 1 per cent. of our flexible accommodation was returned to Trillium, so that we now have some 3 per cent. available for release this year. The current indication is that we will return around 0.5 per cent. before April, so, with the roll over allowance, we could feasibly give back 4.5 per cent. of space to Trillium in the third year of the contract.

The Department is, therefore, well within the flexibility allowance. If a situation arose where we were ever in a situation that we had used up all flexibility in the contract, we could still attempt to return space to Trillium by negotiation or offer it to other Government Departments.

Money Purchase Plans

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the total value of money purchase plans presented for annualisation or income drawdown plans was in (a) 1990, (b) 1997 and (c) 1998; and what value is estimated for (i) 1999, (ii) 2000 and (iii) 2004. [101844]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

The total value of lump sums used to purchase pension annuities or income drawdown plans is given in the following table. The information does not distinguish between money purchase and other pension plans which are presented for annuitisation or income drawdown. The information on annuity purchase is only available from 1991 and the income drawdown information from 1996. No projections for future years are available.

£ million

	New single premiums for pension annuities	New single premiums for income drawdown plans

SCOTLAND

Correspondence

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he plans to reply to the Question of 17 November (ref 98578) from the hon. Member for Hertsmere. [101696]

Dr. Reid: I replied to the hon. Member yesterday, 6 December 1999, Official Report, columns 365–66W.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Engagements

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 November. [99851]

Mr. Mandelson: On the morning of 18 November I met with my Parliamentary Private Secretary; attended a Labour Party staff meeting; and attended Cabinet.

In the afternoon I recorded a televised message for Voluntary Services Overseas, in connection with the launch of VSO's business partnerships; and I met the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Later, in Northern Ireland I attended a National Arts Collections Fund evening.

Departmental Transport

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much his Department has spent on ministerial transport in each of the last two years. [98703]

Mr. Ingram: Ministers are required—under the terms of the Ministerial Code, and Travel by Ministers—to make efficient and cost-effective travel arrangements. For information on spend on the Government Car Service, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to her by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office, on 1 December 1999, Official Report, column 255W. Additional amounts of £524,593[1] and £557,700 were spent in 1997–98 and 1998–99 respectively for Northern Ireland Ministers.

[1] Excludes information on car hire charges which could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Sectarian Attacks

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the (a) dates, (b) times and (c) location of each reported sectarian attack in Northern Ireland since 1 June, of which the RUC is aware, indicating those incidents following which persons have been charged. [100176]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 1 December 1999]: It is not possible to provide the information requested as crimes are not recorded as sectarian. However I am advised that between 1 June and 23 November 1999 there have been 11 attacks on church property, 17 attacks on school property, 17 attacks on Orange halls and one attack on GAA property.

HEALTH

Waiting Lists

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made by Northamptonshire Health Authority in meeting the Government's targets to reduce waiting lists within the NHS. [100783]

Mr. Denham: Northamptonshire Health Authority is making excellent progress on reducing waiting lists in line with our targets set for the National Health Service.

Inpatients

At the end of October 1999, Northamptonshire Health Authority had a total inpatient waiting list of 13,223. Inpatient waiting figures in March 1997 for Northampton HA was 13,835, however these figures were collected on a district resident basis, whereas current figures are based on primary care group area.

Employment Policies

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce more flexible and family friendly employment policies in the National Health Service. [100618]

Mr. Denham: The human resources framework Working Together sets out our determination to improve the quality of working lives for staff in the National Health Service. This year a resource pack called Working Lives was issued to all NHS employers to share good practice. A second resource pack is in preparation which will include lessons learnt from the retail sector on work schedules and rostering systems.

In September this year Ministers launched a £1 million campaign called "Improving Working Lives in the NHS" as part of our wider agenda on supporting the family. Each region has appointed a high profile champion to lead a multi disciplinary task force to introduce more flexible and family friendly policies in the NHS. The "Improving Working Lives Champion" for Bolton North East is Kath Holbourn, Director of Nursing, Leighton Hospital, Middlewich Road, Crewe and can be contacted on 01270 612 351.

A kite marking system will be developed to ensure that local organisations that perform well can be recognised. As a first step a draft set of principles outlining the values and characteristics of NHS organisations committed to these policies was published in September for consultation. Copies of the consultation booklet "Improving Working Lives in the NHS" have been placed in the Library.

Nurses

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to recruit nurses to, and retain nurses in, the National Health Service. [100607]

Mr. Denham: The comprehensive spending review allows the employment of up to 15,000 more nurses, midwives and health visitors over the next three years and 6,000 more nurse training places. This year nurses received the biggest real terms pay rise for nurses for 10 years, and for the first time in five years the award was paid nationally, in full and with no staging from 1 April 1999.

This year's £5 million nursing recruitment campaign attracted a very encouraging response with over 53,000 inquiries. Since the campaign began, over 2,000 nurses have already returned to employment in the National Health Service in England, with a further 2,000 in the pipeline. 57 per cent. of those who have returned so far have taken up part-time posts, which demonstrates how the NHS is providing more flexible family friendly employment opportunities for nurses who wish to return. The Department is running a campaign called "Improving Working Lives in the NHS" as part of the overarching human resource framework "Working Together". We have also taken steps to address racism and violence and to promote equal opportunities.

The schools competition run this year also attracted a very encouraging response. The number of applications for nursing and midwifery courses for this academic year rose by 92 per cent. on the total number of applications last year.

Hospices

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what support has been provided by his Department to individual hospices in each of the last three years; [100137]

(2) what role he proposes for hospices in health improvement programmes. [100139]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 30 November 1999]: The development of health improvement programmes is led by the health authority in partnership with the whole range of local interests, including those who provide local services and those who use local services either as patients or carers, the organisations that represent them, such as community health councils, voluntary sector organisations, support and community groups. This will, where appropriate, include the involvement of hospices and will provide a further opportunity for them to contribute to the development at a local level of strategies for palliative care provision. The need for high quality palliative care should be considered locally as part of the health improvement programme process.

Approximately a third of hospice running costs are met through the National Health Service.

Some £20 million will also be made available to palliative care from the National Lottery new opportunities fund for the cancer detection, treatment and care initiative. The initiative will be launched early in the new year.

Strokes

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which authorities retain specialist stroke units. [100867]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested, as authorities use different definitions of specialist stroke units.

However the report on the National Sentinel Audit of stroke 1998 showed that in relation to organised stroke care 50 per cent. of National Health Service trusts nationally had a specialist stroke team, with 64 per cent. having a consultant with responsibility for stroke.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the average cost of caring for a stroke victim in each health authority for the latest available year. [100865]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what inquiries his Department has undertaken since 1992 to determine the impact of stroke on the population. [100870]

Mr. Denham: The Department conducts annual monitoring of stroke mortality rates collected by the Office for National Statistics.

Every five years disability is monitored as part of the Health Survey of England.

Dental Anaesthesia (Fees)

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will remove dental anaesthesia from the general dental practitioners' scale of fees. [101191]

Mr. Hutton: A review of general anaesthesia and sedation for dental treatment is currently taking place. Decisions about future funding for provision of this service will be made once Ministers have considered the review's findings.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Operation CARE

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what claims for compensation his Department has received from individuals in relation to Operation CARE. [100236]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Victims of sexual and physical abuse as children can claim compensation under the Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme, which is administered by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority.

The Authority advise that they cannot isolate cases that are attributable to Operation CARE.

Pre-inquest Disclosure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the compliance by the Metropolitan Police with his Department's circular on pre-inquest disclosure to families of persons who have died in police custody in (a) the Roger Sylvester case and (b) other cases; and if he will make a statement. [100846]

Mr. Charles Clarke: No general assessment of compliance has yet been made. The circular was issued on 28 April 1999 and it remains our intention to review the implementation of the guidance after it has been in operation for a year.

My understanding from the information available to me is that the Metropolitan Police are complying with the circular. The Crown Prosecution Service is considering whether criminal proceedings relating to the death of Mr. Sylvester are appropriate. The circular states that disclosure should not take place until either the Crown Prosecution Service has advised against a prosecution of proceedings are complete.

Driving Offences

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of convictions in 1998 of motorists charged with driving while under the influence of (a) alcohol and (b) drugs; and if he will make a statement. [101097]

Mr. Charles Clarke: It is not possible in the statistics held centrally to distinguish between convictions for driving while under the influence of drugs and convictions for drinking under the influence of alcohol because the charge does not distinguish which of the two is involved.

Figures of convictions for motoring offences in 1998 have not yet been published, but provisional figures show that some 93,000 convictions for driving after consuming alcohol or taking drugs were recorded in England and Wales, some 7 per cent. lower than the previous year.

Figures from the Forensic Science Service, however, show that 1,779 blood samples were analysed by them on behalf of the police service in England and Wales during 1998–99, following charges under Section 4 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, approximately 90 per cent. of which were found to contain one or more drugs (although it is known that some police forces may have submitted blood samples for analysis elsewhere).

Merseyside Police

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers served in Merseyside Police for each year since 1994 to date; and what is the current number of serving officers. [101038]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information on police numbers is collected twice a year (March and September). The figures for September 1999 are not yet available. The information requested for each year since 1994 is set out in the table.

Year (as at 31 March)	Police officer numbers
1994	4,693
1995	4,659
1996	4,411
1997	4,230
1998	4,216
1999	4,211

Cyclists (Fines)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many on-the-spot fines for cycling on the pavement have been issued by each police force since the scheme was introduced. [100902]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information is not yet available.

Each police force has been asked to monitor the new fixed penalty provisions which came into force on 1 August 1999, but the figures are not likely to be available until early in the new year.

Police Efficiency

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what quantitative assessment he has made of the levels of efficiency of individual police forces, and of the differential impact of his proposed 2 per cent. efficiency savings on their operational capacity; and if he will make a statement. [101114]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Home Office uses a number of different measures to assess police performance. There is no agreed formula for measuring police efficiency, although work on measuring comparative efficiency is being carried out locally to meet the requirements of Best Value. In addition, the Public Service Productivity Panel is assessing tools for measuring efficiency to assist Police Authorities in meeting their Best Value duties.

The efficiency targets set by the Government require each force to plan efficiency gains to equal to at least 2 per cent. of non-revenue expenditure for reinvestment in front line policing. Each force will retain any cash savings for use in improving their service to the public. The overall impact will be to make efficiency gains worth £440 million available for police operations between 1999 and 2002. The differential impact for each force will depend on the strength of the efficiency plan.

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact on numbers of (a) total employees, (b) uniformed officers and (c) civilian staff of his planned 2 per cent. efficiency reduction for 2000–01 in respect of the (i) Greater Manchester, (ii) Cheshire, (iii) Merseyside and (iv) Lancashire police; and if he will make a statement. [101116]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This Government's Comprehensive Spending Review has set the police a 2 per cent. year on year efficiency target from April 1999. This is not a reduction in police funding—the resources released by efficiency gains will be reinvested in frontline policing.

As in 1999–2000, each police authority has been asked to produce an efficiency plan for the year 2000–01 detailing how this 2 per cent. efficiency target can be reached, and how cashable savings will be reinvested to provide a better public service.

The impact of efficiency plans on numbers of employees, whether police officers or civilians, is a matter for police authorities and chief officers to determine. We expect efficiency plans to be submitted to the Home Office by April 2000, and until they have been finalised I can make no assessment.

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take into account the efficiency levels of police forces when assessing bids from them for the additional special funding for front-line officers; and if he will make a statement. [101115]

Mr. Charles Clarke: One of the "gateway" criteria against which bids will be assessed is that forces are on target to meet the 2 per cent. efficiency gains for 1999–2000 as required by the Government Comprehensive Spending Review.

Drugs

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons aged (a) 10, (b) 11, (c) 12, (d) 13, (e) 14, (f) 15, (g) 16, (h) 17 and (i) 18 years have been (i) cautioned and (ii) convicted for (1) possession of and (2) supply of (y) Class A and (z) Class B illegal drugs in each of the last 10 years. [101369]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Domestic Disputes (Bolton)

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many custodial sentences were implemented by courts in Bolton for crimes relating to domestic disputes in each of the last 10 years. [101316]

Mr. Charles Clarke: It is not possible to identify cases relating to domestic disputes from the Home Office Court Proceedings Database since it does not hold information on the circumstances behind individual offences.

Handguns

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many (a) illegal and (b) legally-held handguns have been handed in since the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 came into force; [101156]

(2) what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the ban on privately-held handguns in reducing the level of gun-related crime in the United Kingdom; [101165]

(3) how much has been paid in compensation to gun-owners for the surrender of handguns to the police since the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 came into force. [101199]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Just over 162,000 handguns were surrendered to the police under the terms of the Firearms (Amendment) Acts 1997. Records are not held centrally of those illegally or legally held firearms, including any handguns, which might have been handed in to the police for other reasons.

The ban on handguns was a direct response to the tragic shootings at Dunblane Primary School in March 1996, which were carried out with legally held handguns. It did not purport to solve the more general problem of armed crime, the vast majority of which is carried out using illegally held firearms. Nevertheless, the ban has removed one potential source of handguns for criminal use: in 1997, 305 handguns were stolen or otherwise misappropriated, mostly from private homes.

As at 30 November, a total of just over £89 million had been paid in compensation to those individuals who surrendered firearms and ancillary equipment under the terms of the 1997 Acts. The final figure is currently forecast to be approximately £90.2 million.

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action is being taken to (a) detect and (b) confiscate illegally held handguns. [101157]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The decision of smuggled handguns is the responsibility of Her Majesty's Customs, and the recovery of those in criminal use is the individual responsibility of every Constabulary. Intelligence led operations are used by the police to recover firearms from criminals, and Firearms Inquiry Units operated by the police concentrate on the licensing and administration of legitimate firearms to prevent legally held firearms being diverted into the criminal market. Additionally, the National Crime Squad and metropolitan forces run proactive operations against criminal sources that supply illegal handguns. The Association of Chief Police Officers two sub-committees, Criminal Use of Firearms and the Administration of Firearms and Explosives Licensing are also revising strategies to enhance the detection of illegally held firearms in criminal use.

In addition to these measures, the Government are pursuing a number of initiatives aimed at supporting police and Customs target and detect illegal activity as and when it occurs. These include:

The creation of a strategic threat assessment of the firearm situation in England and Wales by the National Criminal Intelligence Service;

a request by the Home Office for the Firearms Consultative Committee to look into the criminal misuse of firearms; and the negotiation by the Home Office, internationally, a draft United Nations Protocol against the illicit manufacture of and trafficking in firearms and, within the European Union, action to review the European Union Firearms Directive with the emphasis on preventing illicit trafficking.

Once detected, all illegally held handguns are confiscated by police and Customs and, to ensure they never re-enter the market, the weapons are smelted. In 1998, Customs detected less than 200 firearms being smuggled into the United Kingdom, and collectively the police submitted to the Forensic Science Service fewer than 1,000 illegally held firearms recovered used in crime.

Life Sentences (Murder)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department since 1983 (a) how many people have been given life sentences for murder and (b) of these how many remain in detention; and what are the reasons for the difference between the two figures. [101341]

Mr. Boateng: In the 16 years from 1983 to 1998, a total of 3,360 persons were received into Prison Service establishments in England and Wales under sentence for murder. Of these, 2,652 are currently still in custody. The remainder have died or been discharged and these are set out in the table.

Persons sentenced to life imprisonment for murder discharged from prison 1983–98

Type of discharge	Number
Release on licence	250
Successful appeal	146
Transfer to psychiatric hospital	144
Transfer to a non Prison Service establishment	50
Pardon/remission	3
Died	80
Deported/repatriated	21
Transfer to another establishment outside England and Wales	14
Total discharges	708

Kosovo

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will offer United Nations investigators the use of DNA testing equipment and trained staff to identify the killer of a Serb killed on Flag Day in Kosovo Polje; and if he will make a statement. [101163]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We are doing all we can to support the peacekeeping process in Kosovo and help the International Crimes Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) investigate crimes against humanity and will continue to do so. It is for the United Nations investigators involved in this particular case to decide whether DNA evidence may be of value to their investigation. In that event, we would be happy to consider how we might be able to help.

Jury Trial

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the savings from the implementation of his proposals to change the law relating to election for trial by jury. [101371]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) on 24 November 1999, Official Report, column 125W.

Drug-related Offences

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many successful prosecutions there have been for drug-related offences in the Peterlee and Seaham police sub-division in each year since 1995. [101424]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Data are collected on drug offences only, not on offences which may have been committed owing to drug taking. Nor can information be provided at police sub-division level. There is readily available information on proceedings in the Easington Petty Sessional Division for possession of class B drugs. (These drugs are essentially cannabis and amphetamines, and probably account for about 80 per cent. of all drug offences.) In 1995, out of the 25 persons proceeded against in the magistrates court, 22 were sentenced by that court; none were committed for trial to the Crown court. The following year, 1996, 35 out of 39 proceeded against were sentenced by the magistrates court; one person was committed for trial. In 1997, the latest year for which published data are available, 15 out of 18 proceeded against were sentenced in the lower court, while two were committed for trial.

Consultants

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) agreements and (b) contracts with consultants have been agreed since 1 July for future work, giving in each case the name of the consultants and the project concerned. [101456]

Mr. Straw: The details are as follows.

Agreement

Project	Consultant

National Minorities Convention

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which organisations responded to the consultation on his Department's (a) draft and (b) final report to the Council of Europe on the Convention for National Minorities; and what issues they raised. [101505]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: A very large number of issues were raised and, therefore, I will write to the hon. Member and set out what is a lengthy list.

Parking Spaces

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the number of parking places at prisons in England and Wales and of the use made of these by prison officers and civilian staff. [101838]

Mr. Boateng: No central record is kept of the number of staff car parking places which exist on the prison estate or of the frequency of use. The Prison Service recognises the need to reduce dependency on the private motor vehicle and endeavours to ensure that car parking at new prisons being planned is kept to the minimum level operationally acceptable.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the extent of parking places at police premises in England and Wales and of the use made of them by police officers and civilian staff. [101839]

Mr. Charles Clarke: None. The information requested is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

An Audit Commission report published in March this year recommended that all police forces undertake a strategic review of their estate with a view to identifying efficiency savings through rationalisation and better use of resources. Such reviews are likely to include the availability of parking spaces for operational and staff vehicles.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

New Deal (Heywood and Middleton)

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people from ethnic minorities have joined the New Deal in Heywood and Middleton constituency since its launch nationally. [100296]

Ms Jowell: By the end of September 1999, 34 young people in Heywood and Middleton constituency who identified their ethnic background as from an ethnic minority group had started on the New Deal. The Government are committed to ensuring that New Deal actively promotes equality of opportunity and outcome for young jobseekers of all ethnic and racial groups, and has published their strategy for engaging ethnic minority jobseekers and businesses in the New Deal.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many London local authorities are receiving Section 11 funding. [101044]

Jacqui Smith: In November 1998, the Government announced a new grant, the Ethnic Minority Achievement Grant (EMAG), to replace the education element of the Home Office's Section 11 Grant. EMAG was established to raise standards for those ethnic minority and Traveller pupils particularly at risk of underachieving and to meet the particular needs of pupils for whom English is an Additional Language. All London local authorities received funding through EMAG for 1999–2000. Details of individual allocations, which mirrored Section 11 allocations in 1998–99, are set out in the following table.

Ethnic minority achievement grant 1999–2000: Allocations to local authorities in London

Local education authority	Grant

Waltham Forest	2,054,111
Wandsworth	1,912,879
Westminster	2,151,538

For 2000–01, £162.5 million will be available to local education authorities to improve the attainment of ethnic minority, Traveller and refugee pupils, an increase of 7 per cent. on the amount available for the same purposes in 1999–2000. Provisional allocations for the newly merged Ethnic Minority and Traveller Achievement Grant for 2000–01 were announced in October 1999.

Fresh Start Schools

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what examination and test results of pupils at Fresh Start schools are (a) collected and (b) published; and if he will make a statement. [101178]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 6 December 1999]: Fresh Start schools are obliged to follow the National Curriculum. The pupils of Fresh Start schools are therefore tested at the end of Key Stages 1, 2 and 3. In addition the pupils will be examined at GCSE/GNVQ and A Level/AGNVQ, where appropriate.

The results of the Key Stage 2 test will be published in the primary performance tables. The results of the GCSE/GNVQ and A Level/AGNVQ will be published in the secondary and 16–18 performance tables respectively.

Teachers' Pay

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many applications have been received for the post of communications strategist in his Department to market the Government's performance-related pay proposals. [101392]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 6 December 1999]: The Department has received 52 applications for the post of Communications Strategist.

As a modern profession, teachers have a right to expect the best communications to ensure they have timely and targeted information to help them do their job well. This post will co-ordinate and streamline all teacher communications.

The post is not about marketing performance-related proposals, but about providing a range of information to teachers.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what arrangements he has made to disseminate to local education authorities and schools best practice in the handling of specific learning difficulties (a) in special facilities and (b) alongside other pupils. [101466]

Jacqui Smith: The Action Programme, published in response to the Green Paper "Excellence for all children: Meeting special educational needs", promotes the inclusion of children with special educational needs within mainstream schooling wherever possible, while recognising the continuing need for special schools for some children. Section 14 of the Education Act 1996 requires local education authorities to have regard to the need for securing that special educational provision is made to these pupils. This duty gives the local education authority a role to decide the organisation of provision to suit the needs of the individual child. The Code of Practice on the Identification and Assessment of Special Educational Needs which came into effect on 1 September 1994 provides guidance to help identify and assess children who have specific learning difficulties. The Code is currently being revised to strengthen and improve the guidance and provide examples of best practice.

Raising educational standards lies at the very heart of our education policy. This must include children with special educational needs (SEN) whether in mainstream or special schools. To support provision for SEN pupils the Department has taken a number of steps. For example it has provided a grant to the British Dyslexia Association to help them develop the "Achieving Dyslexia Friendly Schools" resource pack which seeks to demonstrate that it is possible to meet the needs of children with mild to moderate dyslexia in a mainstream classroom. Two copies of this pack have been sent to all local education authorities in England. Also the Department has funded and made available the findings of three research projects on inclusion:

"Effective Practice in Inclusion, and in Special and Mainstream Schools Working Together", Manchester University (Published February 1999)

"Emotional and Behavioural Difficulties in Mainstream Schools", Birmingham University (Published January 1999)

"Cost and Outcomes for Pupils with Moderate Learning Difficulties in Special and Mainstream Schools", Newcastle University (Published November 1999).

In addition we will be producing examples of good effective links from our Working Group on Special and Mainstream schools in the summer term 2000.

Education Service Providers

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if he will publish the bid documents and business plans which have been submitted by those companies invited to tender for the management of local authority education services; [101504]

(2) what meetings his Department has had with the London Borough of Islington concerning improving the education service (a) by the borough council and (b) by a privatised service; [101508]

(3) what criteria he will use to monitor the performance and profits of organisations receiving privatised education services. [101470]

Ms Estelle Morris: Both the documentation leading up to the inclusion of organisations on our list of function providers for LEA intervention, and the bids submitted in specific cases, are treated as commercial in confidence. Officials have had a large number of meetings with Islington Council, involving elected members, officers, headteachers and school staff, in order to discuss urgent action by Islington officers to improve standards and the planned outsourcing of the service. Officials have also been involved in the evaluation of tenders leading to the recent announcement of a preferred service provider. I have personally met Islington members and officers, spoken to groups of headteachers and visited a number of schools. The proposed contract with the preferred service provider remains under negotiation, but it will include arrangements for regular monitoring against service standards, and link payment to the delivery of targets for pupil performance.

School Sixth Forms

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many proposals for (a) the introduction and (b) the closure of school sixth forms he has received in (i) May 1997 to April 1998, (ii) May 1998 to April 1999 and (iii) in the period since April 1999 respectively; and how many he has (1) accepted, (2) rejected and (3) deferred. [101465]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table shows the number of proposals decided in each of the periods requested since May 1997. No proposals have been deferred but there is one proposal currently under consideration.

	Number approved	Number rejected
Proposals to introduce sixth forms
May 1997-April 1998	6	21
May 1998-April 1999	4	6
May 1999 to date	2	3
Proposals to remove sixth forms

CABINET OFFICE

European Regulation

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what appraisals have been produced for extrapolating UK data to cover the rest of the EU with regard to regulatory impact assessments. [100234]

Mr. Stringer: The Government do not keep information in the form requested and could not do so without disproportionate cost.

It is Government policy that all Departments must complete a proper assessment of the risks, costs and benefits in the UK of a new proposal for legislation at either national or European levels. They must show who is affected, and why a non-regulatory option is not possible.

We are keen to see the European Commission improve its existing, similar procedure for scrutinising its own regulatory proposals—it is currently undertaking a review. In the absence of general EU guidance, we have advised Departments that they should extrapolate UK data to cover the rest of the EU when analysing European proposals. This advice is contained in our Guide to Better European Regulation, which was published in July.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Commonwealth Heads of Government Conference

19. Valerie Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the outcome of the Commonwealth Heads of Government Conference. [99963]

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary attended the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in Durban, South Africa on 12–15 November. The meeting took significant decisions on the future of the Commonwealth, the promotion of democracy and human rights, Pakistan, debt, trade and development.

South Caucasus

20. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what policy the European Union has for achieving stability in the countries of the South Caucasus. [99964]

Mr. Vaz: The EU aims to enhance stability by promoting regional co-operation in the South Caucasus and by developing the region's relationship with the EU. The main instruments of its policy are the Partnership and Co-operation Agreements (PCAs), and the TACIS regional programmes TRACECA and INOGATE. The PCAs offer the European Community and its member states a platform to address political, economic and assistance related issues in the region. The EU met the three states together at the launch of the PCAs on 22 June and again for the first meeting of the Co-operation Councils on 12 October, and intends to continue with joint meetings.

Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty

22. Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Indian Government and the Pakistani Government regarding the Comprehensive Test Ban treaty; and if he will make a statement. [99967]

Mr. Hain: We frequently discuss non-proliferation issues with India and Pakistan. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary held talks with the Indian National Security Adviser on 27 October. During my recent visit to India, I urged the Indian Government to follow up its public commitment to forge a national consensus on signing the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. Senior officials will hold non-proliferation talks in New Delhi and Islamabad in early December.

Kosovo

23. Mr. John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his US counterparts on the use of depleted uranium weapons in the war in Kosovo. [99968]

Mr. Vaz: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has had no discussions with his US counterpart on the use of depleted uranium weapons in the war in Kosovo.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in Kosovo. [99945]

Mr. Robin Cook: Six months ago Kosovo was terrorised by repression directed from Belgrade. 850,000 people had been expelled from Kosovo and it was run by the Serb army and paramilitaries. Today, KFOR has replaced the VJ. 810,000 of those refugees have been able to return to their homes, the Serb security forces have been expelled and Kosovo is run by a UN administration.

Formidable challenges remain in creating a Kosovo that is at peace with itself and with its neighbours. We wholeheartedly condemn the minority of Kosovars who have not seized the opportunity to build a Kosovo free from fear but have perpetuated the cycle of violence. But the position of the great majority of the people of Kosovo is far better now than it was under Milosevic's brutality or than it would have been if NATO had not intervened to end it.

Russia

24. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's bilateral relations with Russia. [99969]

Mr. Vaz: Relations with Russia, and her stability and development, remain important for the United Kingdom. The UK has already done much to help Russia with the difficult process of change: there is a strong UK interest in further progress. Our relationship enables us to speak frankly about areas of disagreement, including Chechnya.

Drugs Trade

25. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of British policy on combating the international trade in illicit drugs. [99970]

Mr. Battle: FCO co-ordinates the overseas drugs efforts of the relevant Government Departments including HM Customs and Excise and the Home Office. We also work to improve the effectiveness of the various international anti-drugs bodies, including at the UN and EU.

FCO activity is fully within the Government's 10 year anti-drug strategy under the UK's Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator, Keith Hellawell. Specifically, the FCO co-ordinates supply side overseas activity contributing to meeting the objective of reducing the availability of legal drugs in the UK.

We spend £6 million per year, on supporting projects worldwide within the framework of the UK drugs strategy to prevent the production and trafficking to the UK of Class A drugs, particularly heroin and cocaine.

European Commission (Accountability)

26. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what issues relating to the accountability of the European Commission are on the agenda for the next IGC; and if he will make a statement. [99972]

Mr. Vaz: The forthcoming IGC will consider the institutional changes that are needed to prepare for the next enlargement. The Government fully support this. Enlargement is not just about the applicant countries preparing to join the Union, it is also about the current member states preparing to receive them.

Trade Promotion

27. Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria and performance measures relating to the promotion of United Kingdom trade his Department uses in its annual appraisals of each of the United Kingdom's Ambassadors and High Commissioners. [99973]

Mr. Hain: All Ambassadors and High Commissioners now report to the Chief Executive of British Trade International, the unified FCO and DTI operation, on trade promotion and development work. Their performance will be assessed against annual objectives agreed with British Trade International.

Entry Clearance Visas (Islamabad)

28. Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the current waiting times for interviews for entry clearance visas for (a) spouses and (b) fiancées in Islamabad. [99975]

Mr. Vaz: As at 26 November, the waiting time in Islamabad for interview for spouses was 38 weeks and for fiancées 46 weeks.

EU Enlargement

29. Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further action he is taking to promote the enlargement of the EU. [99976]

Mr. Vaz: I refer my hon. Friend to the oral answer given by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary today to my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Mr. Ennis).

30. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the Government's approach to greater EU integration at the next IGC. [99977]

Mr. Vaz: The forthcoming IGC will consider the institutional changes that are needed to prepare for the next enlargement. The Government fully support this. Enlargement is not just about the applicant countries preparing to join the Union, it is also about the current member states preparing to receive them.

EU Legislation

31. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the European Commission concerning the volume of legislation produced by the European Union. [99978]

Mr. Vaz: The Commission agrees with us that what counts is not the amount of legislation, but whether it is necessary, efficient and proportionate. That is why the Government pushed successfully for the Subsidiarity Protocol at the Amsterdam IGC, to ensure that legislation is only directed at those areas which require it.

Argentina

32. Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made towards normalising relations between Argentina and the Falkland Islands. [99979]

Mr. Battle: The visit to Britain last autumn by President Menem of Argentina and the Visit of His Royal Highness The Prince of Wales to Argentina this March have helped to develop a new spirit of reconciliation and co-operation between our two countries. Later this week I shall accompany His Royal Highness The Duke of York to Buenos Aires for the inauguration of the new Argentine President De La Rua.

An important milestone in improving relations with Argentina was the Joint Statement that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and the Argentine Foreign Minister signed in July.

Air links between the Falklands and South America have been restored and safeguarded as a result, and now include a monthly flight to southern Argentina. Co-operation has been stepped up to conserve fish stocks in the South-West Atlantic. And the Falkland Islands Government now allow holders of Argentine passports to visit.

All these measures have the support of the Islanders' elected Councillors. Their role in this dialogue is instrumental. None of these measures affects our solid commitment to defend the Islanders' right to determine their own future. The sovereignty of the Falklands is not for negotiation.

Nigeria

33. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the safety of British oil workers following the upsurge of violence in the oil-producing areas of Nigeria. [99980]

Mr. Hain: Our consular staff in Lagos are in close contact with the Community Liaison Officers and contacts within the business and NGO community in the region. There is a warden network in place to pass on advice to the British community.

Foreign and Commonwealth Office travel advice has been advising against all holiday and non-essential travel to the Niger Delta region of Nigeria since 12 August 1999. It had been warning of violent incidents in the region for some considerable time longer.

UN Security Council

34. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is his policy that the EU should have a seat on the UN Security Council [99981]

Mr. Hain: Under the UN Charter, an EU seat is not possible as membership of the Security Council is confined to states. The Treaty on European Union already makes provision for how EU member states should act when on the Security Council:

> "Member states which are also members of the United Nations Security Council will concert and keep the other member states fully informed. Member states which are permanent members of the Security Council will, in the execution of their functions, ensure the defence of the positions and the interests of the Union, without prejudice to their responsibilities under the provisions of the United Nations Charter."

East Timor

35. Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the UN's initiatives in East Timor and Indonesia. [99982]

Mr. Battle: The United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET), which will have overall responsibility for administration and security in the territory, continues to deploy. The handover from the International Force for East Timor (INTERFET) to UNTAET's Peace-Keeping operation will take place as soon as possible taking into account conditions on the ground.

EU Qualified Majority Voting

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise the extension of qualified majority voting at the next inter-governmental conference. [99962]

Mr. Robin Cook: The Cologne European Council in June agreed that the possible extension of qualified majority voting would be on the agenda for the next IGC.

Our own position on QMV is clear. We are happy to look at extension on a case-by-case basis. Where QMV is in Britain's interests, we will support it. But where key areas of national interest are at stake, such as Treaty change, border controls, defence or taxation, we will insist on retaining unanimity.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about progress on the implementation of the agreement he signed with Argentina on 14 July regarding the Falkland Islands. [101821]

Mr. Battle: A number of the measures set out in the British-Argentine Joint Statement of 14 July have already been implemented. The Falkland Islands Government have admitted Argentine passport-holders to the Falklands since July. All deadlines have been met to restore air links between the Falklands and South America and to introduce measures to combat the common menace of poaching of fish stocks.

We continue to consolidate progress on the remaining issues. We are working with Argentina on a Memorandum of Understanding on the terms of a study to determine the cost and feasibility of removing the remaining land mines from the Falklands. Both sides continue to work towards a multilateral arrangement to regulate fishing in the high seas of the South-West Atlantic. An Argentine architect has recently visited the Falklands to discuss proposals for construction of a memorial at the Argentine cemetery there. The Argentine Government are committed to review their use of Falklands place names.

None of these developments affect our commitment to defend the Islanders' right to determine their own future. The sovereignty of the Falkland Islands is not for negotiation.

Saudi Arabia

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what guarantees have been given to the Saudi Government in relation to potential nuclear threats to that country. [101459]

Mr. Hain: None.

Belize

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what official engagements ministers fulfilled in Belize between 1990 and 1999. [101739]

Mr. Battle: I can answer only for the period since May 1997.

Since May 1997, the only FCO Minister to have visited Belize is the then Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd), who visited Belize in February 1998. His programme included official calls on the then Prime Minister, Mr. Manuel Esquivel, the then Foreign Minister, Mr. Dean Barrow, and the then Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Said Musa. My hon. Friend also called on the Department of Corrections, the Youth Enhancement Academy and Hattieville Prison.

South America

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what inquiries have been made by the British Embassy in Anuncion into the safety and security of documents relating to Operation Condor being held by authorities in Paraguay. [101620]

Mr. Battle: Documents relating to Operation Condor are among the records held by the Centre of Documentation and Archives for the Defence of Human Rights. They are stored on the premises of the Supreme Court of Paraguay. Our Ambassador has spoken to people concerned with their safekeeping, and is not aware of any current threat to the safety and security of the documents.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance his Department is giving to drug eradication projects in (a) Colombia, (b) Ecuador, (c) Bolivia and (d) Peru. [101512]

Mr. Battle: The FCO is not providing assistance to drug eradication projects in Colombia, Ecuador, Bolivia or Peru. The main focus of FCO counter-drugs assistance in these countries is on interdiction/law enforcement training. We are currently supporting two UN International Drugs Programmes (UNDCP) projects in alternative development for Bolivia and Peru through DFID.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what support and assistance his Department is providing to civic and human rights groups in (a) Colombia, (b) Ecuador, (c) Bolivia and (d) Peru. [101511]

Mr. Battle: The information is as follows:

(a) Columbia: Our Embassy in Bogota maintains close contacts with a range of civic and human rights groups in Colombia. Through the FCO's Conflict Prevention Fund and the Embassy's Small Grants Scheme, we have contributed funds to a number of groups, such as The Citizen's Mandate for Peace, Life and Liberty Project Fund, which encourages debate within civil society. We have also contributed funds towards human rights organisations monitoring the human rights situation in the department of Antioquia (amongst the most violent departments in Colombia). We also provide human rights training to the Colombian Police Force.

(b) Ecuador: We work closely with a number of independent human rights groups including the Human Rights Permanent Assembly (APDH) and the Latin American Human Rights Association (ALDHU). More than £41,000 has been disbursed from the Human Rights Project Fund this financial year to promote rights awareness in Ecuador. This includes funding for a project being administered by APDH to encourage young people to learn about their human, social, economic and cultural rights and how to promote them. In addition, the British Embassy in Quito are supporting a number of other projects aimed at helping street children, indigenous groups and disadvantaged women.

(c) Bolivia: £42,500 has been provided this financial year from the Human Rights Project Fund to support the office of the Human Rights Ombudsman. The Ombudsman, Mrs. Ana Maria Romero, paid a successful Foreign and Commonwealth Office Sponsored Visit to the UK in November 1999. The main purpose of her visit was to see how the British Government promote human rights. Our Embassy in La Paz have close contacts with a number of human rights groups in Bolivia including Red Andina, CEDOIN, the Permanent Assembly for Human Rights and AMANACER, a charity which helps street children.

(d) Peru: We maintain close and regular contact with a number of NGOs and independent human rights groups in Peru including the National Co-ordinator for Human Rights, an umbrella organisation which represents more than 50 NGOs working in the human rights field. We also maintain close contact with both the Ombudsman and the Ad Hoc Commission of Human Rights. In November 1999, the Deputy Ombudsman of Peru, Dr. Gino Costa, paid a successful FCO Sponsored Visit to the UK. He attended a human rights seminar in the House of Lords, and was keen to hear about HMG's policies on human rights, particularly in the context of Northern Ireland. We have provided £61,961 this financial year from the Human Rights Project Fund to assist the Ombudsman and Commission with its work and research. In November, the Department for International Development provided more than £20,000 for an electoral assistance project in Peru. More than £93,000 has been disbursed since April 1999 from HRPF to support projects administered by independent human rights groups.

Southern Sudan

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Southern Sudan. [99958]

Mr. Hain: We continue to be deeply concerned about the humanitarian situation in the Sudan. While our immediate priority is to provide humanitarian assistance, the long-term answer is peace.

We have long supported the Inter-Governmental Authority on development (IGAD) peace process as the negotiating body most likely to bring about a negotiated and sustainable peace settlement. Recently, as an active member of the IGAD Partners Forum (IPF), we extended our commitment, pledging political and financial support to a permanent secretariat with full-time Special Envoy. This should allow for a sustained and accelerated negotiation to take place.

After an absence of 11 months, we now have full diplomatic representation in Khartoum. We are therefore in a better position to support the cause of peace in the Sudan.

Iran

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on human rights in Iran. [99951]

Mr. Hain: There have been a number of significant improvements in Iran's human rights record since President Khatami's election in May 1997. We welcome the Iranian government's commitment to develop an Islamic civil society based on respect for the rule of law. The people of Iran now enjoy significantly greater freedom of expression, despite recent closures of a number of reformist publications, many of which have subsequently reopened under different titles, compared to two years ago. February's local council elections, the first in Iran's history, were also particularly welcome, putting local power in the hands of the people and re-affirming the Iranian people's support for the reform process. There have also been some modest improvements in the situation of women, notably with the appointment of Iran's first four women judges and its first woman Vice-President. Over 50 per cent. of the university intake in Iran is now female.

However, we and our EU partners have a number of outstanding concerns. We in conjunction with our EU partners co-sponsored the United Nations General Assembly resolution on human rights in Iran adopted on 18 November which again underlined continuing international concern about certain Iranian human rights policies. We remain particularly concerned about the discrimination practised against some religious minorities (notably the Baha'is), the continued detention on espionage charges of a number of Iranians, including 13 members of the Iranian Jewish community, the violations of the legal rights of prisoners, and the high number of executions. There is continuing discrimination against women in the courts and society generally. We and our EU partners continue to raise these issues with the Iranian authorities in an effort to improve Iran's human rights record.

TREASURY

Tobacco Smuggling

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to tackle tobacco smuggling. [101320]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government will continue to adopt a tough and rigorous approach to detecting, deterring and preventing tobacco smuggling and fraud. In his Pre-Budget Report the Chancellor announced a package of new measures to strengthen Customs' ability to tackle tobacco smuggling and fraud including x-ray scanners and compulsory marking of UK duty paid cigarettes and tobacco, and new offences and penalties for those caught handling or selling unmarked tobacco products.

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to encourage other EU member states to increase tobacco taxation in order to reduce incentives for bootlegging. [101319]

Dawn Primarolo: The European Commission is due to review tobacco taxation in the coming year and to report the outcome to ECOFIN.

The Government will continue to take every opportunity, in ECOFIN and elsewhere, to seek to influence the Commission and other member states to introduce a duty structure which would reduce the incentive for both legal cross-border shopping and smuggling.

Tax Investigations

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what appeal procedures are available to taxpayers who believe they are unfairly targeted by Inland Revenue inspectors or subjected to investigation without reasonable grounds for suspicion. [101365]

Dawn Primarolo: Any person whose tax return is the subject of an inquiry may appeal to the General Commissioners for a direction that the inquiry should cease. The Commissioners must make such a direction unless there are reasonable grounds for the inquiry to continue. This right is explained in a leaflet which is sent to all taxpayers whose returns are the subject of an inquiry.

The Inland Revenue may begin an inquiry into a person's tax return without needing to suspect that anything may be wrong. Once an inspector has made sufficient inquiries to satisfy himself that a return is correct, he should end the investigation, and internal guidance and training make this clear. The taxpayer's right of appeal is an additional safeguard.

The Inland Revenue is committed to treating everyone fairly. However, where a person believes that he is being unfairly targeted, there is a well-established formal complaints procedure. Where the complaint cannot be resolved by the local office or the regional office, it is referred to the Adjudicator, Dame Barbara Mills. Alternatively, a complaint to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration ("the Parliamentary Ombudsman") may be made through a Member of Parliament.

Free School Meals

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what component of Disability Working Allowance compensates for non-entitlement to free school meals; [101145]

(2) what is the estimated value of the amount included in (a) Working Families Tax Credit and (b) Disabled Persons Tax Credit as compensation for non-entitlement to free school meals. [101143]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answers 2 December 1999]: Disability Working Allowance was introduced in 1992 and was broadly based on Family Credit. When the Family Credit scheme was introduced in 1988, provision was made to replace the value of entitlement to free school meals by adding £2.55 a week to each child credit. The total child credit has since been uprated annually by the Rossi index.

Disabled Persons Tax Credit and Working Families Tax Credit which replaced Disability Working Allowance and Family Credit respectively were introduced on 5 October 1999.

Duty Free Allowances

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to provide information to travellers at UK ports of entry on the duty free allowances. [101628]

Dawn Primarolo: Posters explaining the allowances are displayed at ports of entry. Leaflets setting out the allowances are published by HM Customs and Excise and are freely available.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what arrangements his Department has made for information on the Working Families Tax Credit to be displayed and available to the public at (a) health centres, (b) dentists' surgeries, (c) GPs' surgeries, (d) post offices, (e) public libraries and (f) other venues. [101630]

Dawn Primarolo: In advance of the start of the advertising campaign, WFTC literature was made available free of charge to 21,000 intermediary organisations throughout the UK and Northern Ireland. As a result of this:

4,700 he[illegible] centres and GP surgeries now display WFTC factsheets.

Dentists, pharmacists and GP surgeries will also shortly be supplied with posters promoting the 'passporting' benefits of WFTC.

Main Post Offices display posters and factsheets and in September, in-house television featured WFTC information every 15 minutes. All other post offices display factsheets.

Up to 450 public libraries now display WFTC leaflets and posters.

Jobcentres featured large window posters, and had leaflets, posters and postcards available inside. WFTC information was printed on vacancy cards and appointment slips.

Public inquiry areas in Inland Revenue offices and Benefits Agency offices display WFTC leaflets and posters.

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people in North West Norfolk he estimates will benefit from the Working Families Tax Credit; and by how much he estimates each family will on average benefit. [101321]

Dawn Primarolo: Reliable estimates for the numbers in receipt of Working Families Tax Credit in North West Norfolk are not available. It is estimated that in 2000–01 for the UK as a whole, the first full year of the Working Families Tax Credit, about 1.4 million families will enjoy the more generous help provided by the new scheme. Families in receipt of the Working Families Tax Credit will receive on average £24 a week more than they would on Family Credit.

Gold and Currency Reserves

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the United Kingdom's total gold and currency reserves is now held in euros; what is the total holding of euros; what was their cost; and what is their current market value. [101684]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Table 2 of the Quarterly Report on UK Official Holdings of Foreign Currency and Gold for the period July to September 1999, published on 2 December provides a breakdown of the size and composition of the United Kingdom's reserve holdings.

EU Competition Law

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if UK tax provisions are subject to scrutiny under EU competition law. [101606]

Dawn Primarolo: No, provided they do not constitute state aids under Article 87 of the Treaty which has been in existence since 1957.

Advance Corporation Tax (Charities)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the additional tax per annum paid by bodies in the charitable sector as a result of the abolition of Advance Corporation Tax credits. [101814]

Dawn Primarolo: Charities have paid no additional tax as a result of the withdrawal of payable tax credits on dividends.

Single Currency

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he plans to encourage private sector firms to intensify their preparations for possible future British membership of the euro. [101811]

Miss Melanie Johnson: It is up to individual businesses to decide how best to make any changeover if the UK decides to join the single currency. The Government's role is to provide the planning framework. That is why we published the outline national changeover plan in February 1999.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what degree of labour market flexibility (a) within the UK and (b) between the UK and other EU countries would be sufficient to deal with the problems posed by asymmetric shocks were Britain to join the single currency. [101819]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the right hon. Member to "UK Membership of the single currency, an assessment of the five economic tests", published by the Treasury in October 1997, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what economic indicators will be used in determining whether his five economic tests for EMU membership have been satisfied. [101818]

Miss Melanie Johnson: "UK Membership of the single currency, an assessment of the five economic tests", published by the Treasury in October 1997 used a wide range of economic indicators in determining whether the economic case for joining the single currency was clear and unambiguous.

Community Sports Clubs (Taxation)

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much tax was paid by community sports clubs in the form of (a) inheritance tax, (b) VAT, (c) capital taxes and (d) income tax in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [101722]

Dawn Primarolo: There is no liability for inheritance tax or income tax for the types of organisation that run community sports clubs. Statistics on VAT, capital taxes and corporation tax paid by such clubs are not available.

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give community sports clubs comparable status to charities as regards exemption from taxes. [101723]

Dawn Primarolo: Some sports organisations already qualify as charities and so enjoy the same tax benefits as other charities. In addition, many non-charitable sports clubs are exempt from direct tax on the income they earn from their members and from VAT on their playing members' subscriptions.

The Charity Commission plans to consult next year on the extent to which sport is a charitable purpose in its own right.

Credit Unions

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to encourage the establishment and development of credit unions. [101727]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Two reports were published on 16 November which include moves to boost credit unions. The report by the Credit Unions Taskforce, under the chairmanship of Fred Goodwin, investigated ways in which banks and building societies could help credit unions, and the report by the Policy Action Team looked at ways to improve individual access to financial services.

There will be a new central services organisation for credit unions to help them to deliver a more consistent and flexible service to members. Improved regulation by the Financial Services Authority will ensure that credit union members enjoy similar protection to savers in banks and building societies. A number of deregulatory measures, including increasing the maximum repayment periods for loans, removing the maximum membership limit and allowing credit unions to charge for ancillary services will also be implemented.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Brady: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate his Department has made of the net outflow of revenue from (a) the North West and (b) the North East of England under his revised proposals for a climate change levy. [101703]

Mr. Timms: The climate change levy is designed to be revenue neutral for the private sector as a whole, with all the revenues raised being fully recycled back to business through a cut in employers' National Insurance Contributions (NICs) and additional support for energy efficiency measures. The levy package is also expected to be broadly neutral between manufacturing and services.

It is not possible to say what the exact impact of the levy on specific regions will be. That will depend on a number of factors, including, for example, the future energy consumption of firms in the region, the level of employment in those firms, the number of energy intensive sectors in the region, what use firms in the region make of electricity generated from 'new' renewable sources of energy and in 'good quality' combined heat and power plants, and the extent to which firms in the region take advantage of the proposed introduction of a system of enhanced capital allowances for energy saving investments.

Benefits (Newcastle Upon Tyne)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate how many claimants of Family Credit, (a) with and (b) without child care disregards, there were in the City of Newcastle upon Tyne, what the average estimated value was of each credit payment and child care disregard, in 1997; and how many claimants of Working Family Tax Credit, working families tax credit child care payments, Disabled Persons Tax Credit, and DPTC child care payments there are in Newcastle upon Tyne at present, with the average value of payment in each case. [101845]

Dawn Primarolo: As at August 1997 there were 4,300 Family Credit cases within the Newcastle upon Tyne Local Authority district, with an average weekly award of Family Credit of £62.84. The number of cases with allowed child care costs is too small to provide a reliable estimate at this level. Reliable estimates for the numbers in receipt of the Working Families' Tax Credit and Disabled Persons' Tax Credit in Newcastle upon Tyne are not yet available.

Stakeholder Pensions

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what lower age limit is contained in his proposals on the availability of tax incentives for stakeholder pension plans. [101378]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The joint DSS/Inland Revenue consultation paper "Stakeholder Pensions: The Tax Regime—The Government's Proposals" issued on 16 September did not contain a lower age limit for the availability of stakeholder pensions. We will announce our intentions on all aspects of the stakeholder tax regime when we have considered the responses to the consultation.

Entertainment Industry

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of the provisions of the Financial Services and Markets Bill on the ability of theatres and other arts organisations to raise finances. [101088]

Miss Melanie Johnson: A further consultation document on the regulation of Financial Promotion under the Bill was published in October. It included proposals aimed at removing unnecessary impediments to raising finance.

The deadline for responses to this consultation exercise is 28 January 2000. The Government would welcome the views of the theatre and other industries.

IT Contractors

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of IR35 on contractors working within the information technology industry. [101089]

Dawn Primarolo: Our proposals will ensure that everyone who meets the accepted definition of an employee, whether in the IT industry or elsewhere, will pay tax and National Insurance Contributions on a fair basis.

Public Service Pensions

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to increase public service pensions from April 2000. [102026]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Legislation governing public service pensions requires public service pensions to be increased annually by the same percentage as State earnings related pensions (additional pensions). My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security announced on 9 November 1999, Official Report, column 907W, that benefits such as additional pensions will be increased by 1.1 per cent., in line with the annual increase in the Retail Prices Index up to September 1999. Public service pensions will therefore be increased by 1.1 per cent. from 10 April 2000, except those which have been in payment for less than a year, which will receive a pro-rata increase.

Stock Exchange

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes in the arrangements for dissemination of price-sensitive information by officially-listed companies are planned following the proposed transfer of the UK Listing Authority from the London Stock Exchange to the Financial Services Authority. [102027]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Listed companies are currently required under the Listing Rules to submit announcements to the Exchange's Company Announcements Office for distribution to the public through the Regulatory News Service. Although the Listing Rules do allow for simultaneous notification of announcements to other news organisations, we consider it would be inappropriate to retain this requirement other than for a transitional period when, subject to Parliament approving the necessary legislation, the FSA becomes the Competent Authority for listing. I have therefore asked the FSA to undertake a review of the arrangements for the dissemination of price sensitive information by listed companies and to come forward with amendments to the current Listing Rules requirements in this area. The FSA will be launching a consultation exercise with interested parties to devise alternative arrangements.

Tobacco Duty

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will introduce pack marks on tobacco products to indicate that UK duty has been paid. [102028]

Mr. Timms: The Chancellor of the Exchequer announced a pack marking scheme for tobacco products in his Pre-Budget Statement. The scheme will become effective from 1 April 2001.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pigmeat

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure that consumers can determine the country of origin of pigmeat products at the point of sale through correct labelling. [99048]

Ms Quin: We are considering all interested parties on guidance aimed at ensuring that country of origin markings on food labels do not mislead consumers about the true origin of the ingredients that have been used. We also intend to promote changes to European and international rules and advice to ensure that consumers are given accurate information about the true origin of the foods they are buying.

Poultry

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many poultry birds were being reared in intensive breeding units in England and Wales on 1 November. [99526]

Ms Quin: The total number of poultry birds reared for meat production in England and Wales, as reported in the Agricultural Census published 1 November, is shown as follows. There is currently no provision to distinguish between the production methods used.

As at 1 June 1999	England
Broilers	77,545,000
Turkeys	9,100,000
All other poultry	4,944,000

Figures for 1999 for Wales are not yet available. A provisional total for broilers is 6,650,000. The figures for 1998 are as follows:

As at 1 June 1998	Wales
Broilers	7,087,300
Turkeys	622,000
All other poultry	1,834,600

Meat Labelling

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will ensure that pork imports from countries where standards of animal welfare are lower than in the UK carry information to this effect. [99756]

Ms Quin: We are consulting all interested parties on guidance aimed at ensuring that country of origin markings on food labels do not mislead consumers about the true origin of the ingredients that have been used. We also intend to promote changes to European and international labelling rules and advice to ensure that consumers are given accurate information about the true origin of the foods they are buying. This will provide the necessary choice for consumers. In the meantime we will continue to encourage retailers, caterers and public procurement authorities to source their supplies of pork and pork products to British standards.

Badgers (TB)

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to recommence badger culling in those TB study areas where activity has been suspended. [100273]

Ms Quin: We announce the general locations of the culling trial areas and have released such information for the five triplets presently enrolled in the trial. But for reasons of staff safety and landowner privacy operational details, including the precise location and timing of operations, are not publicised.

Farmers Markets

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent advice he has issued to local authorities with regard to the regulation of farmers markets. [100276]

Ms Quin: None, but MAFF officials have held discussions with the National Association of British Market Authorities, who represent local authorities with established markets.

Tallow

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total income received to date from the sale of tallow from rendered carcase material under the over-thirty-month scheme; and what estimate he has made of the income in each year for the expected duration of the scheme. [100826]

Ms Quin: It is not possible to predict with any certainty income from the sale of the 200,000 tonnes of Over-Thirty-Month Scheme (OTMS) tallow held in store, as there are costs associated with its removal from store and transport to the point of destruction. Similar costs do not arise in respect of OTMS renderers burning tallow they produce to fuel their processes, thus replacing oil or gas. To date some 83,000 tonnes of OTMS tallow have been sold to renderers generating an income of around £2.7 million. Contracts exist for the sale to renderers of new production OTMS tallow and this is expected to generate an annual income of over £1 million until the end of the scheme.

Fisheries

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on (a) the timescale in section 32 of the Cologne Council Conclusions for integrating environmental issues and sustainable development into fisheries matters and (b) current discussions on the discard system. [100997]

Mr. Morley: The information is as follows:

(a) Section 32 of the Cologne European Council Conclusions calls upon the European Commission to report back during 2000 on progress in the integration of environmental issues and sustainable development into fisheries policy. The Government fully supports such integration and will be encouraging the European Commission to meet this commitment.

(b) Discarding remains a significant concern of the Government. A range of research is placed on the extent of discarding. In addition, we are part funding the collaborative international study by Nautilus Consultants, as referred to in the reply given to the hon. Member on 29 October 1999, Official Report, column 1045W. The new EU technical conservation measures that will become operative from 1 January 2000, are designed to reduce discards. We shall be monitoring their impact.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the countries of the European Union which are allowed to fish in British fishing waters. [101043]

Mr. Morley: Vessels from France, the Republic of Ireland, Germany, Netherlands and Belgium have limited rights to fish within UK six to twelve mile territorial waters. The details of the areas and species for which access is granted are set out in Annexe I of EU Council Regulation 3760/92.

Beef on the Bone

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to lift the ban on beef on the bone. [101072]

Ms Quin [holding answer 2 December 1999]: I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Minister's oral statement to the House on 30 November 1999, Official Report, column 151. Subject to the outcome of the statutory consultation now underway, and Parliamentary approval of the necessary legislative changes, it is the Government's intention to lift the retail ban on beef-on-the bone with effect from Friday 17 December. A copy of the consultation package is available in the Library of the House.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on the sale of Forestry Commission forest land. [101370]

Mr. Morley: We have stopped large scale sales of forest land by the Forestry Commission. Our policy is that the Commission may only sell agricultural land, land associated with houses and other buildings, unplantable land and relatively small and isolated blocks of forest land which do not make a significant contribution to its objectives and which are surplus to its requirements. The Commission may also sell areas for development where this is in the public interest. Areas of forest land which are important for public access will not be sold unless an access agreement is in place.

French Turkeys

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what checks are made on the ingredients in the feed given to turkeys in the principal French production units supplying the British market. [101076]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 2 December 1999]: Checks on feed ingredients to ensure compliance with extensive EC controls are a matter for the French authorities.

Potatoes

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking to ensure the combating of woody nightshade in areas susceptible to brown rot of potatoes where the watercourses are within internal drainage board areas. [101294]

Ms Quin [holding answer 6 December 1999]: An exercise is under way to eradicate the bacterium which causes potato brown rot (Ralstonia solanacearum) from watercourses in East Anglia where it is known to occur, by eliminating woody nightshade plants which act as a host for the bacterium. This work is being carried out in conjunction with the Environment Agency, the British Potato Council and, in the Middle Level drainage area, the Middle Level Commissioners. Information on the project has been sent to all growers with water abstraction licences in the areas concerned.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will ensure that all imported bacon is labelled so as to indicate if it was raised in accord with UK levels of animal welfare. [100101]

Ms Quin [holding answer 29 November 1999]: We are consulting all interested parties on guidance aimed at ensuring that country of origin markings on food labels including those on bacon, do not mislead consumers about the true origin of the ingredients used. We also intend to promote changes to European and international labelling rules and advice to ensure that consumers are given accurate information about the true origin of the foods they are buying. In the meantime, we will continue to encourage retailers, caterers and public procurement authorities to source their supplies of pork and pork products to British standards.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will strengthen the prohibition on the routine tail-docking of piglets in the proposed new Regulations on the Welfare of Farmed Animals to ensure that tail-docking is carried out only after consideration of other methods which might prevent tail-biting, and only on the advice of a veterinary surgeon; and if he will make a statement. [101635]

Mr. Morley: This is one suggestion that has been made in response to the consultation on the new Welfare of Farmed Animals Regulations. It is under consideration along with the many other comments received.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he plans to take to press the European Commission to submit to the Council the report and proposals on intensive pig farming required by Article 6 of Council Directive 91/630; and if he will make a statement. [101636]

Mr. Morley: We lose no opportunity to remind the Commission of their obligation to bring forward various overdue proposals on animal welfare, including that required by Article 6 of Council Directive 91/630.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he has asked the Farm Animal Welfare Council to review the question of leg problems in broilers; and if he will make a statement; [101632]

(2) if he will commission an independent study to assess the incidence of leg weakness in the UK broiler chicken flock; and if he will make a statement. [101633]

Mr. Morley: The Farm Animal Welfare Council continues to monitor leg health in broiler chickens and is evaluating data on leg health provided by the industry. We shall consider the position when further advice from FAWC is received.

Agenda 2000

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the implementation of "Agenda 2000: A New Direction for Agriculture". [102025]

Mr. Nick Brown: I announced today a package of measures which will radically redirect support for agriculture in fulfilment of pledges made in our manifesto and subsequently. My announcement focused on one particular aspect—the Rural Development Regulation.

Our decision in implementing options under all of the sectors of the Agenda 2000 reforms of the Common Agricultural Policy will have an important impact upon the future direction of the agricultural industry.

Beef Regime

Under the beef regime, we have decided to use the National Envelope to top up payments to suckler cow producers in the year 2000; the position for future years will be reviewed, in particular to consider the possibility of introducing area-based payments on permanent pasture used for low-density beef production in England.

We will retain the 90-head limit on beef special premium claims and introduce a UK-wide national ceiling against which the need for scale-back will be assessed; both these decisions will be reviewed in the course of the year 2000.

We have also decided to implement the cut in Suckler Cow Premium quota by reducing producers' holdings of quota on a flat-rate basis (probably at around 4 per cent.); producers who have reduced production below their quota level as a result of participation in an EU-funded extensification scheme or who can show that the imposition of the cut would materially jeopardise the success of a development plan in progress on 1 January 2000 may apply for exemption from this quote-cut.

We will increase from the year 2000 onwards the milk quota limit for dairy producers claiming Suckler Cow Premium, from 120,000 kilograms to 180,000 kilograms.

We will apply a less restrictive two-tier model for extensification payments additional to payments under the Beef Special Premium and Suckler Cow Premium Schemes; and assess eligibility for extensification payments on cattle numbers on producers' holdings on six dates each year, notified to producers retrospectively; this method of assessment will be reviewed as and when our cattle database becomes fully operational, when it includes movement details for older animals.

Dairy regime

In relation to the dairy regime, we will be extending the quota leasing deadline from 31 December to 31 March with effect from the next quota year. At the same time, the deadline for processing permanent transfers of quota via a lease of land—though not for other transfers—is being advanced to 1 March in order to ensure that the Intervention Board meets its deadline on the levy calculation. There was no widespread support for the other discretionary provisions set out in the consultation papers and these changes will not be implemented.

Cross-compliance

CAP reforms agreed in Berlin also gave powers for member states to attach specific environmental conditions to agricultural support payments, if they consider this to be appropriate. Our consultation exercise sought views on whether to introduce such conditions. Some relevant considerations in deciding whether to do so are: comprehensibility to farmers; ease of enforcement; environmental benefit; and extent of additional costs or regulatory burden for the generality of farmers.

We are still considering the responses to the England consultation on this issue. However, if following this consideration we identified possible cross-compliance measures, we would hold a further consultation exercise on any specific proposals before introducing them. Meanwhile, we will be retaining our existing cross-compliance measures which the UK has applied for some years, namely the current overgrazing condition in our livestock subsidy regimes and the management conditions for set-aside land.

SOCIAL SECURITY

War Pensions Agency

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about the outcome of the recent quinquennial Prior Options Review of the War Pensions Agency. [102323]

Mr. Bayley: A Prior Options Review of the administration of the war pensions scheme was recently undertaken to examine whether further improvements in customer service and value for money could be made.

Part of that review involved an evaluation of the performance of the War Pensions Agency since its creation in April 1994. The Evaluation Report has been published today and copies have been placed in the Library. The Report recognises that, after a difficult start because of very high workloads, the management focus provided by agency status helped bring about steadily improving standards of performance over the last five years.

We have now considered the Review Team's recommendations. These take account of a number of detailed submissions from national and local user representative organisations. I am grateful to all those who participated in the review.

The review has recognised that over the past five years the War Pensions Agency has dedicated itself to serving a very special group of people, those who have suffered injury or bereavement in defence of their country. The main conclusions of the review, which I support, are that the War Pensions Agency should remain a Next Steps Agency within the Civil Service responsible, as now, for administering the existing war pensions scheme.

The review recognises the significant improvements in customer service and efficiency which the Agency has achieved since its inception in 1994. These reflect great efforts by the Chief Executive and his staff. The review's recommendations are designed to build on this work and will be supported by the Agency's programme of change which is aimed at improving its decision-making and appeals processes. This will be done through extended use of information technology and closer working with other government departments and voluntary sector bodies.

We will shortly publish a reviewed Framework Document confirming the Agency's responsibilities for the next five years.

Carers (Financial Support)

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to raise the level of earnings disregard for the calculation of invalid care allowance. [101352]

Mr. Bayley [holding answer 6 December 1999]: The National Carers strategy committed the Government to keeping financial support for carers under review, which we are doing.

Income Support

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what levels of take-up of Income Support for pensioners are assumed in current forecasts of expenditure. [99942]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 2 December 1999]: Estimates of take-up levels are difficult to forecast. Our current estimates are derived from the Family Resource Survey and show that for 1997–98 between 71 per cent. and 85 per cent. of pensioners by expenditure claimed the Income Support to which they are entitled. Current caseload forecasts assume that an additional 43,000 pensioners will take up their entitlement during the forecasting period. This estimate will need to be reviewed in the light of our plans for a national programme to increase pensioner take-up.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

EU Charter of Human Rights

Mr. Borrow: To ask the President of the Council who will be Parliament's representative on the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights drafting body. [102231]

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) and Lord Bowness will be the Westminster delegates on the Charter drafting body. The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) and Baroness Howells of St. Davids will be the alternates.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Gamma Hydroxy Butyrate

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ban gamma hydroxy butyrate; and if he will make a statement. [101518]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Gamma hydroxy butyrate (GHB) is not controlled under the international drug Conventions nor under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 but its importation, manufacture, sale and supply fall within the scope of the medicines legislation. The Medicines Control Agency (MCA) investigates reports of the unlawful manufacture, advertising and sale of GHB in the United Kingdom.

The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs (ACMD), which advises the Government on drug misuse issues, has considered the misuse of GHB on three occasions—in 1994, 1996 and in May 1998. It found that GHB could cause acute health problems particularly if taken with alcohol or other drugs. The Council concluded that GHB misuse was not widespread and did not present a sufficient social problem—the criterion for controlling substances under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971—to be brought under the 1971 Act's control.

However, as the drug could lead to acute health problems for some misusers—particularly if taken with alcohol—the Council recommended that a number of other measures should be taken. These were that the MCA should be asked to increase enforcement action against illicit manufacturers and suppliers of GHB; publishers should be asked not to carry advertisements for the drug and attempts should be made to reduce such advertising by the MCA and the Advertising Standards Authority; more targeted health education material should be made available about the adverse effects of GHB; and GHB misuse should continue to be monitored. The MCA and the Department of Health have taken action on the above recommendations; and the Home Office is continuing to monitor the position.

We understand that the World Health Organisation (WHO) is currently reviewing GHB; and the European Monitoring Centre for Drugs and Drug Addiction (EMCDDA) is considering its misuse within the European Union. If the WHO or the EMCDDA recommend controls on the drug, ACMD would be asked to look at GHB again.

Child Pornography Prosecutions

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many successful prosecutions there were for the possession of child pornography in the last three years for which figures are available. [101653]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Available information, taken from the Home Office Court Proceedings Database, is given in the table.

Number of defendants proceeded against at magistrates courts and percentage found guilty at all courts for child pornography offences, England and Wales, 1996–98:

Take, make, distribute, show, possess with intent to distribute or show, or publish any advertisement conveying the distribution of indecent photographs or pseudo-photographs of children [1]

Year	Total proceeded against [2]	Total found guilty
		Number	Percentage
1996	80	69	86

Police (Discipline Hearings)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at whose discretion it is for an officer facing a discipline hearing to be represented by both a Police Federation lawyer or representative and by a person from the Black Police Association. [101599]

Mr. Charles Clarke: An officer may be represented by another officer chosen by him, or he may opt to be legally represented in cases where it is judged that the punishments of reduction in rank, requirement to resign or dismissal should be available. The Police (Discipline) Regulations 1985, which cover incidents occurring before 1 April 1999, provide that in such cases the legal representative may be assisted at the hearing by a member of a police force. The Police (Conduct) Regulations 1999, for incidents after 1 April 1999, provide that in addition to having his case conducted by a legal representative the officer may be accompanied at the hearing by a member of the police force.

Anti-social Behaviour Orders

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been applied for and granted within the Easington District Council area. [101423]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I am informed that Easington District Council has made no applications for anti-social behaviour orders to date, but I am pleased to hear that they have recently established a committee to consider their use.

Gaming

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last reviewed the working of legislation on gaming; what plans he has for further reviews; and if he will make a statement. [101427]

Mr. Straw: Much of the law on gambling is more than 30 years old. Social attitudes have changed markedly in these three decades and the law is fast being overtaken by technological developments.

The Gaming Board for Great Britain and the Deregulation Committees of the House of Commons and the House of Lords have recommended reform.

There is therefore a good case for a wide-ranging review to design a new structure of regulation for the gambling industry and to test public perception.

This will not be a simple task. The main controls are laid down in three major Acts of Parliament—the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, the Gaming Act 1968 and the Lotteries and Amusement Act 1976, together with associated secondary legislation. Reform will raise important issues. The social and economic impact of any change will have to be carefully assessed.

I intend to set up an independent review body next year, bringing together a wide range of relevant expertise. It will be asked to report to me within 12 months on proposals for reform.

The Government will not be asking the review body to consider changes to the National Lottery, although the review will clearly need to address the impact on the Lottery of changes proposed for the regulation of gambling generally.

We will announce the full terms of reference shortly.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prison Service

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Quinquennial Review of the Northern Ireland Prison Service will be launched; and if he will make a statement. [102155]

Mr. Ingram: The Northern Ireland Prison Service will have completed five years of operation as an executive agency on 31 March 2000 and, therefore, is subject, like other agencies, to a Quinquennial Review. I am announcing the review today and intend that it should be brought to completion by July 2000.

The review will be directed by a Steering Group under the Chairmanship of the Prison Service Fraser Figure and inclusive of an independent element.

The Steering Group will be supported by a Project Team led by a member of the Senior Civil Service from outside the Northern Ireland Prison Service. The leader of the Project Team will report to the Steering Group on a regular basis.

The review process will provide extensive opportunities for consultation with internal and external stakeholders and will follow the procedures recommended in the Guidance on the review of Agencies and Non-Departmental Public Bodies published by the Cabinet Office.

Robert Hamill

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in the inquiry by the Independent Commission for Police Complaints into the circumstances of the death of Robert Hamill; when he expects the Commission to complete its investigation; and if he will make a statement. [101855]

Mr. Ingram: The Independent Commission for Police Complaints (ICPC) have advised that on 16 January 1998 they issued a Statement expressing their view that the criminal investigation into a complaint, that police had witnessed the attack on the late Robert Hamill but had failed to intervene as promptly as possible, had been conducted to its satisfaction. This investigation was conducted under the close supervision of the ICPC by a senior CID officer of the RUC who had no connection with the Portadown district. The Northern Ireland Director of Public Prosecutions subsequently directed no criminal prosecution against any police officer involved. The ICPC is currently supervising the police investigation into the disciplinary issues relating to the complaint made and this process is at an advanced stage.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Museums and Galleries

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he will take to increase the ability of museums and galleries to make acquisitions. [101851]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 7 December 1999]: There are already several methods by which the Government enable museums and galleries to make acquisitions. Acceptance in Lieu and Private Treaty Sale schemes continue to provide owners with an incentive to offer outstanding works of art to the nation in lieu of inheritance tax. Through the Museums and Galleries Commission, the Department provides funds for the PRISM Fund (71 grants worth £292,567 in 1998–99) and the V&A Purchase Grant Fund (227 grants worth £1 million) thus assisting regional museums to acquire objects for their collections. In addition, the Heritage Lottery Fund has doubled its acquisition budget from £5 million to £10 million. It has recently supported the acquisition of Botticelli's The Virgin adoring the Christ child (£7.69 million) and has helped regional museums and galleries to acquire objects which will significantly enhance their collections, provide educational benefits, and encourage local support and interest. Under this Government, grant-in-aid to the national museums and galleries has been increased: it is for Trustees to decide their spending priorities.

School Sports

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what measures he has taken to promote participation in cricket in schools within the last year. [101350]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 6 December 1999]: We have been working in partnership with the England and Wales Cricket Board's Development Department and Sport England to promote participation in cricket at schools and clubs for all young people. Cricket is supported by Sport England's Active Schools initiatives, which include the Youth Sports Trust, TOP sports, the Activemark and Sportsmark award schemes, and Coaching for Teachers. In addition, Sport England provides support to governing bodies' junior development initiatives, including Kwik Cricket in primary schools. Kwik Cricket has helped boost the number of primary school pupils playing the game and, working with initiatives for older school children, has helped the number of young people playing cricket in schools and clubs, according to ECB figures, grow to 2.4 million last year. To continue to take this forward, the ECB are in consultation to help design a game specifically for secondary schools, "Intercricket", which will be launched next year. I have attended a number of cricket matches aimed at widening the support for cricket in schools.

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to increase involvement in (a) rugby, (b) football, (c) cricket and (d) hockey in schools. [101429]

Kate Hoey: Sport in schools provides the foundation for our sporting future, and contributes to the education and health of young people. All four of these sports are already supported by Sport England's Active Schools initiatives, which includes the Youth Sports Trust TOP sports, the Activemark and Sportsmark award schemes, and Coaching for Teachers. The first School Sports Co-ordinators will be appointed in September 2000, and will provide a real boost for coaching and competition in a wide range of sports, including team games. In addition, Sport England provides support to governing bodies' junior development initiatives, including Rugby Football Union Development Officers and Kwik Cricket in primary schools.

WTO (Seattle)

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport which Ministers and officials from his Department were represented at the World Trade Organisation meeting in Seattle. [101679]

Mr. Alan Howarth: None. However, in preparing the European Union's negotiating position for the WTO Ministerial Conference, my Department was fully involved, at both Government and Community level, to ensure that the UK's audiovisual interests were taken into account.

Carn Brea Leisure Centre

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement regarding the proposed closure of Carn Brea Leisure Centre in Cornwall. [100230]

Kate Hoey: I want to ensure that all communities have access to quality sports facilities and the opportunities to participate in sporting activities. The Government place great importance on community sports facilities such as Carn Brea, and I am therefore very concerned about its proposed closure.

The Government also place great importance on the teaching of young people to swim, and swimming remains a statutory element of the primary National Curriculum. It is vital, therefore, that the local council do everything it can to keep the facilities at Carn Brea open to the many thousands that benefit from their use.

The Chairman of Sport England and I have both written to the Chairman of Kerrier District Council making clear our concerns and urging the Council to maintain Carn Brea.

Departmental Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many research contracts have been let by his Department since May 1997; what is the value of each contract; and in each case whether the contract included (a) a departmental veto over publication of the research results, (b) departmental control over the date of publication of the research results and (c) a requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments. [100147]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 6 December 1999]: There have been 20 Contracts let between 1 May 1997 and 30 November 1999 which contain an element of research. Details are given in the table.

Research contracts	Value [1] (£)	(a)	(b)	(c)

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Roger Sylvester

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Solicitor-General when the Crown Prosecution Service will make a decision on prosecutions in respect of the death of Mr. Roger Sylvester; and if he will make a statement. [101407]

The Solicitor-General: The investigation report of the Essex Police is being carefully considered by the Crown Prosecution Service in accordance with the tests set out in the Code for Crown Prosecutors. The CPS has met with the investigating officers from Essex Police and with the Police Complaints Authority to discuss the case. The CPS has requested the police to undertake additional inquiries and a further meeting with the police is arranged for later this month. The advice of Treasury Counsel will be sought. In the meantime, the CPS has kept in touch with the family's solicitors. A decision on whether or not any criminal charges should be brought will be taken as soon as possible after the evidence has been fully reviewed.

Lenient Sentences

Mr. Cox: To ask the Solicitor-General how many sentences have been referred to the Court of Appeal as unduly lenient and which have resulted in an increase in the sentences. [101604]

The Solicitor-General: In 1998, the Law Officers referred the sentences imposed on 95 offenders to the Court of Appeal for their sentences to be reviewed under the provisions of section 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. Of the References that have been heard, sentences have been increased in respect of 68 offenders. Ten References were withdraw. Three References are yet to be heard.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Echelon System

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to answer parliamentary questions on the Echelon system; and if he will make a statement. [100839]

Mr. Robin Cook: As my hon. Friend is aware, it is long-standing practice not to respond to speculation on alleged intelligence operations.

Joint Environmental Markets Unit

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to implement his Department's pledge to support the DETR/DTI Joint Environmental Markets Unit on behalf of UK exporters. [101645]

Mr. Hain: The Foreign Office is providing direct support to the work of the Joint Environmental Markets (JEMU) through the training on global environment issues now offered to all staff across the Foreign Office. Support is also available through the FCO environmental programmes to enable posts to work with local governments and NGOs in promoting good environmental practice.

Exporters from all sectors also benefit from the establishment of the joint FCO/DTI British Trade International. They include those promoting UK environmental products and services as part of their company portfolio. British Trade International maintains a close liaison with sector specific bodies such as JEMU. Ministerial support for the sector was most recently evident in the JEMU trade mission to the Czech Republic from 18–19 October, led by the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle), and supported by British Trade International.

"The World is not Enough"

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what location fee was paid to (a) the British Embassy in Istanbul and (b) MI6 by the producers of the film, "The World is not Enough". [101648]

Mr. Robin Cook: No filming of "The World is not Enough" took place on either the premises of the British Consulate-General in Istanbul or the headquarters of the Secret Intelligence Service. The question of a location fee did not therefore arise.

Nuclear Reactors (Decommissioning)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the decommissioning of Soviet-designed nuclear reactors in the countries of eastern Europe as part of the negotiations relating to those countries' applications for membership of the European Union. [101890]

Mr. Hain: We strongly support G7 and EU efforts to improve nuclear safety in Central and Eastern Europe. The EU accession process provides an important opportunity to achieve early closure of reactors which cannot be upgraded to international safety standards. At the (EU) Vienna European Council in December 1998 the EU agreed to use the accession process as a lever to encourage nuclear safety and, in particular, the early closure of the oldest Soviet design reactors which safety experts assess cannot be upgraded to international standards. We fully support the Commission's efforts to persuade the applicant countries concerned—Bulgaria, Lithuania and Slovakia—to put in place credible closure plans for the relevant reactors.

We welcome the recent announcements by the Bulgarian, Lithuanian, and Slovak authorities and the commitments they contain on closure timetables for the non-upgradable reactors at respectively, the Kozloduy, Ignalina and Bohunice nuclear power plants.

We strongly support invitations for these three countries (as well as Latvia, Malta, and Romania) to open accession negotiations. We expect the Helsinki European Council on 10–11 December to decide to extend invitations to all six. Once negotiations begin, progress on nuclear safety objectives will continue to be part of the accession process as it is now.

Kosovo

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many of the (a) Kosovo Albanians and (b) Serbs reported murdered between KFOR's deployment on 12 June and mid-October are believed to be murdered by (i) Kosovo Albanians, (ii) Kosovo Serbs and (iii) others. [101415]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 7 December 1999]: There are no statistics available giving the ethnic background of the persons responsible for the reported murders of Kosovo Albanians and Serbs since KFOR's deployment on 12 June.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action KFOR is taking in Kosovo to prevent ethnic cleansing of Serbs and the destruction of their monasteries. [99857]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 7 December 1999]: Protection of the Kosovo Serbs and other minorities is a top priority for KFOR and UNMIK. KFOR devotes around half of its resources at present to maintaining a presence in minority areas. In the UK-led sector, there are KFOR soldiers present in every Serb town or village, as well as soldiers deployed to protect individual homes and farms. KFOR conducts patrols and escorts individuals to school and to work.

Protection of patrimonial sites (monasteries, cathedrals and Orthodox churches) is also a priority. In the British sector alone almost 300 troops are on permanent guard of 35 churches and other patrimonial sites.

Afghanistan

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the imposition of UN sanctions in relation to Afghanistan. [102230]

Mr. Hain: On 15 October, the United Nations Security Council adopted resolution 1267 which demanded that the Taliban turn over Usama Bin Laden, indicted in the US for the 1998 bombings of the US Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, to appropriate authorities in order for him to be brought to justice and decided that, unless that demand was met by 14 November, UN member states would impose a flight ban and freeze on funds in relation to the Taliban.

The demand has not been met. The measures came into force on 14 November. A UN Sanctions Committee will be established to designate the aircraft and funds or other financial resources to which the measures will apply. Humanitarian exemptions are provided for, in respect of both measures. The Sanctions Committee is tasked to decide on the granting of a further exemption in respect of the payment by the International Air Transport Association (IATA) to the aeronautical authority of Afghanistan on behalf of international airlines for air traffic control services.

Orders in Council under the United Nations Act 1946 came into force on 26 November to implement the measures in the UK, Crown Dependencies and Overseas Territories.

EU member states have agreed to implement the Security Council resolution collectively. On 15 November, the Council of the European Union adopted a Common Position (1999/727/CFSP) concerning restrictive measures against the Taliban.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

GM Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will put measures in place to ensure that honey produced around the farm-scale trials for genetically modified crops will not contain genetically modified pollen. [99535]

Mr. Mullin: The crops in the farm-scale evaluations are being grown in the open and will be visited by bees from nearby hives. Traces of GM pollen may therefore occur in honey from such hives, although in any event honey only contains very small amounts of pollen. The Government, as advised by ACRE and the ACNFP, do not consider the presence in honey of pollen from GM crops to pose a risk to health. Therefore no special measures are being put in place to prevent bees from visiting crops.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the compensatory payments to which GM consent holders and national list maintainers may be entitled upon revocation of their consents and licences after the farm-scale evaluations. [100001]

Mr. Mullin: No estimate has been made of whether compensatory payments would be payable to GM consent holders on revocation of a consent. There are no genetically modified plant varieties on the UK National List at present, therefore the question is not relevant to national list maintainers.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the advice he has received from the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment in response to applications for marketing consent under EU Directive 90/220 for (a) Plant Genetics Systems oil seed rape C/BE/96/01, (b) LF Trifolium A/S, Monsanto Europe, SA Danisco Seed fodder beet C/DK/97/01 and (c) Hoechst Schering, AgrEvo GmbH oilseed rape C/DE/96/5; and when the final decision will be made by the EU. [100000]

Mr. Mullin: The advice of the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) for these applications, and on all applications to release GMOs, is contained in the statutory public register held in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

A decision on whether or not to approve these products is scheduled to be taken at the next meeting of the Regulatory Committee for Directive 90/220/EEC to be held on 9 March 2000.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effect the horizontal spread of antibiotic resistant marker genes from GM crops will have on the treatment of life-threatening infectious diseases. [100165]

Mr. Mullin: Although there is little evidence that antibiotic resistant marker genes can escape from crop plants under field conditions; the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE), and the Advisory Committee for Novel Foods and Processes (ACNFP), always consider the likely consequences of the horizontal spread of antibiotic resistant marker genes from genetically modified (GM) crops, were it to be possible. If horizontal gene transfer from a particular GM plant is judged to be harmful to human health or the environment, then the release would not be allowed.

The Committees consider that the use of antibiotic resistance markers should be discouraged and that their use will become unnecessary as genetic modification techniques are developed further. Their use should therefore be phased out.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the specific restrictions placed on the cultivation of GM crops. [99916]

Mr. Mullin: No GM crops may be released in England without specific approval from the Secretary of State for the Environment, acting jointly with the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, or from the devolved Administrations for releases in Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland.

Each consent lists the specific limitations and conditions applying to the release. This information is available on the statutory public register held in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will explain the difference between GM farm-scale evaluations and other GM field-scale plantings. [99904]

Mr. Mullin: The farm-scale evaluations of GM crops are part of a programme designed primarily to assess the effect of the management of particular GM herbicide tolerant crops, together with the relevant herbicide, on the abundance and diversity of farmland wildlife compared with conventionally managed equivalent non-GM crops.

The evaluations are funded by Government, with the industry group SCIMAC providing and managing the crops. Proposals by SCIMAC for any other large areas or field-scale plantings of these GM crops, would be outside the farm-scale evaluation programme and will be decided by the Scientific Steering Committee, taking into account the relevance of the proposals to biodiversity. This arrangement is part of the agreement between the Government and SCIMAC, announced in November 1999.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the locations in the UK where Class C Consent for GM crop planting has been given. [100226]

Mr. Mullin: A Part C consent for cultivation of a GM crop, issued under EU Directive 90/220, permits growing anywhere within the geographical region specified in the consent. The regulatory authorities do not have to be notified of the locations where the crop is grown.

At present three types of GM maize have Part C consents which include the UK within their scope for cultivation. However, under the recently announced voluntary agreement with SCIMAC, these crops will only be grown in accordance with the terms of that agreement.

Suicides (London Underground)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many suicides have taken place on the London Underground in each of the last 10 years. [100624]

Mr. Hill: Safety of passengers and staff on its network is the responsibility of London Underground Ltd. (LUL), which has explained that it is not possible to distinguish between fatalities on London Underground due to accidents and those where a person may have taken their own life. LUL has, however, provided in the table information on the number of fatalities arising from a person striking a train on the London Underground.

Year	Number of fatalities
1991	40
1992	31
1993	45
1994	39
1995	18
1996	32
1997	28
1998	25
1999 (to date)	22

Notes:
Statistics are not available for 1989, 1990, and for period between 1 January 1995 and 6 April 1995

A406 (Tree Compensation)

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the London Borough of Enfield will receive compensation for the loss of a cedar tree in Pymmes Park as part of the compulsory purchase relating to the A406; what steps he will take to ensure that the Highways Agency pays compensation; and if he will make a statement. [100821]

Mr. Hill: Compensation negotiations between the District Valuer, acting for the Highway's Agency and the London Borough of Enfield are continuing. The Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Peter Nutt, will write to my hon. Friend with further details.

Letter from Richard Thorndike to Mr. Andrew Love, dated 8 December 1999:

The Parliamentary Under Secretary of State, Keith Hill, has asked me to write in response to your recent written Parliament Question about compensation being claimed by the London Borough of Enfield for the loss of a mature cedar tree in Pymmes Park, as a result of works to improve the A406 North Circular Road. I am replying in the absence of Peter Nutt, the Chief Executive.

Although the tree was located very close to the highway construction area, it was intended to carry out the road works without disturbing it. Once construction started, however, because of the tree's extensive root system, it was found that it would be seriously affected. Ways of saving the tree including moving it, at an estimated cost of £100,000 were considered but none were found to be practicable. The Agency concluded that the only option was for it to be cut down. Meetings between the Agency, the District Valuer and the Council to discuss the provision of replacement trees, wider landscape proposals for Pymmes Park and compensation matters have taken place and are set to continue. The final settlement of any compensation due will depend on the outcome of these negotiations. In the event that agreement on compensation cannot be reached the Lands Tribunal is available to make an independent determination.

As part of the overall arrangements to offset disturbance, the Agency has provided exchange land at the former Willoughby Gas Works, as replacement for public open space land taken from Pymmes Park for the A406 works.

Leasehold Properties (Greater London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the number of properties in the Greater London area that are leasehold. [101042]

Mr. Mullin: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) on 10 November 1999, Official Report, column 610W. The estimates provided were for households rather than properties, since estimates on the latter basis are not available. It is probable that the figure for properties in London would be only slightly smaller than for households.

Departmental Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the titles of (a) research studies, (b) audits and (c) surveys (i) in progress and (ii) commissioned for completion in the next 12 months, stating in each case when the results are due to be published. [100888]

Mr. Mullin: Information about research commissioned by the Department is made widely available. It includes overview material on the DETR website and details of individual programmes and projects—again on the website and through hard copy reports, Compendia and Newsletters. Details of each project are not held centrally but a list of the Department's research projects will be prepared and placed in the Library of the House within two weeks. Other bodies sponsored by the Department, including the Highways Agency, Maritime and Coastguard Agency, English Nature, the Countryside Agency and the Environment Agency, also fund their own research programmes and publish separate information on these.

Student Housing

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with the DfEE about student housing provision for university students. [101053]

Mr. Mullin: This is a matter primarily for liaison between local authorities and the universities and other higher education institutions. The DfEE, through the Higher Education Funding Councils, does not make financial provision to the universities for student residential accommodation. It is also a matter for individual students to choose the type of accommodation they wish to occupy.

My Department will continue to discuss with the DfEE whether halls of residence and other university owned, managed or leased accommodation should be exempt from our proposed licensing system for houses in multiple occupation.

We are also considering carefully Recommendation 33 of Policy Action Team 7's report on Unpopular Housing: that my Department should discuss with DfEE and the Department of Health an agreed approach to the use of existing stock to meet demand for student housing and housing for medical staff before new developments take place in areas of low demand.

HMOs

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received from which local authorities about extending licensing of houses of multiple occupation. [101052]

Mr. Mullin: Manchester City Council, Gateshead Metropolitan Borough Council, and a number of other authorities, mainly in the north-east and north-west of England, have made a variety of proposals for extending licensing, or the power to licence, to other private rented sector housing. The Local Government Association have also suggested that future legislation should be framed to enable licensing to be extended.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to extend licensing of houses of multiple occupation. [101051]

Mr. Mullin: We are committed to the introduction of mandatory licensing of houses in multiple occupation (HMOs). While we recognise that there are problems of poor physical and management standards elsewhere in the private rented sector, and are considering whether further measures would be appropriate to deal with these, we have no plans to extend mandatory licensing beyond the HMO sub-sector.

Crossrail

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the report recently published by the Corporation of London on Crossrail; and if he will make a statement. [101291]

Mr. Hill: Crossrail will be a matter for the new Mayor to consider in formulating an integrated transport strategy for London. Ministers will be happy to discuss the project with any new Mayor who wants to broker a viable deal to build it.

I welcome the addition to the Crossrail debate provided by the results of the Corporation of London's review of the project, and their proposals on how it might be taken forward.

Additionally, the scheme and the Corporation's report will be among the many items to be considered by Sir Alastair Morton and the shadow Strategic Rail Authority as part of their detailed study of capacity issues on the lines running out from the west of London.

Tropical Timber

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many purchases of tropical timber have been made by the Environment Agency since 1998; what were the timber species; and for what purpose they were specified. [101292]

Mr. Mullin: The Environment Agency uses timber for two main purposes, civil engineering and furniture. The Agency does not purchase any furniture containing tropical hardwood. Civil engineering works are predominately for flood defence projects. As the majority of these are contracted out, the Agency cannot readily provide figures on individual purchases of timber or other materials. Tender documentation seeks to ensure that works meet the highest environmental standards. For example, clauses are incorporated to ensure that new timber from all sources is provided from a managed renewable source. Also, the specification for groynes and piles states that > "the timber used, including tropical hardwoods, shall be obtained from sustainably managed forests and plantations."

Further details on the Agency's procurement policies are available on the Environment Agency website.

Waste Strategy

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received regarding the Government's draft waste strategy for England and Wales, "A Way with Waste". [101317]

Mr. Mullin: The Government published for consultation their draft waste strategy for England and Wales, "A Way With Waste", on 30 June 1999. We have received over 500 substantive submissions from a wide range of interested parties, and over 20,000 postcards urging higher recycling targets from members of the public. These views will also be taken into consideration as we develop the final strategy.

The final version of our sustainable waste management strategy—which we will publish early next year—will be a long-term strategy for handling the waste generated by businesses, service providers and households. The Government are committed to introducing and promoting sustainable waste management across the UK. This means using materials and resources efficiently, to cut down on the amount of waste we produce, and where waste is produced, dealing with it in a way that actively contributes to the economic, social and environmental goals of sustainable development.

Burscough Curves Railway Line

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with Railtrack and the train operating companies on re-opening the Burscough Curves railway line between Southport and Preston. [101160]

Mr. Hill: None. However, the sSRA is engaged in discussions with Railtrack on service improvements to be delivered during its next charging period, 2001 to 2006. Re-opening Burscough Curve has been raised for consideration by Merseytravel. The sSRA will be sending to Railtrack shortly details of improvements it wishes them to cost in their next Network Management Statement.

Homelessness

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to commission research on the provision of temporary accommodation for and the resettlement support needs of young pregnant women and single parents. [101187]

Mr. Mullin: DETR has no plans to commission such research, but the research programme for the coming year has not been finalised yet.

The Teenage Pregnancy Unit in the Department of Health, which has been set up in light of the Social Exclusion Unit's report "Teenage Pregnancy", is in the early stages of drafting its research strategy and cannot say whether it will include anything on support for teenage mothers.

Following publication of the SEU's report, the Housing Corporation has invited bids from Registered Social Landlords to develop around 15 pilots to test alternative approaches to the provision of supported accommodation for 16–18 year old lone parents. Research, in the form of evaluation of both the pilots and existing projects providing supervised accommodation, will be initiated once the pilots are established.

Footpaths

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many adjudications on the closure or diversion of footpaths he was called upon to make for each relevant authority in the last year for which figures are available; and in how many of these cases the local authority's view was overturned. [101152]

Mr. Mullin: The number of decisions made by the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on the closure and diversion of footpaths for each relevant authority between the periods 1 November 1998 and 31 October 1999 are as follows:

Local Government

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the smallest district council area which will be covered by the proposed cabinet structure for local government. [101284]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Local Government Bill, which was read a Second time in the other place on 6 December, includes provision for all district councils, including Watford Borough Council which has the smallest area among such councils, to adopt new constitutions including a separate executive.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his proposed timetable is for the introduction of cabinet government into district councils. [101286]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Subject to Parliament enacting the Local Government Bill, all councils will be required to put forward proposals for new constitutions, including their proposed timetable for implementation. As our White Paper "Modern Local Government: In Touch with the People" (Cm 4014) made clear, should there be any cases where progress is not being made, it will be open to the Secretary of State to use his reserve power to intervene.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what exemptions he proposes from the planned cabinet government structure for district councils; and whether the criteria for exemption will include (a) size of district, (b) population and (c) number of councils. [101285]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Local Government Bill provides that all district councils shall have a duty to bring forward proposals to move to one of the new forms of constitution involving a separate executive.

Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what advice he has given local authorities which wish to introduce new local government structures before the Local Government Bill is enacted. [101978]

Ms Beverley Hughes: In March, we published the paper "Local leadership, local choice" (Cm 4298), which set out proposals for more efficient, transparent and accountable constitutions for councils and which included a checklist of steps that councils could take before legislation. The paper made clear that any new structure a council adopted should be what its local people wanted and therefore the council must consult its local community widely on all available options before making any change.

Central Trains

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions the Health and Safety Executive has investigated the Central Trains service between Shrewsbury and Birmingham; and if he will make a statement. [101161]

Mr. Hill: The Health and Safety Executive's Railway Inspectorate (HMRI) carries out routine inspection of the activities carried out by Central Trains. This includes the services between Shrewsbury and Birmingham, but HMRI has no record of specific inspections of these services.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to ensure that areas of outstanding natural beauty receive central support for their management and conservation. [101208]

Mr. Mullin: The Government have provided the Countryside Agency with an additional £2.5 million this year to be spent on the management and conservation of designated Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty (AONBs). That more than doubles the amount previously available. We expect to announce shortly a number of further measures to assist in the conservation and management of AONBs.

Landscape Policy Guidance

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent discussions he has had with the Landscape Institute concerning the possible introduction of landscape policy guidance notes; and if he will make a statement. [101209]

Mr. Mullin: Ministers and officials have various contacts with the Landscape Institute. My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for housing, planning and construction attended the Landscape Institute awards on 18 November and on 25 November DETR officials met representatives of the Landscape Institute to discuss a number of points of common interest. I am not aware of any discussions concerning the possible introduction of landscape policy guidance notes, although the Institute has advised its intention to update its Guidelines for Landscape and Visual Impact Assessment.

Railtrack (Trespass)

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what recent guidance he has given to Railtrack regarding trespass on railway lines; [101325]

(2) what his policy is on the action Railtrack should take following a trespass on Railtrack property that caused severe disruption to passenger trains. [101326]

Mr. Hill: As an infrastructure controller, Railtrack is required under the Railway Safety (Miscellaneous Provisions) Regulations 1997 to take reasonably practicable steps to prevent unauthorised access to its infrastructure. Breaches of this duty are enforced by the Health and Safety Executive's Railway Inspectorate.

The Health and Safety Commission's Railway Industry Advisory Committee (RIAC), of which Railtrack is a member, has been active in promoting industry-wide action against trespass and vandalism. In December last year RIAC produced a booklet "Prevention of Trespass and Vandalism on Railways—A Good Practice Guide" (a copy of which is in the House Library).

The action to be taken following severe disruption to train services following acts of trespass is an operational matter for Railtrack and the train operating companies. However, it is expected that their aim would be to restore normal services as quickly as possible.

Secure Station Status

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the stations which have been awarded Secure Station status. [101496]

Mr. Hill: As at 2 December, there were 28 stations accredited under the Secure Stations Scheme. They are as follows:

Train operator	Station
Chiltern Railways	Marylebone rail
Connex Rail	Belvedere Hither Green
Eurostar (UK)	Ashford International Waterloo International
LTS Rail	Basildon Fenchurch Street
London Underground Ltd.	Marylebone LUL
Midland Mainline	Derby Leicester Market Harborough
Railtrack plc	Charing Cross rail Glasgow Central High Level Kings Cross rail Manchester Piccadilly Victoria rail
Silverlink Trains	Kew Gardens
South West Trains	Kingston Richmond
Thameslink Rail	City Thameslink Haydons Road Morden South South Merton St. Helier Sutton Common Wimbledon Chase
Wales and West	Gloucester Weston-super-Mare

A number of other stations are working towards accreditation.

Concessionary Fares

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received about the concessionary fares scheme in Merseyside; and if he will make a statement. [101693]

Mr. Hill: I have not received any representations about the concessionary fares scheme on Merseyside.

Council Tenants (Freehold)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to review the freehold system as it applies to council tenants purchasing their council flat. [101603]

Mr. Mullin: When council tenants buy their flat, they buy a long lease, not the freehold. Leaseholders have the right to purchase the freehold of their block in certain cases. However, the right can only be exercised by a majority of residents. As most council blocks are occupied mainly by secure tenants, rather than leaseholders, many cannot meet this requirement.

The Government last year announced proposals to reform the leasehold system and to introduce commonhold. Commonhold will allow flats to be owned absolutely, but there will be rules to regulate the relations between flat owners to enable proper management of the block as a whole. Leasehold reform will, among other things, make it easier for leaseholders to buy a share of the freehold of their block. However, the right will still require a majority to exercise it.

The Government have taken a number of steps to help those who have bought a council flat, including allowing—and in some cases requiring—landlords to reduce high charges, and giving council and other leaseholders an easier way to challenge unreasonable charges.

Water Companies (Maintenance Services)

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his policy on water companies contracting out their network maintenance services. [101432]

Mr. Mullin: Water undertakers are required to carry out their duties consistent with Sections 37 and 38 of the Water Industry Act 1991. Sewerage undertakers have similar responsibilities under Sections 94 and 95 of the Act. It is for the relevant companies to consider how best to meet these obligations.

The Director General of Water Services publishes an annual "Report on levels of service for the water industry in England and Wales", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Rent Acts (Maximum Fair Rent) Order 1999

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what response he has made to the Court of Appeal decision to allow judicial review of the Rent Acts (Maximum Fair Rent) Order 1999. [101642]

Mr. Mullin: The Secretary of State has appointed Counsel to defend the Government's position at the Court of Appeal hearing on 8 and 9 December. We believe that the Order is within the scope and purpose of the enabling power under section 31 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 and that the Secretary of State did not act unreasonably in deciding to make the Order.

Housing Corporation

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions the Housing Corporation has approved a contractual purchase sale on terms better than the statutory terms. [101451]

Mr. Mullin: The Housing Corporation is required under section 9 of the Housing Act 1996 to approve all disposals of properties by Registered Social Landlords. Where the disposals are to tenants of the properties it is the Housing Corporation's policy not to allow disposals on terms better than the statutory terms.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance Ministers have given to the Housing Corporation relating to approval of contractual purchase sales on terms better than the statutory terms. [101450]

Mr. Mullin: My Department has not issued guidance to the Housing Corporation relating to the approval of contractual purchase sales, known as "voluntary sales", on terms better than the statutory terms. The Corporation's consent is required under section 9 of the Housing Act 1996 to disposals and I understand that it is the policy of the Corporation not to grant consents in the case of voluntary sales to tenants on terms which exceed those under the Right to Buy scheme.

Renewal Area Status

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will assess the benefits of introducing renewal area status for self-contained groups of fewer than 300 dwellings. [101413]

Mr. Mullin: My Department is currently considering a number of issues relating to policy on private sector housing renewal, which includes policy on renewal areas. The housing Green Paper, which will be published shortly, will provide an opportunity for us to set out our thinking on these and other housing issues.

Open Countryside (Mapping)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects the mapping of open countryside in England and Wales to be completed; and if the exercise is being carried out in stages according to the nature of the terrain. [101483]

Mr. Mullin: The Countryside Agency and Countryside Council for Wales will be responsible for producing maps showing land to which the new statutory right of access will apply. They are currently undertaking preliminary work, the results of which will help determine the best approach to mapping, and enable a timetable to be established for the production of consultation maps.

Audits

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will undertake a comparison between the audit process for small parish councils and those for (a) charities and (b) businesses of similar financial size. [101488]

Ms Beverley Hughes: As recognised by statute, the audit processes for local authorities, including parish councils, are not comparable with those of the private sector or charitable bodies, reflecting that authorities largely obtain their funds through taxation.

Parking

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if it is his policy to exempt parking places at (a) police premises and (b) prisons from workplace parking charges. [101837]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 7 December 1999]: The Transport Bill currently before Parliament allows the Secretary of State or the National Assembly for Wales to require workplace parking levy schemes to include exemptions for particular types of premises. Local authorities will also be able to include their own exemptions. Our consultation paper "Breaking the Logjam" sought views on a range of possible exemptions. A detailed response to the consultation exercise will be published in due course.

Factortane

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library the Skeletons of Argument for the Crown in R v. Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and Regions ex parte Factortane (a) in the Court of Appeal and (b) in the House of Lords. [101137]

Mr. Morley: I have been asked to reply.

A skeleton argument is drafted by Counsel in the course of litigation for the assistance of the court, or as appropriate in the House of Lords. In the present case the Government have no objection to placing copies of these skeleton arguments in the Library and this has now been done.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Meat Hygiene Service

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received in the last six months on the performance of the Meat Hygiene Service. [99291]

Ms Quin: In the last six months, my Department has received several hundred representations from Members of Parliament, Members of the European Parliament, industry organisations, individual meat plant operators, farmers, consumers and others about the performance of the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS), and in particular the extent of veterinary supervision in meat plants, and about proposals to increase MHS inspection charges. Representations have also been made about the need to use fully qualified veterinarians by the MHS.

The Government have listened to these concerns about the future of the slaughtering sector. Following fresh advice obtained from the European Commission, published on 13 October, low throughput slaughterhouses will not be required to have full-time supervision by a vet during post-mortem inspection. The MHS is now reviewing its levels of inspections in individual low throughput premises. Moreover, as the Minister announced on 1 December, the MHS hygiene inspection charges for the whole of 1999–2000 are being held at the levels set for 1998–99. The Government have also given a commitment that the rates of MHS hygiene inspection charges in 2000–01 should not rise by more than the rate of inflation above the levels charged in 1999–2000.

Land Prices

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the freehold sale price by English region of grade 1 agricultural land for the most recent year for which figures are available. [100579]

Ms Quin: The average prices of freehold sales of agricultural properties are shown in the following table.

Average price of Grade 1 agricultural land sold in 1998, by English region

Government Office region	£000 per hectare
North East	[1]—
North West	8.1
Yorkshire and Humberside	8.5
East Midlands	6.0
West Midlands	[1]—
Eastern	7.0
South East	7.3
South West	7.1
England	6.9

[1] Denotes insufficient sales to give an average price

The average prices in most cases are based on a very low number of actual sales and hence are not a reliable indicator of regional differences. As details are reported up to three years after the sale date, these estimates are provisional.

Farming (Leicestershire)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the total value to Leicestershire farmers of all CAP payments for (a) the last year for which figures are available and (b) 2000–01. [101061]

Ms Quin: The following schedule shows approved payments to Leicestershire farmers for both the 1998 calendar year and the 1998–99 financial year. Farmers in Leicestershire will also have benefited from CAP schemes supporting market prices which do not involve payments made directly to them.

Regarding estimates for 2000–01, with so many variables it is not possible to provide estimates with any degree of accuracy at this time.

CAP Payments in Leicestershire

Scheme	Calendar Year 1998	Financial Year 1998–99
Sheep Annual Premium Scheme	2,489,961	2,406,632
Suckler Cow Premium Scheme	2,454,053	2,210,637
Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowance	—	—
Beef Special Premium Scheme	4,352,833	4,331,827
Arable Areas Payments Scheme	28,210,375	28,013,534
Environmentally Sensitive Area	—	—
Organic Aid Scheme	11,350	14,158
Farm Woodland Scheme	34,407	34,407
Farm Woodland Premium Scheme	110,469	117,145
Nitrate Sensitive Areas	—	—
Countryside Stewardship Scheme	364,188	402,471

Note:

The figures are based on the addresses to which payments have been made which in the majority of cases will be the address where the relevant farming activities have taken place. However, when a single farm business operates on land in various locations, the payment is made to their main holding rather than, in all cases, the holding where the cropping or livestock maintenance may necessarily have taken place. This means that an element of the payments shown will relate to farming activities in other parts of the UK but the payments will have been made to the main holding address in Leicestershire. Conversely, the figures attached will not include payments for farming activities in Leicestershire in cases where the main holding is located in another part of the UK.

All schemes have individual 'scheme years' and these, invariably, respect neither calendar nor financial year boundaries. The figures quoted give totals of all payments made under the schemes, which will cover a mixture of scheme years. For example, in the case of BSPS, they will be made up from the balance payments for the 1997 scheme year, paid in April 1998 and the Advance payments for the 1998 scheme year, paid in November 1998.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Brake: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total amount of agri-environment or general agricultural support expended, in the most recent period for which figures are available, on SSSI land in England; and if he will break down the figure in different types of expenditures. [101290]

Mr. Morley: In 1998–99 total payments in respect of SSSI land under the Environmentally Sensitive Areas scheme amounted to £6.4 million. Figures are not available in the form requested for the other agri-environment schemes or for general agricultural support.

Correspondence

Mrs. Shephard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk will receive a reply to her letter of 25 November on arable area payments. [101859]

Mr. Nick Brown: I assume the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk is referring to her letter of 25 October to which I replied on 3 December.

DEFENCE

Project Aquatrine

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the status of Project Aquatrine. [102324]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Project Aquatrine will provide, for the first time, strategic management of water and sewerage services across more than 3,000 Ministry of Defence sites in Great Britain. The Department aims to achieve this through a Public Private Partnership (PPP) and has today launched a market consultation paper to explore private sector interest in the project. The PPP will lead to greater value for money, investment in the defence infrastructure and enable responsibility for the provision of water and sewerage services to rest with those best able to deal with it while meeting the Department's on-going environmental responsibilities.

The market consultation follows successful pathfinder projects at Tidworth and Lyneham; the outcome will inform the decision on the next phase of the project.

The current plan is to advertise Project Aquatrine in the Official Journal of the European Communities in early 2000, leading to the selection of a partner to begin providing services in late 2003. The project has a potential value of £1 billion over 25 years.

RAF Helicopters

Mr. Martin Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the incidents of uncommanded flying control movements in helicopters reported by RAF pilots, broken down by helicopter type since 1994. [101652]

Mr. Spellar: Uncommanded movements are defined as unusual movement of flying controls or rotors that are not caused by pilot inputs. These include those unusual movements found during pre-flight checks.

The table lists the incidents of uncommanded flying control movements in helicopters reported by RAF pilots, broken down by helicopter type since 1994.

Falklands

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the number of land mines in the Falkland Islands. [101822]

Mr. Spellar: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby) on 30 November 1999, Official Report, column 159W.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what role he proposes following the 22 UK/French Summit for Anglo-French co-ordination in relation to the UK commitment to the defence of the Falkland Islands. [R] [101420]

Mr. Hoon: None. The security of the Falkland Islands is the responsibility of the United Kingdom Government alone.

Land Mines

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps his Department is taking to ensure that foreign military forces stationed in the United Kingdom do not store land mines in the United Kingdom. [98594]

Mr. Spellar: The UK is fully committed to the Ottawa Convention which prohibits the use, stockpiling, production, and transfer of anti-personnel mines (APMs). The last of the UK's operational stocks of APMs were destroyed on 19 October 1999—three years ahead of the timeframe laid down in the Convention. Allies who have forces stationed in the UK are well aware of the Ottawa Convention's obligations which include the prohibition of the stockpiling of APMs on UK territory. The only APMs stored in the UK are the small amount (some 4,000) that the UK's armed forces hold for training and testing in de-mining techniques, as permitted under Article 3 of the Ottawa Convention.

Royal Army Medical Corps

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the recruitment campaign for the Royal Army Medical Corps; and if he will make a statement. [100722]

Mr. Spellar: The Royal Army Medical Corps undertakes recruiting on a continuous basis, utilising a wide variety of media and the Army Recruiting network. Recruitment into training is good, but it is more difficult to attract already qualified medical personnel. The tri-Service campaign in February and March 1999 aimed at the direct recruitment of qualified personnel has resulted, to date, in one doctor and four nurses entering the Army, with a further six nurses in the recruitment process. Additionally, a major recruiting campaign for the Territorial Army Medical Services was launched in September 1999. It is too early to predict the success of this campaign but early responses seem promising.

AWE Aldermaston

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the longest amount of overtime worked by any MOD police officer at AWE Aldermaston in any period of (a) two weeks, (b) one month and (c) six months, since November 1998. [100684]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 30 November 1999]: The largest number of overtime hours worked by a MOD Police officer at AWE Aldermaston during a one-month period since November 1998 was 120 hours and a six-month period was 532 hours. The MDP do not routinely record overtime worked in two-week periods and this information could only be provided by manually searching through all the individual police pay records at AWE Aldermaston, incurring disproportionate cost.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from the Defence Police Federation in respect of overtime worked by officers at AWE Aldermaston. [100687]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 30 November 1999]: I understand that concerns have been expressed by the local Defence Police Federation at AWE Aldermaston about the levels of overtime worked at that location.

Deceased Aircrew

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the occasions since 1993 in which deceased aircrew have been found guilty of gross negligence in accidents involving military aircraft which were not fitted with cockpit voice recorders or flight data recorders. [101497]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is as follows:

Date	Aircraft type	Service	Location
2 June 1994	Chinook HC2	RAF	Mull of Kintyre, Scotland

Non-core Service Privatisation

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-core services have been privatised by his Department in (a) 1999 and (b) each of the previous three years. [101661]

Mr. Spellar: Individual budget areas and agencies routinely contract out services to the private sector where this offers best value for money. No central records of such arrangements are kept. Relevant figures for activities contracted out under the former Competing for Quality (CFQ) initiative and for contracts concluded under the Private Finance Initiative (PFI) are:

	PFI	CFQ
1995–96	2	8
1996–97	8	16
1997–98	6	5
1998–99	9	5

HMS Glasgow

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the current crew levels are of HMS Glasgow. [101298]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 6 December 1999]: On 1 December 1999 HMS Glasgow had a crew level of 23 Officers and 224 ratings.

Navy Vessels

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which naval vessels have been withdrawn in advance of planned exercises during 1999. [101613]

Mr. Spellar: HMS Invincible, HMS Northumberland, HMS Ledbury, HMS Gloucester, HMS Newcastle, HMS Cattistock, HMS Montrose, HMS Monmouth, HMS Fearless, HMS Ocean, HMS Sandown, HMS Edinburgh, HMS Westminster, HMS Grafton have been withdrawn from planned exercises this year.

Devolved Assemblies (Defence Briefings)

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what charging arrangements are in place in respect of the budgets of the Scottish Executive and National Assembly for Wales, to pay for the time of Ministry of Defence officials preparing briefing for members of the (a) Scottish Executive and (b) National Assembly for Wales when replying to debates. [101150]

Mr. Hoon: Members of the Scottish Executive and the National Assembly of Wales are entitled to ask for and receive any information which would be relevant to the running of their business. The same principles apply to information that the Ministry of Defence might require from the devolved Administrations. As this relationship includes an exchange of information both ways, there are no charging arrangements in place in respect of the budgets of the Scottish Executive and the National Assembly of Wales to pay for the time of Ministry of Defence officials preparing this briefing.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to what security level members of the Scottish Executive are briefed on defence matters when answering debates on defence issues in the Scottish Parliament. [101149]

Mr. Hoon: Members of the Scottish Executive are provided with all information that is necessary and appropriate to enable them to meet their responsibilities to the Scottish Parliament. As Scottish Ministers are Ministers of the Crown and members of the Scottish Executive remain Civil Servants, no additional security restrictions apply.

Service Pensions

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the current rate is of service pension that would be paid to an Army major who retired at the age of (a) 55 after 34 years reckonable service on 1 April 1977, (b) 53 after 32 years reckonable service on 1 April 1975 and (c) 55 after 34 years reckonable service on 1 April 1997. [101151]

Mr. Spellar: (a) The current rate of service pension that would be paid to an Army major who retired at the age of 55 after 34 years reckonable service on 1 April 1977 is £12,776.18.

(b) The current rate of service pension that would be paid to an Army major who retired at the age of 53 after 32 years reckonable service on 1 April 1975 is £16,131.20.

(c) The current rate of service pension that would be paid to an Army major who retired at the age of 55 after 34 years reckonable service on 1 April 1997 is £19,233.

HEALTH

HIV/AIDS

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what Government funding is available for HIV and AIDS research; and how this is distributed between the NHS regions. [99388]

Yvette Cooper: Estimated total Government funding for HIV/AIDS research in 1999–2000 will be £16 million, of which £10 million will be spent by the Medical Research Council. The rest of the funding will be split between the Public Health Laboratory Service, the Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research, the National Institute for Biological Standards and Control, other research councils and Government Departments. Funding is not allocated across National Health Service regions, but is awarded to the research centre best able to undertake high quality work.

Project details of work directly funded by the Department or supported through the NHS research and development levy can be found on the National Research Register. This is available in the Library and most medical libraries on CD-Rom, and on the internet: http://www.doh.gov.uk/nrr.htm.

NICE

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the compliance of current arrangements for appeals against recommendations of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence with the requirements of Article 2, paragraph 2 of the EC Council Directive of 21 December 1988. [99880]

Mr. Denham: Article 2 of the EC Council Directive of 21 December 1988 (the "Transparency Directive") refers to arrangements for the approval of the price of medicinal products. That has no relevance to the work of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence, which has no role in relation to pricing issues.

Departmental Estate

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his estimate is of the value of land and property including properties under construction (a) in Scotland, (b) in England and (c) in total for his core Department, including leasehold and freehold properties, and the regional offices. [99737]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The value of the National Health Service estate in England, including properties under construction, is approximately £23 billion. The valuation of freehold land and property in England occupied by the Department, including its regional offices, is being developed as part of the implementation of resource accounting. This information is currently being audited. The first set of resource accounts will be published in respect of 1999–2000.

Issues relating to Scotland are a matter for my right hon. Friend the First Minister for Scotland.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his estimate is of the value of land and property in (a) Scotland, (b) England and (c) total held by non-NHS bodies within his responsibility. [99735]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The total value of the National Health Service estate in England is approximately £23 billion. In addition, an amount of £75 million is directly attributable to non NHS bodies.

Issues relating to Scotland are a matter for my right hon. Friend the First Minister for Scotland.

Health Authority Mergers

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many health authority mergers have occurred since May 1997. [100779]

Mr. Denham: Nationally there has only been one health authority merger since May 1997 when North West Anglia, East Norfolk and Cambridge and Huntingdon Health Authorities merged to become Norfolk and Cambridge Health Authorities on 1 April 1999.

Hospital and Community NHS Trust Mergers

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the hospital and community NHS trust mergers that have occurred since May 1997. [100778]

Mr. Denham: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Shropshire Health Authority

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many emergency admissions (a) to the Royal

Shrewsbury Hospital and (b) in total for Shropshire Health Authority there were in each year from 1992 to date; and if he will make a statement. [100723]

Ms Stuart: The table shows the number of emergency admissions (a) to the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital National Health Service Trust and (b) to NHS trusts within Shropshire Health Authority for the financial years 1992–93 to 1997–98.

Ordinary admissions and day cases combined: number of emergency admissions shown by selected health authority and hospital provider, NHS hospitals, England

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the full patient satisfaction survey results for (a) Shropshire Health Authority and (b) all the NHS trusts in Shropshire; and if he will make a statement. [100594]

Ms Stuart: The report of the first part of the national surveys programme—on general practitioner services—was placed in the Library in October ("National Surveys of NHS Patients: General Practice 1998"). A breakdown of the data to health authority level can be found on the internet at: http://doh.gov.uk/public/nhssurvey.htm.

The second part of the programme—on coronary heart disease—will include data at National Health Service trust level and will be published in 2000.

NHS Beds (Winter)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those NHS trusts that are planning to cope with winter bed pressures by contracting with the private medical sector. [100574]

Ms Stuart: The information requested is not available centrally.

Diabetic Care

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when pen needles for use by diabetics will be available on prescription. [100918]

Ms Stuart: We have consulted on proposals which would include allowing insulin pen needles to be prescribed by general practitioners on the National Health Service. We have received representations from most of the organisations consulted. We are considering them and are seeking clarification on certain points before we make our final decisions.

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for the development of diabetic care on the NHS. [101368]

Mr. Denham: My noble Friend Lord Hunt of Kings Heath, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, is announcing today the membership of the Expert Reference Group which will advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on the development of the National Service Framework for diabetes. The Group met for the first time today. It is co-chaired by Professor Mike Pringle, Chair of the Council of the Royal College of General Practitioners, and Mr. Peter Houghton, Regional Director of the Eastern Regional Office of the National Health Service Executive.

Membership of the Expert Reference Group is as follows:

Professor George Alberti, President of the Royal College of Physicians

Mr. Zac Arif, Chief Executive of Teddington Memorial Hospital

Ms Debbie Bamford, Chief Executive of Woking Primary Care Group

Dr. Peter Betts, Paediatrician from Southampton General Infirmary

Mr. Ian Donnachie, Chief Executive of Bradford Health Authority

Dr. Azhar Farooqui, General Practitioner and Primary Care Group Clinical Governance Lead, Leicester

Dr. Owain Gibby, Diabetologist, Royal Gwent Hospital

Dr. Trisha Greenhalgh, General Practitioner, London

Ms Geeta Patel, a user of diabetes services and mother of triplets, Wolverhampton

Dr. Veena Soni Raleigh, Epidemiologist and Researcher, National Institute of Epidemiology

Mr. John Rostill, Chief Executive, Walsall Hospitals NHS Trust

Mr. Paul Streets, Chief Executive, British Diabetic Association

Ms Sheridan Waldron, Dietitian, Leicester

Ms Rosemary Walker, Diabetes Specialist Nurse, Suffolk and Chair, Royal College of Nursing Diabetes Nursing Forum

Professor Rhys Williams, Professor of Epidemiology and Public Health, Nuffield Institute for Health, Leeds

Dr. Bob Young, Diabetologist, Hope Hospital, Salford.

Another user of diabetes services will be brought on to the Group early in the New Year.

The scope of the diabetes National Service Framework covers prevention, ascertainment, identification, management and complications of Type 1 and Type 2 diabetes and the management of diabetes in pregnancy.

The diabetes National Service Framework will be published in 2001. It will set national quality standards and service models for diabetes, and presents an opportunity to define practical, implementable and sustainable standards for the delivery of care, focused on the needs of people with diabetes. It will help us to reduce unacceptable variations in care, while improving the overall quality of services. The diabetes National Service Framework will pay particular heed to the needs of those who are disproportionately affected by diabetes, such as people from ethnic minority communities.

General Medical Council

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to increase awareness among the public of the General Medical Council's responsibility for doctors working in private practice. [101339]

Ms Stuart: The Medical Act 1983 provides for the regulation by the General Medical Council of the medical profession in the United Kingdom irrespective of whether practice is undertaken in the National Health Service or privately.

The General Medical Council has made it clear in its publication "A Problem With Your Doctor?" that its powers cover doctors

"in all branches of medicine, including hospital and general practice, whether in the NHS or in private practice".

Crohn's Disease

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the availability of Infliximab for prescription on the NHS for the treatment of Crohn's disease. [101322]

Mr. Denham: A European licence was granted on 13 August 1999 for Remicade, whose active constituent is infliximab, for certain indications. These are: for the treatment of severe, active Crohn's disease in patients who have not responded despite a full and adequate course of therapy with a corticosteroid and/or an immunosuppressant; and for the treatment of fistulising Crohn's disease in patients who have not responded despite a full and adequate course of therapy with conventional treatment.

Departmental Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many research contracts have been let by his Department since May 1997; what is the value of each contract; and in each case whether the contract included (a) a departmental veto over publication of the research results, (b) departmental control over the date of publication of the research results and (c) a requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments. [100150]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 6 December 1999]: Information about individual research contracts could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Details of medical and related research funded or supported by the Department can be found in the National Research Register. This is available in the Library and in most medical libraries on CD Rom, and on the internet: http://www.doh.gov.uk/nrr.htm.

Copies of model contracts for the Department's Policy Research Programme and the National Health Service research and development programme are in the Library.

The Department actively encourage publication of research it has funded.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Weights and Measures Act 1985

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement on the reasons for the proposed removal of the statutory qualification from the Weights and Measures Act 1985; [100450]

(2) what consultations his Department has held with (a) business and (b) consumers' groups in respect of the proposed removal of the statutory qualification from the Weights and Measures Act 1985; [100451]

(3) what assessment he has made of the impact on (a) consumers and (b) business of the proposed removal of the statutory qualification from the Weights and Measures Act 1985; [100452]

(4) what plans he has to replace the statutory qualification in the Weights and Measures Act 1985. [100449]

Mr. Byers: As part of the Government's new consumer strategy as set out in the recent White Paper "Modern Markets: Confident Consumers", we have been consulting on the basis of the document "Fair Trade: a consultation document on modernising the law on the sale of goods sold by quantity" on proposals to update and simplify weights and measures law. This includes how the law is enforced.

The consultation document proposed removal of the requirement in the Act for weights and measures inspectors to have a special certificate from the Department of Trade and Industry. Instead, either a general requirement would be placed on local authorities to ensure that those carrying out enforcement functions under the Act had appropriate training, skills and knowledge, paying regard to guidance on training and qualifications in a Code of Practice; or, alternatively I would have power to approve particular qualifications for particular purposes. These proposals have been brought forward as part of a broader examination of consumer protection enforcement (as described in the White Paper), in the light of the range of duties and responsibilities for enforcement in this area.

Both the White Paper and the consultation document referred to were widely distributed to both business and consumer organisations, as well as to enforcement authorities. We have received a number of replies, which are currently being considered. Further consultation is envisage before any final decisions are made.

Ice-cream Industry

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement on the arrangements for notification and publication of the Government's response to interested parties on the Competition Commission's inquiry into the ice-cream industry; [100408]

(2) when his Department will publish its response to the Competition Commission's report into the ice-cream industry; [100409]

(3) what plans he has to shorten the consideration period for departmental responses to Competition Commission reports; [100410]

(4) how many representations his Department has received on the Competition Commission's inquiry into the ice-cream industry. [100407]

Mr. Byers: The Competition Commission report on impulse ice cream will be published as soon as practicable. The Department's normal administrative target for publication of monopoly reports is within 10 weeks of receipt of the report.

The Department has received a number of representations in connection with the Competition Commission's investigation of the impulse ice cream market. Those received before the report was delivered to me were forwarded to the Competition Commission. Those received after the report was delivered to me will be taken into account by me at the appropriate time as part of my consideration of the report.

Copies of the report will be laid before Parliament at the same time as it is published. Immediately after publication, interested parties who have requested it will be sent a copy of the Press Notice announcing my decision.

Petrol Prices

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received regarding petrol prices charged to customers by car hire companies. [101134]

Mr. Byers: I have received no such representations.

British Gas

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to ensure that British Gas LP Gas is accountable to the Gas Consumer Council. [101164]

Mrs. Liddell: The Gas Act 1986 defines gas by reference to substances which are in a gaseous state and does not deal with liquid petroleum gas (LPG) unless it is in a gaseous state when ownership is transferred to the consumer. As a body set up under the Gas Act 1986, the Gas Consumers' Council therefore has no functions in respect of companies' LPG activities. The Government have no plans for change in this respect.

As consumers have done in the past, problems concerning the pricing and supply of LPG, should continue to be referred to their local Trading Standards Department. The Office of Fair Trading (OFT) is responsible for consumer protection and competition issues covering the LPG industry including issues of pricing, supply and delivery and has powers under the Fair Trading Act 1973 to investigate anti-competitive behaviour such as collusive or predatory pricing. Consumers will continue to be able to bring this to the attention of the Director General of Fair Trading.

Dental Whiteners

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to stop the practice of hairdressers administering dental whiteners illegally. [101190]

Mr. Byers: We are not aware of this practice of hairdressers supplying dental whiteners. However, if a hairdresser supplies to consumers dental whitening products which are contrary to the Cosmetics Regulations, then this act of supply would be prohibited under those Regulations regardless of the use the whiteners may be put to.

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action the Government are taking to secure a revocation of the EU Directive on dental whiteners; and if he will make a statement. [101192]

Mr. Byers: There is no EU Directive on dental whiteners. These are controlled under the Cosmetics Directive. A review of the provisions of the Cosmetics Directive as they apply to tooth whiteners is currently under way.

Business Competitiveness (EU)

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with other members of the European Union on improving the competitiveness of business. [101198]

Mrs. Liddell: My Department's EU priorities, and in particular the central objective of improving the working of the single market, are aimed at improving the competitiveness of EU industry. DTI ministerial colleagues and I have regular discussions with our EU opposite numbers on a wide range of issues in both bilateral meetings and at EU Council meetings in Brussels.

The process of encouraging the EU to concentrate on competitiveness issues was reinforced at EU level at the Cardiff European Council under the UK Presidency last year which laid down a process to encourage and monitor economic reform and competitiveness in Europe.

In March next year, the Portuguese Presidency will be holding a special European Council on economic reform, employment and social cohesion. The UK has made a substantial input to this discussion, with the knowledge-driven economy, enterprise and social inclusion as our main proposals for achieving the objective of making Europe the most advanced knowledge-based economy in the world by 2010. My colleagues and I have spoken to a large number of our counterparts in other member states on these themes.

Vehicle Restraint Systems

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to introduce new regulations for the automotive industry relating to the handling and disposal of redundant secondary restraint systems on vehicles. [101498]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) has published guidance on the handling, storage, transport and disposal of vehicle air-bags and seat-belt pre-tensioners (ISBN 07176 15987). In addition the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders recommends that such items should not be re-used after removal from vehicles, a recommendation endorsed by the HSE. Although the Government currently have no plans to introduce legislation banning re-use we will keep this under close review.

Energy Prices

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the average decrease per household in the price of (a) electricity and (b) gas since privatisation expressed in (i) cash and (ii) percentage terms. [101499]

Mrs. Liddell: (a) Average annual domestic electricity bills are estimated to have fallen by £59 in real terms (at 1999 prices) between 1990 and 1999, representing a fall of 18 per cent.

(b) Average annual domestic gas bills are estimated to have fallen by £138 in real terms (at 1999 prices) between 1986 and 1999, representing a fall of 31 per cent.

More detailed figures relating to average annual domestic electricity and gas bills are presented in the tables.

Fuel Prices

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what impact the change in the price of fuel since privatisation has had (a) on the retail prices index and (b) on the amount of money paid in state benefits. [101500]

Mrs. Liddell: (a) The retail prices index (RPI) produced by the Office for National Statistics consists of a variety of components, each covering different products, including fuels. These components are aggregated using weights, which change each year, to produce the overall RPI. Over the period from 1987 to 1998 the fuel and light component of the all items RPI has increased more slowly than the all items RPI. The available information is presented in the table:

	All items RPI January 1987=100 [1]	Fuel and light component January 1987=100 [1]	Weight given to fuel and light component in the all items RPI parts per 1000

[1] Annual average

Note:
Figures for years prior to 1987 are based on January 1974=100

(b) Most social security benefits are uprated in April each year normally by reference to the retail prices index for the year up to the preceding September. The Rossi index, excluding changes in housing costs, is used in the case of most income-related benefits. Increases in fuel costs will have contributed to those inflation indices and will therefore have played a part in determining changes in benefit levels, but no benefit payments relate directly to the price of fuel.

Coal Concessions

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement concerning origins of future supplies of concessionary coal to retired mineworkers. [101425]

Mrs. Liddell: Concessionary coal includes a variety of manufactured smokeless fuels, housecoal, and anthracite. Under the current contracts most fuel has been UK sourced. Supplies beyond March 2000 are the subject of a competitive tender, which I am still assessing. I hope that the UK suppliers will continue to make their products available to the distributors appointed by the Department, and that the products they offer are competitive in terms of both prices and quality.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what criteria he will adopt to award the contract for the supply and distribution of concessionary coal to former British coal miners. [101216]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 6 December 1999]: As notified in the Official Journal of the European Communities, the award criteria for contracts for the supply and distribution of concessionary fuel are the economically most advantageous bids in terms of price, security of supply and quality maintenance standards.

Utilities (Operating Profits)

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the operating profit to-date of each (a) regional water authority, (b) regional electricity authority and (c) regional gas authority. [101430]

Mrs. Liddell: The water industry falls within the responsibilities of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister. Figures for the electricity industry are published in the annual report of the Office of Electricity Regulation which is available in the Library of the House. Figures for the gas industry are published in the Annual Report and Accounts of British Gas, subsequently Centrica and BGplc.

Parcelforce

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what policy changes he is planning as a result of the reported half-year loss by Parcelforce. [101731]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The half-year loss reported by Parcelforce is a matter of commercial and financial policy for Parcelforce management. It represents a 6 per cent. reduction in loss compared to the equivalent period to September 1998. Further improved operational efficiency from measures, such as the new express and international hubs at Coventry coming on-stream, are expected to make a positive contribution to the financial position of Parcelforce.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he is implementing to ensure the half-year loss by Parcelforce does not constitute a hidden subsidy; and if he will make a statement on his assessment of the effect this loss will have on competitors. [101805]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Parcelforce operates in a competitive area and is continuing to improve its competitiveness and profitability, as shown by its improved financial performance. The Post Office is required to take steps to make sure there is no undue cross-subsidy between Royal Mail monopoly services and Parcelforce. These include the separation of accounts and, in accordance with normal practice, a requirement that the in-year funding requirement to Parcelforce from Post Office Group is charged at a commercial rate.

In future the new, independent regulator, the Postal Services Commission, will ensure that any cross-subsidy from the monopoly areas to competitive activities is the minimum required, in its opinion, to ensure the continued provision of services required by the Universal Service Obligation at a uniform public tariff (which includes the standard parcels service). The Postal Services Commission will also ensure fair competition.

Airbus Project

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect of the United Kingdom's participation in the military company's airbus A400M project on employment in the UK. [101656]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Future Transport Aircraft (FTA) competition is being run by the Ministry of Defence. The A400M, along with Boeing's C-17 and Lockheed Martin's C130J, is a contender in the competition. The Department of Trade and Industry is involved in the consideration of the industrial implications of this procurement. Our assessment looks at the possible impacts of each bid on the UK's industrial and technological capabilities. The impact on UK employment levels is one aspect of this.

The FTA competition is still at the competitive bidding stage and it would be inappropriate to publish information provided to both MOD and DTI by companies as part of this process.

Departmental Research Contracts

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many research contracts have been let by his Department since May 1997; what is the value of each contract; and in each case whether the contract included (a) a departmental veto over publication of the research results, (b) departmental control over the date of publication of the research results and (c) a requirement that the final research results incorporate departmental amendments. [100157]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 6 December 1999]: This information would be available only at disproportionate cost.

Developing Countries

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list by country (a) the amount recovered by the Export Credits Guarantee Department and (b) the amount repaid under aid loans, for each of the countries defined by the World Bank as developing countries, in each of the last two financial years. [101414]

Mr. Caborn: From the information available, Table 1 shows the value of debts recovered by the Exports Credits Guarantee Department and Table 2 shows the amount repaid under aid loans. Both Annexes refer to countries defined by the World Bank as developing nations and include amounts from the last two financial years.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people have phoned the minimum wage hotline. [101481]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Since the introduction of the National Minimum Wage (NMW) on 1 April 1999 the helpline run by the Inland Revenue on behalf of the Department of Trade and Industry has received some 95,000 calls. In addition, the NMW helpline arranged through the Central Office of Information took 50,000 inquiries in January to March 1999. The total number of calls received by NMW helplines is therefore over 145,000.

Oil Fabrication (Scotland)

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of oil fabrication in the Highlands and Islands. [101436]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 6 December 1999]: I am concerned at the situation faced by Barmac and the other UK offshore oil fabrication yards.

The difficulties facing the UK offshore oil fabrication industry were discussed fully at last week's Oil and Gas Industry Task Force, which I chair. As a result plans are already under way for DTI to co-ordinate and support a powerful group comprising Government, Scottish Executive and all of the relevant Departments and agencies throughout the UK. This group will meet as soon as possible to clarify how they can together best help the industry adapt to the changed demand for their products and solutions.

Car Mileage (Customer Protection)

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the adequacy of existing legislation for protecting customers against being sold cars for which the mileage has been altered. [100812]

Dr. Howells: Selling a car with a false mileage reading is an offence under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. The key is to ensure that the enforcement authorities and buyers have access to reliable information on the history of a vehicle and my Department has been working with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions (DETR) on ways to improve this.

As a result the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency are currently considering proposals to make available more information on mileage by introducing a mandatory requirement for mileage to be recorded on vehicle registration and licensing forms. In addition, the computerisation of the MOT testing system by DETR will provide another central source of mileage information on vehicles more than three years old. For newer cars, the Government support the car retail industry's scheme for centrally recording data collected when vehicles are services.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Debt

8. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the recent moves in the US Congress to grant $110 million to fund bilateral debt forgiveness. [100355]

24. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the response by the US Government to Her Majesty's Government's initiatives on the current debt crisis. [100371]

Clare Short: The US Congress decision to provide resources for US export credit debt relief is welcome, as are its agreement to the IMF's financing of its debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative. However, the agreement on revaluing gold covered only the first tranche. The American pledge to cancel 100 per cent. of its bilateral debts for qualifying HIPCs will only be implemented after these countries have received their HIPC relief. It was therefore very disappointing that the US contribution for the HIPC Trust Fund was not agreed. This means that a substantial financing gap has opened up and this has stalled progress on implementing the revised HIPC initiative. I welcome the US Administration's commitment to pursue a US contribution to the Trust Fund next year.

20. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action her Department is taking to reduce the debt burden of the poorest countries. [100367]

Clare Short: My Department has been working closely with the Treasury on the problem of unpayable debt. Our Government have played a leading role in seeking a permanent solution to the debt problems of the poorest countries. We successfully pressed for a comprehensive Review of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative last year. Proposals for revising the HIPC framework were agreed in September 1999 at the Annual Meetings of the World Bank and the IMF. The HIPC initiative will now provide twice as much debt relief, and it will be provided more quickly and to more countries. There is also a much stronger link to poverty, to ensure that the poor benefit from the debt relief provided.

My Department has cancelled nearly all the aid debts of the poorest countries, worth around £1.2 billion since 1978, and we provide all our aid on grant terms, so as not to add to the burden of debt. We announced in 1997 that we are willing to cancel the aid debts of the remaining poor Commonwealth countries who are committed to poverty reduction and the international development targets, who are pursuing sound economic policies, who are committed to transparent and accountable government, and who are bearing down on corruption.

My Department also supports capacity building in debt management so that countries can better understand their debt position, negotiate their debt relief and formulate future borrowing strategies.

EU Aid Policies

9. Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps she is taking to ensure that EU aid policies concentrate more on poverty eradication and development. [100356]

Clare Short: EC development assistance is ineffective and insufficiently focused on poverty. We are working to ensure the EC's development effort embraces international poverty eradication targets. We published a strategy at the end of last year with 18 detailed proposals for reform.

Angola

10. Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the situation in Angola; and if she will make a statement. [100357]

Clare Short: The situation in Angola is grim. Some 3.7 million people are affected by the war. Many are facing serious malnutrition. The continuing insecurity remains a major obstacle to aid reaching some in greatest need. A lasting peace is the only answer. We have committed about £7.5 million in humanitarian assistance this year.

Population Programmes

11. Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on funding of population programmes. [100358]

Clare Short: We are spending £80 million through our own programmes on reproductive health care. This is a doubling of our programmes since 1994. We also spend £5.4 million through NGO's. Over the past 30 years we have moved from 9 per cent. to nearly 60 per cent. of couples having access to modern contraception. The International Community is committed to reaching 100 per cent. by 2015.

World Development Report

12. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the World Bank's world development report 1999–2000, "Entering the 21st Century"; and if she will make a statement. [100359]

Clare Short: This year's World Development Report deals with two great trends—globalisation and localisation. I welcome its message that we need new rules and institutional responses. The poor benefit from rule-based systems: otherwise they can be trampled on and bullied by the most powerful. The WTO for example provides an opportunity to developing countries to achieve a fairer trading system. And international agreement is needed to tackle global environmental problems.

The 1999 Report covers many issues. I am particularly looking forward to next year's Report on Poverty. I have every hope it will be pathbreaking.

Zambia (AIDS)

13. Mr. Fabian Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to help Zambia to find a solution to its AIDS epidemic. [100360]

Clare Short: AIDS is one of the four priority areas for our new Country Strategy in Zambia. We are already working in key areas of AIDS prevention, control and treatment.

World Trade Organisation

14. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the World Trade Organisation talks in Seattle in so far as they affect Britain's relations with developing countries. [100361]

15. Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what role her Department is playing in determining Government policy in respect of the World Trade Organisation. [100362]

16. Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the WTO Seattle meeting, and its potential impact on poverty reduction, self-sufficiency and sustainability in the developing world. [100363]

25. Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the impact of the WTO Round in Seattle on the economies of developing countries. [100372]

27. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the effect of the WTO Seattle Round on developing nations. [100374]

Clare Short: I refer my hon. Friends and the hon. Members to the answer I gave this afternoon to my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham).

Balkans

17. Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to maintain and expand assistance for the development and reconstruction of civil society and political structures in (a) Kosovo, (b) Macedonia and (c) Montenegro. [100364]

Clare Short: As part of our strategy to move from emergency and humanitarian support in Kosovo to longer-term assistance, we plan to assist with elections planned for next year (including arrangements for civil registration), promote the protection of civil and political rights and encourage the development of local civil society.

In Macedonia, we are planning to strengthen the capacity of government and civil society to design and deliver effective social policies. We are currently supporting citizen's advice and information services.

In Montenegro, we are exploring ways to build the capacity of civil society.

28. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if, when she last met her colleagues from other member states of the European Union, they discussed matters relating to the funding of aid projects in Kosovo and Serbia. [100375]

Clare Short: I have not discussed the funding of aid projects in Kosovo and Serbia with EU colleagues recently. However, there are regular meetings at official level.

Most recently the second donors' conference for Kosovo held in Brussels on 17 November pledged over $1 billion towards a programme of reconstruction and recovery. On Serbia, our position and that of the European Union is that, as long as Milosevic remains in power, we are only prepared to provide humanitarian assistance.

Volunteers

18. Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment her Department has made of the contribution of post-school overseas volunteers to developing countries. [100365]

Clare Short: My Department does not support schemes or organisations which fund school leavers to do volunteer work in developing countries, where the principal aim is the self development of the volunteer rather than developmental impact.

Over the last 20 years the main volunteer sending agencies have themselves phased out sending school leavers overseas, instead focusing on experienced and professional people who can have an impact on sustainable development. However, Voluntary Service Overseas (VSO) have recently introduced a new programme "Millennium World Youth" in partnership with The Prince's Trust. This is a new approach to volunteering for younger people, focusing on helping develop and challenge youth approaches to issues such as racism.

My Department does support the Overseas Training Programme, run by VSO. This initiative aims to send young people overseas, who are close to obtaining a professional qualification, have a particular expertise to offer, and can have a role to play in development. This scheme is due to be reviewed next year.

Windward Islands

19. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to help the people of the Windward islands. [100366]

Clare Short: Our office in the Caribbean is currently finalising a three year strategy paper for the Windward Islands which will take forward and focus our development assistance in areas where we can best help to reduce poverty. The strategy anticipates total DFID funding of £3m per year for the four islands in support of further work in education, the environment, economic reform, social policy, particularly focusing on poverty reduction strategies and public sector reform.

Zimbabwe

21. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the future of the aid programme to Zimbabwe. [100368]

Clare Short: The Government of Zimbabwe's policies are not focused on reducing poverty and this seriously limits our ability to work in Zimbabwe.

This means we are working to low case scenario set out in a Country Strategy Paper, published in April 1999. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

Women (Economic Empowerment)

22. Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action her Department is taking to provide greater economic empowerment of women in the developing world. [100369]

Clare Short: Women bear the brunt of poverty, but they also hold the key to its eradication. We are strongly committed to getting more girls through school, and working for improved opportunities for women.

We are supporting numerous projects and programmes which are seeking to make credit available to poor women, to provide them with non-financial support to starting and building small and medium enterprises, and removing obstacles to women's access to land and other assets. Our work in support of women has been the subject of a recent inquiry by the International Development Committee of this House, and it has just published an informative report on the work we are doing in this area.

Kenya

23. Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial support the Government are giving to Kenya. [100370]

Clare Short: UK bilateral development assistance to Kenya for 1999–2000 is expected to be £24 million.

Mongolia

26. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plan she has to visit projects funded by her Department in Mongolia. [100373]

Clare Short: I have no plans to visit Mongolia.

AIDS Vaccine

29. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the work of her Department to support the development of an AIDS vaccine for use in the developing world. [100376]

Clare Short: We are providing £14 million over the next five years to the International AIDS Vaccine Initiative (IAVI) to help develop an AIDS vaccine which is safe, effective and affordable for developing countries. This is additional to our earlier grant of £200,000 made in 1998, and supplements our existing work with the UK Medical Research Council and the European Commission.

Malaria

30. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with the World Health Organisation regarding the increased incidence of malaria; and if she will make a statement. [100377]

Clare Short: My Department has regular and frequent discussions with the World Health Organisation. Most recently, we have completed arrangements for making available £48 million over the next four years to the Roll Back Malaria initiative. £7 million of this allocation has already been provided for work this year.

Belize

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment her Department has made of the development benefit to Belize of its investment in the hydro-electric power project in 1994–95. [101744]

Clare Short: None. Responsibility for assessing the development value of its investments rests with CDC's board.

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if the Commonwealth Development Corporation's investment in the Belize hydro-electric project in 1994–95 meets the criteria for investment currently in operation; and what value for money assessment her Department has made of the project. [101738]

Clare Short: The investment in Belize Electricity Company was made according to conventional project financing criteria, fully meeting CDC's criteria at the time. These took into account the internal rate of return, the continuing capacity of the business to service the debt, and an analysis of key risk factors. CDC is now moving away from senior debt into equity investment.

Responsibility for assessing the value for money of individual investments rests with CDC's board. DFID's interest is not at project level but in the performance of CDC in meeting overall agreed targets.

My Department has not carried out a value for money assessment of the project.

Commonwealth Development Corporation

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what was the average (a) interest charge per year levied by the Commonwealth Development Corporation and (b) bank rate per year over the period 1990 to 1997. [101742]

Clare Short: Since 1993 CDC's policy has been to fix its interest rate with reference to a base rate kept in line with the London Inter-Bank Offer Rate (LIBOR), plus a margin ranging from 1 per cent. to 5 per cent. reflecting the credit quality of the borrower and incorporating as assessment of market and project risk.

In the period concerned the rate of interest that CDC was charging on its long-term senior debt was in line with that charged by other development finance institutions such as the International Finance Corporation (IFC), and was not subsidised.

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what was the average value of investments made by the Commonwealth Development Corporation in each of the years 1990 to 1997. [101740]

Clare Short: The value of CDC's average individual investments in each of the years 1990 to 1997 was as follows:

	£ million
1991	3.6
1992	3.7
1993	3.9
1994	3.8
1995	3.8
1996	4.0
1997	4.0

The figures for 1990 are not immediately available.

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what are the benefits to recipients, other than favourable treatment for interest rates, of loans provided by the Commonwealth Development Corporation which cannot be provided by commercial borrowing. [101745]

Clare Short: In many markets where CDC operates, long-term loans are not available to businesses for reasons of perceived credit risk. CDC loans therefore enable businesses to access long-term senior debt which may not otherwise be available to them.

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what was the largest investment made by the Commonwealth Development Corporation in the years 1990 to 1997. [101741]

Clare Short: The largest investment made by CDC between 1990–97 was £38.3 million in the Housing Development and Finance Company in India.

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development in which hydro-electric projects the Commonwealth Development Corporation invested from 1990 to 1997. [101743]

Clare Short: Between 1990 and 1997 CDC made investments in three hydro-electric projects. These were: the Hidroelectrica Planatar SA in Costa Rica, the Kapichira Hydro Electric Scheme in Malawi and the Belize Electricity Company Ltd.

Montenegro

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what is her estimate of the amount of financial assistance required from the international community to stabilise the economy of Montenegro. [101462]

Clare Short: We have not made such estimates. The response of the international community to Montenegro's needs will be made in the light of the policies pursued by the Montenegrin Government and on the basis of discussion with them. We are closely following developments.

SCOTLAND

Lynebank Hospital

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on what date his Department announced (a) the closure of Lynebank Hospital and (b) the sell-off of the site; and if he will make a statement. [99244]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 23 November 1999]: I understand that no ministerial announcement has been made. The health service in Scotland is now a devolved matter for the Scottish Executive.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 8 December. [101416]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I will have further such meetings later today.

TREASURY

Savings Target

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his targets are in respect of the level of the savings ratio in the United Kingdom. [101830]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government are aiming to spread the saving habit more widely and provide the right economic conditions to promote long-term saving.

Pesticides

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the reduction of pesticides use is an aim of his proposal for a pesticides tax; and if he will make a statement. [101817]

Mr. Timms: I refer the right hon. Member to paragraphs 6.106 to 6.108 inclusive of the Pre-Budget Report (Cm 4479), published on 9 November.

Individual Savings Accounts

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new regular savers have been attracted by the ISA scheme. [101815]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) on 11 November 1999, Official Report, column 764W.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of savers who hold both a maxi-ISA and a mini-ISA. [101827]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) on 27 October 1999, Official Report, column 898W.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate in respect of South Lancashire Council area (a) the numbers of income support and jobseeker's allowance claimants going onto the working families tax credits scheme because of the greater financial incentives involved and (b) the number of people in work who will now be entitled to working families tax credits as a result of more generous conditions of entitlement. [101487]

Dawn Primarolo: Reliable estimates for the numbers in receipt of the Working Families Tax Credit in South Lanarkshire are not yet available.

Employment

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in the number employed in Shrewsbury and Atcham since 1 May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [101714]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Paul Marsden, dated 7 December 1999:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to respond to your recent parliamentary question on the number of people employed in Shrewsbury and Atcham. I am replying in Dr Holt's absence.

The most robust estimates at local authority level relate to jobs rather than numbers employed. These figures are available on an annual basis at September each year. In September 1997, the Annual Employment Survey (AES) shows that there were 39,000 employee jobs in the Shrewsbury and Atcham local authority district. This compares with 38,300 for September 1996. Information for September 1998 from the AES will be available in the next few months.

Direct estimates of the numbers of people who are in employment and living in Shrewsbury and Atcham can be derived from the Labour Force Survey (LFS). Figures from this source cover employees, self-employed, unpaid family workers, and those on government employment training programmes, but are subject to larger sampling errors at local authority district level. For 1997–98, our best estimate on this basis is 47,000 which is the same as 1996–97.

European Court of Justice

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects a decision from the European Court of Justice on the VAT treatment of road tolls and road pricing; who initiated the proceedings in the court; and for what reasons. [101704]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 7 December 1999]: The Advocate General will deliver his written opinion to the European Court of Justice on 27 January 2000. If the Court follows its normal timetable the decision should be given three to six months later. Proceedings were initiated against the United Kingdom and five other member states by the European Commission. The dispute is over the interpretation of VAT legislation.

VAT

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue raised by VAT in the (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98 tax years; and what assessment he has made of the effect of simplifying the application of VAT between different retail sectors. [101905]

Dawn Primarolo: Revenue raised by VAT in 1996–97 was, £46,657 million. In 1997–98 it was, £50,865 million.

There are no simplifications for which an assessment by retail sector has been performed.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

New Deal (Heywood and Middleton)

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many lone parents aged (a) under 18, (b) 18–34, (c)34–50, and (d) over 50 years have joined the New Deal since 1998 (i) nationally and (ii) in the constituency of Heywood and Middleton. [100294]

Ms Jowell: The following table shows, by age, the number of lone parents attending an initial New Deal for Lone Parents (NDLP) interview in the period since the full national roll-out of the NDLP programme, that is from 26 October 1998 to the end of August 1999.

Age of lone parent	Great Britain	Heywood and Middleton
Under 18	580	1
18–24	17,200	52
25–34	38,120	94
35–49	27,650	51
50+	1,200	2

Departmental Estate

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what his estimate is of the value of land and property (a) in Scotland, (b) in the United Kingdom, (c) overseas and (d) in total held by (i) Ofsted, (ii) the Equal Opportunities Commission, (iii) the Funding Agency for Schools, (iv) the FEFC, (v) HEFCE, (vi) Investors in People UK Ltd, (vii) the National Council for Education Technology Ltd, (viii) Remploy Ltd, (ix) the Student Loans Company, (x) the Teacher Training Agency, (xi) the Construction Industry Training Board, (xii) the Engineering Construction Industry Training Board and (xiii) the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority; and what is the value of other assets held by each of these bodies. [99842]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 26 November 1999]: The information relating to the value of land, property and other asses is drawn from the latest set of accounts for each of the following organisations.

Child Care

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many extra child care places for (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire he estimates will be created under the expenditure announced in the Chancellor's Pre-Budget Report; and if he will make a statement. [101140]

Mr. Wicks: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced that expenditure to assist further education students with child care costs will increase from £5 million this year to £21 million in 2000–01. These amounts add to the approximately £4 million a year which is already provided by the Further Education Funding Council. This increase includes the additional funding referred to by the Chancellor in his Pre-Budget Report. It is expected that in 2001–02 we will assist about 37,000 students. The funding will be made a ring-fenced element within the Further Education Access Fund and will be allocated to colleges through a formula which takes account of student numbers and widening participation factors. Colleges will be told of their allocation by March 2000.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which local education authorities currently include a special educational needs factor in their LMS formula based on a local SEN audit; and what are the comparative value of funds allocated for pupils through such a factor according to the stage in the code of practice they have reached, for each LEA for which information is available. [101835]

Ms Estelle Morris: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Teachers' Pay

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what process was used to allocate the contract for consultancy work on teachers' performance-related pay; and what criteria were used to select the successful contractor. [101396]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 6 December 1999]: In May, Hay McBer was awarded a contract to carry out research into the characteristics of effective teachers. Hay was uniquely placed to carry out this work because of its research and development associated with the Leadership Programme for Serving Headteachers.

SSA (Leicestershire)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what additional standard spending assessment for Leicestershire would be required if it was funded at the average for English counties for (a) primary and (b) secondary pupils based on the provisional standard spending assessment for 2000–01. [101444]

Ms Estelle Morris: The SSA primary education sub-block would need to increase by £6,629,130 and the secondary education sub-block by £6,403,760 in order for Leicestershire to be funded at the English counties' average.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the estimated standard spending assessment funding is for (a) primary and (b) secondary pupils for Leicestershire local education authority based on the provisional education standard spending assessment for 2000–01. [101443]

Ms Estelle Morris: In Leicestershire for 2000–01 the provisional standard spending assessment for the primary education sub-block is £99.99 million, and for the secondary education sub-block is £103.63 million.

SSA Formula

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he last met the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to discuss the current standard spending assessment funding formula. [101445]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State meets Cabinet colleagues regularly to discuss a range of issues including the standard spending assessment funding formula.

Educational SSA

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the average standard spending assessment funding is per (a) primary pupil and (b) secondary pupil for English counties based on the provisional educational standard spending assessment for 2000–01. [101441]

Ms Estelle Morris: The provisional average standard spending assessment is £2,348 per primary pupil and £3,024 per secondary pupil for English counties for 2000–01.

SEN Tribunal

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the 1998–99 annual report from the President of the SEN tribunal will be published. [101954]

Jacqui Smith: The report was published yesterday and copies have been placed in the Library.

I would like to thank all those working with the Tribunal—the President, the members and the secretariat staff for their hard work and commitment over the past year. I am delighted that the Tribunal has maintained its targets for dealing with appeals while also handling an increased volume of such appeals.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people had their jobseeker's allowance stopped after an interview with job centre staff in each month of (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999. [101469]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 7 December 1999]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, dated 8 December 1999:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply to your question about how many jobseekers have had their Jobseeker's Allowance stopped following interviews with Jobcentre staff. This is something that falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

You will recall that I replied to you, along very similar lines, in my letter of 11 March. In that reply I said that the Employment Service conducts many different types of interviews with jobseekers, starting at the new claims stage and developing as unemployment lengthens. The new jobseeker's interview is important in establishing whether jobseekers meet the labour market conditions for receiving Jobseeker's Allowance and it is normally at this stage that a Jobseeker's Agreement is drawn up and jobseekers are made aware of their responsibilities in order to receive Jobseeker's Allowance. Thereafter, entitlement to the Allowance is reviewed at fortnightly interviews. We also use these opportunities to offer jobseekers further advice and help in their search for work. Jobseekers are also asked to attend a Restart interview at regular six monthly intervals at which they are offered further advice and information about employment and training opportunities. Beyond this, interviews may take place for a variety of other reasons.

Questions about a jobseeker's entitlement to Jobseeker's Allowance could arise at any of the interviews referred to above. In these instances there may be a reference to a Sector Decision Maker (formerly an Adjudication Officer) for a decision on benefit entitlement.

Statistics on the number and types of decisions given by Employment Service Decision Makers on labour market questions are recorded in a quarterly summary—the 'Analysis of Sector Decision Making' (formerly known as the 'Analysis of Adjudication Officers' Decisions'), a copy of which is held in the Library. As questions about a person's entitlement can arise during different types of interviews, it would be misleading to compare the total figures of disallowances with the total numbers of Employment Service interviews in any given period. Jobseeker's Allowance claims can be disallowed on labour market grounds or other grounds . However, some broad indication of volumes can be given by comparing the total number of Jobseeker's Allowance new claims with the number of awards of "nil benefits". This means simply the number of Jobseeker's Allowance new claims that, following assessment by the Benefits Agency who are responsible for Jobseeker's Allowance payment, result in no payment award. This could be for a wide variety of reasons ranging from inadequate contributions to failure to meet the labour market conditions for receipt of the Allowance.

Since Jobseeker's Allowance was introduced in October 1996, the number of claims processed and the number of nil awards by operational year has been:

	Claims processed	Nil awards
7 October 1996 to 31 March 1997	1,280,960	164,460
1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998	2,966,185	470,047
1 April 1998 to 31 March 1999	2,833,977	508,828
1 April 1999 to 31 October 1999	1,640,806	292,697

These figures are based primarily on information held by the Jobseeker's Allowance Payments System. The figures for the period ending 31 March 1997 include a small number of claims held on the Income Support Computer System because they linked back to an earlier Income Support claim.

I hope this is helpful.

Nursery Places

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he expects (a) the Government's target of free nursery places for 66 per cent. of three-year-olds to be met in every local education authority by 2002 and (b) levels of free provision to be higher than 66 per cent. in some areas by that date; and if he will make a statement. [101521]

Ms Hodge: The Government have set a target of providing a free education place for 66 per cent. of all three-year-olds nationally by 2002. We will achieve this as a result of investing £390 million over the three years 1999–2000 to 2001–02, in all local education authority areas. The funding will, however, priorities the areas with the greatest social needs

Many authorities have already invested their own resources to provide early education places for three-year-olds. The funding we are making available builds upon that and will extend provision across all authorities.

Classroom Assistants

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice he has issued to (a) primary schools and (b) local education authorities on (i) the employment of classroom assistants, (ii) extending their role within the classroom and (iii) providing incentives for classroom assistants to develop their knowledge and expertise in the fields of numeracy, literacy and record-keeping. [101705]

Ms Estelle Morris: A Supplement to the Standards Fund 2000–01 was issued on 27 October 1999. It advised Chief Education Officers of new arrangements to increase numbers of teaching assistants and to improve their training and career development. £130 million is being made available in 2000–01, enabling schools to recruit and train up to 15,000 additional full-time equivalent teaching assistants. LEAs must consult schools over relative local needs in deciding where assistants should be deployed.

The Department is developing a national framework of training and qualifications in partnership with the Local Government National Training Organisation and the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority. It is also producing guidance on the effective deployment of teaching assistants by heads and teachers. Both of these documents will be published next year following consultation with schools, local authorities and national bodies.

Local Education Authority Statistics

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list by local education authority the number and percentage of pupils eligible for free school meals in (a) 1996, (b) 1997, (c) 1998 and (d) 1999. [101520]

Ms Estelle Morris: The information available has been placed in the Library.

CABINET OFFICE

Magistrates

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what plans she has to transfer responsibility for the appointment of magistrates from the Duchy of Lancaster to the Lord Chancellor. [101484]

Marjorie Mowlam: Decisions on proposals to transfer responsibilities between Departments are for the Prime Minister.

Civil Service (Ethnic Minorities)

Ms Oona King: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what progress the Government have made in increasing the representation of ethnic minorities in the Civil Service. [101449]

Mr. Stringer: The "Modernising government" White Paper sets a target of doubling the proportion of people drawn from ethnic minority backgrounds in the Senior Civil Service to 3.2 per cent. in 2004–05. We will report on the progress we have made against these targets next year.

The proportion of ethnic minority staff in the Civil Service, as a whole, has increased from 4.2 per cent. in 1989 to 5.7 per cent. in 1998. This compares with 5.4 per cent. in the economically active population.

DEFENCE

Concordat (Scotland and Wales)

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will agree his concordat with the Scottish Executive and National Assembly for Wales. [102474]

Mr. Hoon: I have today agreed concordats with the Scottish Executive and the Welsh Assembly, which set out the principles governing our bilateral relationships. A copy of these has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Missiles

Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he plans to procure additional high velocity missiles from Shorts Missile Systems of Belfast. [102475]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I am pleased to announce that the Defence Procurement Agency has now signed a contract with Shorts Missile Systems for additional High Velocity Missiles for the Army. The contract is valued at around £200 million and will sustain around 550 jobs at Shorts Missile Systems, with a further 170 jobs also sustained across their sub-contractors in the United Kingdom.

Aircraft Wiring

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what aircraft have been delivered for the use of British forces containing (a) PVC/Nylon wiring, (b) Poly-X wiring and (c) Kapton wiring; when the aircraft were delivered; and what is their life expectancy; [100926]

(2) how many British military aircraft contain (a) PVC/Nylon wiring, (b) Poly-X wiring and (c) Kapton wiring; and if he will list the types and locations of the aircraft concerned. [101041]

Mr. Spellar: Listed are details of how many British military aircraft contain PVC/Nylon, Poly-X or Kapton wiring, together with the type and location of the aircraft concerned. Details are also provided about when the aircraft first entered service and their approximate life expectancy:

(a) PVC/Nylon wiring. Some 580 military aircraft contain PVC/Nylon wiring.

Type of aircraft	Main locations	Date first entered service	Life expectancy (approximate figures in years)
Bulldog	University Air Squadrons	1972	30
Dominie	Cranwell	1965	50
Jetstream	Cranwell/Culdrose/Yeovilton	1972	50
Hercules	Lyneham	1966	45
Hawk	Valley/Leeming/Boscombe Down	1976	35
Nimrod	Kinloss	1969	40
VC10	Brize Norton	1966	45
Canberra	Marham	1951	55
Sea King	Yeovilton/Prestwick/Culdrose/and on RN ships, RAF Search and Rescue Units	1969	45
Chinook	Odiham	1980	35
Puma	Benson and Aldergrove	1971	40
Gazelle	Wattisham/Disforth/Middle Wallop/Odiham/and other Army units	1974	45

Note:
Chinook are wired with a mixture of PVC/Nylon and PTFE (Poly Tetra Fluoro Ethylene).

(b) Poly-X wiring. No RAF aircraft contain Poly-X wiring. However, a small number of early Army and Royal Navy Lynx helicopters were delivered with Poly-X wiring. Few of these aircraft are now in service and much of the wiring on these will have been replaced during upgrades.

(c) Kapton wiring. Kapton is a trademarked material. It is one of a range of polyimide coverings used to insulate aircraft wires. Some 740 British military aircraft contain wiring of this type.

Type of aircraft	Main locations	Date first entered service	Life expectancy (approximate figures in years)
Tornado	Marham/Bruggen/Lossiemouth/Leeming/Coningsby/Leuchars/Mount Pleasant	1980	40
Tucano	Linton-on-Ouse	1989	20
Harrier	Wittering/Cottesmere	1987	30
Sentry	Waddington	1991	35
Tristar	Brize Norton	1984	30
Lynx	Yeovilton	1976	45
BAe125	Northolt	1983	35
BAe146	Northolt	1986	30

Ferry Subsidies

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what account he will take of allegations about unfair subsidies to South Korean shipyards using IMF loans when determining the outcome of the MOD competition for roll-on, roll-off ferries; and if he will make a statement. [100573]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Bids from four consortia to provide a strategic Sealift service are currently being assessed. The ships will be commercial standard roll-on, roll-off ferries, owned by the service provider. We have specifically asked bidders proposing overseas build to demonstrate that UK build would not be competitive on similar terms. If there is evidence of subsidies, this will be fully taken into account in our evaluation.

Inspector of Kilts

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to appoint a new Inspector of Kilts. [100903]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The Ministry of Defence has no such appointment and there are no plans to create one.

Anti-submarine Capability

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has made a re-assessment of the United Kingdom's anti-submarine requirements since the publication of the Strategic Defence Review. [101669]

Mr. Hoon: The United Kingdom's anti-submarine warfare capabilities are kept under constant review in order to ensure that we maintain appropriate and balanced maritime forces. Since its publication, there has been no reason to revise the conclusion of the Strategic Defence Review, which confirmed a continuing decline in the likelihood of an open-ocean anti-submarine threat on the scale previously envisaged.

Peacekeeping

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the conditions under which the United Kingdom stands ready to provide destroyers and frigates for peacekeeping operations, as agreed in the Memorandum of Understanding signed with the United Nations; and if he will make a statement. [101672]

Mr. Hoon: The decision to commit any of the forces declared to the UN in the Memorandum of Understanding remains a national one taken on a case-by-case basis. Factors that will be taken into consideration when deciding whether to contribute to a specific UN peacekeeping operation include the aim of the operation, a clear exit strategy, the safety of UK personnel, and the level of other commitments.

Low Flying

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment his Department has made of the effectiveness of low level flying training in the United Kingdom in the light of experience in Kosovo. [101502]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Low flying remains an important military tactic. While the circumstances in Kosovo were such that there was no requirement for fast jets to fly at low level, that might not be the case in future operations elsewhere. Regularly carrying out practice sorties within the UK Low Flying System remains the most effective way to ensure aircrew have the high levels of readiness necessary to take part in operations at low level, should the need arise.

Arms Brokers

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to maintain an arms broker company list; and if he will make a statement. [101926]

Mr. Kilfoyle: We have no plans at present to maintain a list of arms broker companies.

Ballistic Missile Programme

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies he is undertaking of theatre ballistic missile defence against land mobile missiles; and what is his target date for putting a theatre ballistic missile defence system into service. [102139]

Mr. Hoon: The Strategic Defence Review concluded that the technologies related to ballistic missile defence are changing rapidly and it would be premature to decide on acquiring such a capability. This remains our policy. We continue, however, to monitor developments in the risks posed by ballistic missiles and in the technology to counter them, and we are contributing to NATO preparations for studies into the feasibility of theatre ballistic missile defence. The terms of reference for our national programme of studies were announced by my predecessor, now Lord Robertson, on 27 July 1999, Official Report, column 203W. These studies include issues concerned with defending against land-based, mobile, theatre ballistic missiles, as will the studies to be undertaken by NATO.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Alan Keen: To ask the President of the Council when she will publish the latest results of the market research tracking public perception of the millennium bug. [102535]

Mrs. Beckett: I have placed copies of the Executive Summary of the October tracking research in the Libraries of the House.

The latest results are broadly consistent with those for previous months, showing that anxiety among the public on this issue remains low.

The results of the November tracking research will be published in the next few weeks and I will place copies of the Executive Summary in the Libraries of the House as soon as they are available.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Line of Route

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee when she expects the Committee to publish its revised proposals for re-opening the Line of Route during the Summer Adjournment. [102143]

Mrs. Roe: I am pleased to advise the hon. Member that the Committee has now agreed new proposals, which will be published in the Committee's First Report of Session 1999–2000, entitled "Revised Framework for Re-opening the Line of Route during the Summer Adjournment". The Report, HC(1999–2000)98, will be published at 11.00 am on 13 December, and will be available to hon. Members in the Vote Office at that time.

In view of his interest in this matter, I have arranged for a copy of the Report to be sent to the hon. Member.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pension Funds

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will introduce legislation to prohibit companies from using existing pension funds to fund future pension responsibilities. [100599]

Mr. Rooker: Decisions relating to the present and future management of occupational pension schemes are matters for the sponsoring employers and the trustees of the schemes, taking into account the requirements of the law and the trust deed and rules of the schemes. We will continue to monitor developments, but we have no plans to change legislation in this area.

Bilateral Concordat (Scotland)

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish the bilateral concordat between his Department and the Scottish Executive. [102473]

Mr. Darling: I am pleased to announce that the First Minister and I have agreed the text of the concordat between the Department of Social Security and the Scottish Executive. Copies of the concordat have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses and the text will be available on the departmental website.

Income Thresholds

Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the rates from April 2000 of income thresholds used for non-dependant deductions in housing benefit, income support and jobseeker's allowance, the earnings limit for dependants living with claimants of retirement pension, long-term incapacity benefits, severe disablement allowance and unemployability supplement, and the personal expenses allowance for claimants of jobseeker's allowance resident in local authority part III accommodation. [102742]

Mr. Darling: The income thresholds proposed for non-dependant deductions is as follows:

Income threshold

Up to £81.00

£81.00 to £119.99

£120.00 to £156.99

£157.00 to £206.99

£207.00 to £258.99

£259 and above.

The earnings limit proposed for dependants living with claimants of Retirement Pension, long-term incapacity benefits, severe disablement allowance and unemployability supplement is £52.20.

The proposed personal expenses allowance for claimants of Jobseeker's Allowance resident in local authority part III accommodation is £15.45.

Note:

This answer corrects errors in the original schedule of benefit rates, 10 November 1999, Official Report, columns 564–78W.

Means-tested Benefits

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) on 29 November 1999, Official Report, column 13, by how much below 3.5 million he expects the number of pensioners on means-tested benefits will be reduced by 2050 as a result of the proposals in the Green Paper on the stakeholder pension and the second state pension. [102064]

Mr. Rooker: By 2050, it is estimated that there will be around 15.8 million pensioners. Without a change to current policies it is estimated that approximately one in three pensioner units (which could be either a single person or a couple) would retire onto the means-tested minimum income guarantee. This would include some people who had worked or cared for someone throughout their working life.

The proposals in the Government's Green Paper "Partnership in Pensions" are designed to ensure that someone with a full working life, or years covered by credits, will receive a pension on retirement above the minimum income guarantee.

The impact of the proposals will depend on a variety of factors, including employment records and additional voluntary savings. Our proposals seek to promote behavioural changes through the spread of low cost funded second pensions, improved pensions education, and the greater reward in retirement from helping people under pension age move from benefits to work.

For instance, with additional voluntary savings of 5 per cent., the figure of one in three pensioner units retiring onto the minimum income guarantee would fall to approximately one in five in 2050.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) of 29 November 1999, Official Report, column 7W, on means-tested benefits, if he will break down respectively the 8 million on means-tested benefits in 1997 and the 7.9 million expected to be on means-tested benefits (a) by those above or below pensionable age and (b) of those below pensionable age, the proportion in receipt of in-work benefits. [102062]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the tables.

The proportion of people above and below age 60, in receipt of one or more means-tested benefits as at May 1997

	Number
Proportion under age 60	60% (4.8 million)
Proportion age 60 and over	40% (3.2 million)
Proportion under age 60 in receipt of in-work benefits	16%

The estimated proportion of people in receipt of one or more means tested benefits or tax credits as for 2001–02

	Number
Proportion under age 60	64% (5.0 million)
Proportion age 60 and over	36% (2.9 million)
Proportion under age 60 in receipt of in-work benefits	26%

Notes:

1. Means-tested benefits are Income Support, Income Based Jobseeker's Allowance, Family Credit, Disability Working Allowance, Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit. Working Families Tax Credit is included for the 2001–02 estimates.
2. Figures are rounded to the nearest 100,000.
3. Figures refer to benefit units which may be a single person or couple.
4. Overlap between benefits have been taken into account.
5. Council Tax Benefit cases do not include second adult rebate cases.
6. Sample sizes:

Income Support: 5 per cent.

Family Credit: 5 per cent.

Disability Working Allowance: 100 per cent.

Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit: 1 per cent.

7. Proportion under age 60 in receipt of in-work benefits is based on numbers receiving Family Credit and Disability Working Allowance for 1997 and Working Families Tax Credit and Disabled Persons Tax Credit for 2001–02. In order to compare the years on the same basis, it excludes those in work receiving Housing Benefit and/or Council Tax Benefit only, as forecasts isolating this particular group are not available for 2001–02 figures (such recipients are included in the overall totals).

Benefits (Automated Credit Transfer)

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 29 November 1999, Official Report, column 54W, in each of the last 12 months, how many (a) existing beneficiaries have chosen to switch to automated credit transfer (ACT) as a proportion of those claiming each of the benefits payable by ACT and (b) new claimants as a proportion of those claiming each of the benefits payable by ACT have chosen to use ACT. [101938]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Information on the number of existing claimants who have chosen to switch to Automated Credit Transfer (ACT) is not currently available. Overall growth in the number of claimants choosing ACT increases by approximately 3 per cent. annually.

The proportion of new claimants choosing ACT for the year ending 30 August 1999

Benefit	ACT take-up percentage
Attendance Allowance	26
Child Benefit	54
Disability Living Allowance	33
Income Support	10
Incapacity Benefit	39
Retirement Pension and Widows Pension	48
War Pensions	50

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Housing

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of high concentrations of houses in multiple occupation on local communities. [101050]

Mr. Mullin: I am aware of concerns that have arisen in a few town and city neighbourhoods and am considering how these might be tackled. The Government are committed to introducing mandatory licensing of houses in multiple occupation when parliamentary time allows.

London Airports (Passengers)

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the effect on the number of passengers passing through London airports in 2015, based on the recent studies of the European Commission and assuming all EU countries applied a similar rate of tax, if a fuel tax on all airlines were imposed (a) at a rate of ecu 245 per 1,000 litres and (b) at the same rate as motor fuel excise (excise duty and VAT) in the UK. [101807]

Mr. Mullin: We are currently reviewing the Commission's recent Communication and related study. We are also working, through the International Civil Aviation Organisation, to examine a range of market based options to limit or reduce emissions from aviation. It would be premature to focus on the effects of specific rates of tax on numbers of passengers at the London airports: no such proposals have been made.

Education Standard Spending Assessment

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the expected SSA per pupil is for (a) primary and (b) secondary pupils for each shire county education authority for the year 2000–01. [101829]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The information requested is in the table.

Farm-based Waste Recycling

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what planning guidance he gives to local authorities on the development of sites for deep clamp processing in farm-based waste recycling. [101673]

Ms Beverley Hughes: There is no planning guidance relating specifically to the development of sites for deep clamp processing of farm-based waste recycling. General guidance on planning control over waste management facilities, including composting sites, is contained in PPG10. Guidance on development related to agriculture and to farm diversification is contained in PPG7.

Community Sports Clubs

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what encouragement he gives to local authorities to give rate relief to community sports clubs; what statistics he collects in this regard; and if he will make a statement. [101721]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Local authorities have full discretion to award up to 100 per cent. rate relief to non-profit making organisations, including sports clubs that meet the qualifying criteria. The Central Council of Physical Recreation estimates that there are 150,000 voluntary sports clubs affiliated to the national governing bodies of sport in the United Kingdom. However, we do not hold centrally information on the number of clubs subject to non-domestic rates, their rateable values or their rates bills reflecting discretionary relief awarded by local authorities.

We have been reviewing the arrangements under which local authorities may grant this relief to non-profit making sports clubs and expect to issue a consultation paper early next year.

Homelessness

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for each district and unitary authority in (i) the South East Region and (ii) the Eastern Region, how many people were (a) registered homeless and (b) on the local authority waiting list for the last and current financial years. [101826]

Mr. Mullin: Homeless households accepted by local authorities are those which, after investigation, were found to be eligible for assistance, unintentionally homeless and in priority need under part VII of the Housing Act 1996. The latest available information is given in the table, covering 1998–99 and the first quarter of 1999–2000 for homeless households.

Housing Investment Programme returns 1999 and Quarterly PIE (Homelessness Activity) returns 1999 Q1

Local authorities have different practices for compiling and managing housing register/waiting lists which mean that simple comparisons between authorities can be misleading.

Vehicle Removal

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will consult police and local authorities about amending paragraph 10 of the Removal and Disposal of Vehicles Regulations 1986 (SI 1986/183) so as to reduce the period before which notice must be affixed to vehicles about to be removed for destruction from seven to three days. [101719]

Mr. Mullin: We have no plans to consult the police or local authorities on changing the period of notice they must give before removing abandoned vehicles. The existing regulations are intended to provide owners with safeguards against a local authority prematurely assuming a vehicle is abandoned and having it towed away for scrap. They also ensure that local authorities do not have to go to the unnecessary expense of removing and storing vehicles that may not, in the event, have been abandoned.

We believe that the current legislation provides a good balance between the powers of the police and local authorities to deal with abandoned vehicles and the rights of vehicle owners.

Shropshire RSG

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in which years between 1979 and 1999 the Government's revenue support grant for Shropshire County Council increased by double the rate of inflation or more. [102137]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Revenue Support Grant (RSG) was introduced in 1990. Between 1990–91 and 1992–93, Shropshire County Council received no RSG directly; the grant was paid into the collection funds operated by billing authorities, and thus supported expenditure by all tiers of authorities.

Only in 1994–95 was the increase in RSG of 11.06 per cent. more than twice the rate of inflation of 1.43 per cent., as measured by the GDP deflator. The increase in 1999–2000 in RSG and the county's share of national non-domestic rates of 6.01 per cent. was also more than twice the rate of inflation of 2.25 per cent. The change in RSG was affected in 1995–96 by the transfer of the RSG for police service to West Mercia Police Authority and in 1998–99 by the creation of Telford and the Wrekin as a separate unitary authority, thus precluding meaningful comparisons for those years.

Thameslink 2000 Project

Mr. Fitzpatrick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on Railtrack's applications for Orders under the Transport and Works Act 1992 in respect of the Thameslink 2000 Project. [102136]

Mr. Hill: Railtrack applied in September 1999 for an Order under the Transport and Works Act 1992 to revise the proposals contained in the November 1997 application for powers to improve and extend the Thameslink network. The Secretary of State has received a total of about 1,000 objections to both applications. In view of the range and nature of the objections he has decided that it would be appropriate to hold a public inquiry into this scheme. This will probably start in the spring of 2000.

Foreign Aircraft (Millennium)

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he is taking relating to foreign aircraft operating to the UK over the Millennium period. [102448]

Mr. Hill: My Department has issued foreign airlines with their normal operating permits for providing services to and from the UK. These permits are granted to airlines only if they comply with international safety standards. In view of the Y2K problem, my Department has taken the exceptional step of asking airlines to provide information confirming that flights would be free from any Y2K safety related risk. The airlines have been advised that, in the event of such information not being provided, the Department reserves the right to suspend their permits over the critical period.

Two airlines have yet to provide confirmation that their flights will be free from any Y2K safety related risk. These are Gulf Air; and Southern Aviation (Zambia). These airlines have therefore been advised that, unless such confirmation is received, their permits to operate to the UK over the Millennium period will be suspended.

Non-domestic Rates

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set out the basis of his calculations of the distributable amount of non-domestic rates for 2000–01. [102548]

Ms Armstrong: The amount of non-domestic rates in England for 2000–01 to be redistributed to Local Authorities will be £15,400 million, although estimated payments into the pool in 2000–01 will be £14,342 million. The non-domestic rate poundage (multiplier) will be 41.6 pence. The Distributable Amount includes an allowance of £415 million for an Exchequer payment to the non-domestic rates pool, to compensate for the shortfall which would otherwise occur as a result of the regulations under section 58 of the Local Government Finance Act 1988 and the transitional relief scheme, announced on 25 November 1999, Official Report, column 770.

The calculation for 2000–01, and the prior-year figures on which this is based, are set out in the following table.

Notes:
The amounts shown are those recorded in the post end-year (NNDR3) returns. For 1999–2000 the amounts shown are the estimated outturn for the year based mainly upon authorities' provisional contributions to the non-domestic rating pool.
1. Item 1: The gross calculated rate yield represents the total value of non-domestic hereditaments on local rating lists times the multiplier.
2. Item 1(i)(a): The Transitional decrease adjustment includes the estimated amount of rates that will not be recouped from local list ratepayers under the transitional arrangements made by regulations under section 58 of the Local Government Finance Act 1988 and the transitional relief scheme, announced by written PQ on 25 November 1999, Official Report, column 770W.
3. Item 1(i)(b): The empty property relief adjustments include voids and partially occupied hereditaments. The 2000–01 figure includes an allowance for the increase in the gross rates yield.
4. Item 1(i)(c): Charitable rate relief. The 2000–01 figure includes an allowance for the increase in the gross rates yield.
5. Item 1(i)(d): Rural Shops and Post Office relief. Figures for 1998–99 onwards include mandatory relief for village shops and post offices under the Local Government and Rating Act 1997. The 2000–01 figure includes an allowance for the increase in the gross rates yield.
6. Item 1(i)(e): Discretionary relief granted to charities, non-profit making organisations and for other reasons including, for 1998–99 onwards, discretionary relief for village shops and post offices under the Local Government and Rating Act 1997. The 2000–01 figure includes an allowance for the increase in the gross rates yield.
7. Item 1(ii)(a) and (b): The allowances for the costs and losses incurred by authorities in collecting non-domestic rates from ratepayers.
8. Item 1(ii)(c): City Offset—the amount which the City of London will not be required to pay into the non-domestic rating pool. It is the amount which will be retained by the City to meet its own expenditure.
9. Item 1(iii): net adjustment in respect of appeals and other amendments to the rating list affecting liability for previous years rates settled in that year.
10. Item 2: the rateable value of non-domestic hereditaments on the central rating list times the multiplier, less the net effect of transitional arrangements, and adjusted for appeals and other changes in respect of previous years.
11. Item 3: the 2000–01 figure for Crown properties includes an allowance for the effect of transitional arrangements.
12. Item 4: the contribution from central government to offset the amount of the Secretary of State's estimate of income forgone as a result of transitional arrangements established by regulations under section 58 of the Local Government Finance Act 1988 and the transitional relief scheme, announced by written PQ on 25 November 1999, Official Report, column 770W.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

GCSE Passes

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list by local education authority the number and percentage of 18-year-olds with five GCSE passes or equivalent in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999. [101519]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 8 December 1999]: The numbers of 18-year-olds with five GCSE passes or equivalent in 1997 and 1998 for local education authorities in England are shown in the following table. Figures for 1999, other than those released last month in performance tables, are not yet available. It is not possible to provide percentages as these may be misleading—population estimates for local education authorities are based on the resident population, and the GCSE data are institution based. Percentages for individual local education authorities would therefore be distorted by students who are resident in one authority but who took their GCSEs in another.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Working Time Directive

4. Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, what assessment he has made of employment agencies compliance with the Working Time Directive. [100527]

Mr. Alan Johnson: It is too soon to assess the level of compliance. Our revised employment agency regulations will help prevent bureaux acting in a way which denies workers their working time rights.

20. Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which EU member states have exempted small businesses from the Working Time Regulations. [100546]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Working Time Directive which has been implemented in Great Britain by the Working Time Regulations, requires member states to extend its provisions to all businesses regardless of size. Only workers in the excluded sectors (transport, doctors in training and offshore) are exempt.

Miners Compensation

15. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his estimate is of the number of miners compensation claims which have been agreed. [100541]

32. Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the number of compensation claims from retired miners that have been settled. [100561]

Mrs. Liddell: As at the end of November, the Department had made 4,186 full and final payments and 5,523 part payments to ex-miners suffering from Vibration White Finger. A further 584 full and final payments and 15,460 part payments have been made to ex-miners and their families suffering from respiratory diseases. To date the Department has made payments totalling some £89 million.

Inward Investment (Merseyside)

16. Maria Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on inward investment to Merseyside. [100542]

Mr. Caborn: Since May 1997 my Department has made 255 offers of Regional Selective Assistance in the Merseyside area, including 31 offers to overseas companies, creating or safeguarding nearly 18,000 jobs. Major inward investment successes have included Capital Bank and the new Jaguar X400 saloon.

Small Businesses

17. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many rules and regulations have been repealed since May 1997 by his Department to assist small businesses. [100543]

Ms Hewitt: Between May 1997 and October 1999 my Department made 25 regulations that reduced costs on business, including small business.

We have taken many other actions to assist small businesses. For example, we have introduced legislation on late payment, we are setting up the Small Business Service, and we are consulting on proposals to raise the thresholds below which small companies are exempt from requirements to file full accounts and to have those accounts audited.

31. Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to encourage technical innovation in small businesses. [100560]

Ms Hewitt: As indicated in the consultation document, "The Small Business Service—A Public Consultation" (URN 99/815), I intend to improve the coherence and customer-focus of my Department's support for small businesses by making most such support accessible through the Small Business Service. In addition, I have already announced that the Smart scheme has been expanded to a commitment of over £100 million over the period 1999–2000 to 2001–02 and its scope enlarged so that now even more small businesses will benefit from cash support for technology development and acquisition. The new Enterprise Fund will provide regional and high-tech venture capital funds for start-ups and small companies with growth potential. Also, my Department's funding for the TCS scheme is being doubled and we are creating a national network of Faraday Partnerships designed to support knowledge transfer to small businesses in particular.

Energy Policy

18. Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Government's energy policy. [100544]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government's overall energy policy objective, as set out in last year's White Paper, "Conclusions of the Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation and Government Response to fourth and fifth Reports of the Trade and Industry Committee" (Cm 4071), is > "to ensure secure diverse, and sustainable supplies of energy at competitive prices".

British Coal (Equal Pay)

19. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action his Department is taking to achieve a settlement of the equal value pay case for British Coal canteen workers. [100545]

Mr. Alan Johnson: This litigation is a matter for British Coal.

Bankruptcy

21. Mr. Beard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has for reviewing the charges to small businesses and individuals arising from bankruptcy proceedings. [100547]

Ms Hewitt: The Working Party on the remuneration of insolvency office holders, chaired by Mr. Justice Ferris, submitted an initial report in July 1998 and, subsequently, the Society of Practitioners of Insolvency issued interim guidance on the information to be provided to creditors on applications for remuneration. A final report from Mr. Justice Ferris's Working Party is expected to be published in the new year.

Balance of Trade

22. Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the latest announcement on the balance of trade. [100549]

Mr. Caborn: In the three months to September, the deficit on trade in goods and services was at its narrowest for almost a year. The volume of goods and services exported grew by over 6 per cent., the fastest rate of growth for 20 years.

EH101 Helicopter

23. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the royalties to be received by his Department as a result of Launch Aid upon sales of the EH101 helicopter. [100550]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Launch investment returns depend on the level of sales of each product in which the Government have invested. Information about possible levies arising from individual projects is commercially confidential.

Levies have not yet been received on the civil version of the EH101 helicopter.

Recruitment Industry

24. Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress he has made in his discussions with the Treasury over proposals to regulate the private recruitment industry. [100551]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Discussions with HM Treasury and other Departments on the proposed revision of the regulations governing agency conduct are continuing. We will make an announcement in due course.

Manufacturing

25. Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the prospects for profitability and volume of exports of the manufacturing sector. [100552]

Mr. Caborn: In 1998 the profitability of manufacturing companies was at the highest level for 30 years and surveys by British Chambers of Commerce show confidence in manufacturing profitability at its highest level for over two years. Export growth has picked up sharply, with the latest figures showing that export volumes in the third quarter rose by 9.6 per cent., the fastest rate of growth for 20 years. Most economic forecasters expect this improvement to continue into next year.

29. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the Staffordshire chamber of commerce and industry to discuss the manufacturing industry. [100557]

Ms Hewitt: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry had a very useful meeting on 15 November 1999 with the North Staffordshire Chamber of Commerce, of which the Staffordshire Chamber is a division.

During his visit he had wide-ranging discussions covering manufacturing industry and also visited two manufacturing businesses in the county.

Home Safety (Children)

27. Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to improve child safety in the home. [100554]

Dr. Howells: The safety of toys and other articles used by children feature prominently in product safety standards, and the regulations which my Department administers.

In addition, the DTI produces and distributes safety awareness materials free of charge to local authorities and other safety professionals on a wide range of home safety topics, many of which are designed to help to reduce accidents to children.

I launched the first in a series of child safety magazines on 24 November, jointly produced by Government, business and the voluntary sector, for expectant parents and parents of babies and young children and strongly featuring child safety in the home.

I also launched Child Safety Week in June 1999, an initiative aimed at reducing accidents to children which DTI helped fund, run by the Child Accident Prevention Trust.

Cluster Development

28. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to ensure that cluster development is evenly distributed across the UK. [100556]

Ms Hewitt: None. The Government attach considerable importance to clusters and recently announced new mechanisms for taking forward the development of their clusters policy. These include a new Clusters Policy Steering Group to be chaired by my noble Friend Lord Sainsbury, the Minister for Science; a full mapping study of cluster activity in the UK and the identification and promotion of emerging clusters in the RDA's regional economic strategies. The Government believe that clusters are market driven. As such, the Governments's key role is to create the conditions, in all parts of the UK, which encourage the formation and sustainable growth of clusters and enable and nurture progress.

EU Directives

30. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department is taking to monitor implementation of EU directives relating to trade and industry matters in other member states. [100558]

Mrs. Liddell: The Department monitors the implementation of EU Single Directives in other member states through the European Commission's publication "The Single Market Scoreboard" and through contacts with UK industry and the Commission . The Scoreboard is published twice a year and is a very useful monitoring mechanism on the health of the Single Market. The Scoreboard, which is available in the House of Commons Library, includes a section covering rates of transposition of Directives in all EU states. The Scoreboard is regularly discussed at the Internal Market Council. We also, through our action Single Market unit, pursue individual complaints from UK industry with the member state in question and with the Commission.

Recruitment Costs

33. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evidence he has assessed that temporary to permanent fees discourage employers from offering a permanent job to a temporary worker. [100562]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Department has received representations from work-seekers, unions, employment agencies and employers that these fees can discourage employers from taking on temporary workers permanently.

National Minimum Wage

34. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will review the level of the national minimum wage. [100563]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I am keeping the operation of the national minimum wage legislation under review with the help of the independent Low Pay Commission. As with its introduction, any future change to the level of the minimum wage will be made sensibly, taking account of the economic circumstances prevailing at the time.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many anonymous calls have been made to the minimum wage hotline giving information relating to breaches of the minimum wage legislation. [101479]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The National Minimum Wage Helpline does not disaggregate calls between anonymous and non-anonymous calls. All calls are followed up. In addition, a number of employers are phoning the helpline to tell us about their competitors who are paying below the national minimum wage. These calls are also followed up.

International Postal Services

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of international postal services. [100553]

Mr. Alan Johnson: With increased globalisation, the international market in postal services is forecast to grow much faster than domestic markets. Success in these areas will depend on ability to develop and sustain high quality, competitively priced products and services in response to changing and fast-moving customer demand, developments in new technology and ever-increasing competition. That is why this Government have made it a priority to give the Post Office the greater commercial freedom it needs to be a world-class service provider in the twenty first century.

EU Company Law Directive (Takeover Bids)

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress of the 13th company law directive concerning takeover bids. [101605]

Mr. Byers: Political agreement was reached on the proposed 13th Company Law Directive at the Internal Market Council in June this year, with the exception of one point, a Spanish objection concerning the application of the directive to Gibraltar. Since then Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Spain have been negotiating a solution to this question.

Energy Council

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the outcome of the Energy Council held in Brussels on 2 December; and if he will make a statement. [101691]

Mrs. Liddell: The Council considered several matters of interest to the United Kingdom.

The Commission made two presentations on the Internal electricity market. The first concerned progress on implementation of the electricity directive and the second harmonisation measures in electricity which look at cross border trading issues in respect of transmission pricing and congestion. As regards the implementation report, I expressed disappointment that the Directive had not been implemented in all member states and stressed the importance of a level playing field which ensured fairness for everyone. I also congratulated the Commission on taking prompt action against those which had not implemented the directive. I said that fully open energy markets in Europe was a high priority for the UK because this would increase the competitiveness of European companies and reduce prices for consumers. I also called for progress far beyond the market opening levels set out in the Directive. On the harmonisation of cross border trading mechanisms the Council agreed conclusions which note the work of the transmission system operators to develop transmission pricing mechanisms and procedures for managing congestion; encourage them to come forward with early proposals for a resolution of outstanding issues and invite the Commission to monitor progress and to come forward with its own proposals if the system operators are unable to reach a final agreement. I announced that the UK and the Netherlands are working on competition indicators to show how well competition is developing and where barriers persist. The results of this work will be shared with the Commission and other member states.

In the absence of a proposal from the Commission on the access for renewables to the internal electricity market, the Council was unable to have a full exchange of views. I expressed disappointment at the continued delay and urged the Commission to come forward with a proposal as soon as possible. I said such a proposal should minimise distortions, ensure transparency, provide flexibility to distinguish between different kinds of renewables and promote cost-effectiveness and price competitiveness and that we supported the Commission in its objectives of promoting renewables as part of the response to Kyoto and the progressive inclusion of renewables in the internal electricity market. I was among a number of ministers who counselled against the inclusion of binding targets for renewables in the directive, this being a matter best left to member states, thereby respecting the principle of subsidiary.

The Council agreed a report to the Helsinki European Council on integration of environmental and sustainable development into energy policy which focused on priority areas for action, which include the development of the internal energy market and the promotion of renewables and energy efficiency measures.

In addition, the Energy Council held an orientation debate on a proposal for a directive on energy efficiency requirements of ballasts for fluorescent lighting aimed at raising product standards in Europe. Council conclusions were approved on strengthening the northern dimension of European energy policy with a view to improving co-ordination of actions between countries bordering the Baltic Sea and on the North West Region of Russia and to help provide greater focus for EU support mechanisms.

The Council also note reports on gas harmonisation, gas security of supply, a progress report on the energy Charter Treaty including a negotiating directive for a transit protocol and information from the Commission on the millennium bug and a Community energy efficiency action plan.

Energy Suppliers

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures are being taken to prevent energy suppliers taking over the electricity and gas contracts of customers without their authority; and what penalties are proposed for those companies that do so. [101908]

Mrs. Liddell: These matters are the responsibility of the Director General of Gas and Electricity Supply. I am aware that Ofgem is continuing to work hard with the industry to tighten up the transfer process.

My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State has recently announced a research study to look at consumer motivations for and against switching supplier.

Pirate Radio Stations

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people and organisations have been prosecuted in each of the last three years for (a) advertising on and (b) sponsoring pirate radio stations. [102033]

Ms Hewitt: So far this year three people have been prosecuted for managing the operation of pirate radio stations. In 1998 one person was similarly convicted and a further three in 1997. One of those convicted this year and one of those in 1997 were also convicted for advertising.

Regulatory Impact Assessments

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has undertaken of the effect of regulations affecting businesses on operating costs. [100537]

Mr. Byers: The Government require an assessment to be carried out on all proposed regulations that might affect business before they are introduced.

British Sugar (Gas-fired Power Station)

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his decision on British Sugar plc's application to build a new gas-fired power station at the British Sugar factory at Cantley, Norfolk. [102573]

Mrs. Liddell: I have today granted consent under Section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to British Sugar plc for the construction of a 70 MW gas-fired combined heat and power station at the British Sugar factory at Cantley, near Norwich in Norfolk. The station has also today been given clearance as a gas-fired station under Section 14 of the Energy Act 1976 and planning permission for the Development has been deemed to be granted, subject to 37 planning conditions agreed with the Broads Authority, Broadland District Council and Norfolk County Council. The decisions have been taken in accordance with the policy set out in the White Paper entitled "Conclusions of the Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation and Government response to fourth and fifth Reports of the Trade and Industry Committee" (Cm 4071).

Copies of the Press Notice and decision letters are being placed in the Library of the House.

EU Structural Funds

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to publish the bilateral Concordat between UK Government Departments and the Scottish Executive on EU Structural Funds. [102574]

Mr. Byers: The First Minister and I have today agreed the text of a Concordat on the EU Structural Funds between the UK Government Departments DTI, DETR, DfEE, MAFF and DCMS and the Scottish Executive. Copies of the Concordat have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Research and Development

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of Britain's gross domestic product was devoted to research and development on the latest available figures; and what the equivalent figure was for other G7 countries. [100530]

Ms Hewitt: In 1997, the latest year for which figures are available, the UK's gross expenditure on research and development (GERD) was £14.6 billion. This represented 1.87 per cent. of GDP.

The table shows comparative G7 figures.

1997 GERD as a percentage of GDP

Young Business People

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to encourage young business people to become world-class entrepreneurs. [100548]

Ms Hewitt: The creation of the Small Business Service will ensure world-class support for developing small business. The Enterprise Fund improves access to finance and the recently announced Phoenix Fund will stimulate the development of enterprise in deprived areas.

The DTI supports Young Enterprise and is committed to work with YE and private sector companies to develop the Company Programme model into Higher Education with a view to encouraging young people to consider setting up their own business.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Firearms

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will lay before Parliament the tenth annual report of the Firearms Consultative Committee. [102606]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have placed a copy of the annual report of the Firearms Consultative Committee in the Library.

Terrorism Legislation

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish a summary of the responses to the consultation paper, "Legislation against Terrorism". [102607]

Mr. Straw: I have today published a summary analysis of the responses to the consultation paper "Legislation against Terrorism". Copies of this have been placed in the Library and the Vote Office.

Scottish Devolution

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the bilateral concordat between his Department and the Scottish Executive. [102609]

Mr. Straw: I am pleased to announce that my officials have agreed the text of a bilateral concordat with their counterparts in the Scottish Executive. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Hunting with Dogs

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce the full membership and terms of reference of the inquiry into hunting with dogs in England and Wales. [102608]

Mr. Straw: The full membership of the Committee of Inquiry into Hunting with Dogs in England and Wales will be as follows:

The Chairman will be the noble Lord Burns, as already announced. Dr. Victoria Edwards, Professor Sir John Marsh, the noble Lord, Lord Soulsby of Swaffham Prior and Professor Michael Winter have agreed to serve as members.

The Terms of Reference are:

To inquire into:

the practical aspects of different types of hunting with dogs and its impact on the rural economy, agriculture and pest control, the social and cultural life of the countryside, the management and conservation of wildlife, and animal welfare in particular areas of England and Wales;

the consequences for these issues of any ban on hunting with dogs;

how any ban might be implemented; and to report the findings to the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Biographical Details of Members are:

Lord Burns—formerly Permanent Secretary to Her Majesty's Treasury (1991–98), and Chief Economic Adviser to the Treasury and Head of the Government Economic Service (1980–91).

Dr. Victoria Edwards FRICS FAAV—Principal lecturer in Land Management and Departmental Research Director, University of Portsmouth (since 1989); Non-executive Board Member: Countryside Agency (since 1998) and Forestry Commission (1999) and Member, Advisory Councils of, School of Rural Economy and Land Management, Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester (since 1996).

Professor Sir John Marsh CBE—Emeritus Professor of Agricultural Economics, University of Reading, Department of Agricultural and Food Economics (since 1997); Member of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food Minister's Independent Advisory Group (since 1997); Chairman, Agricultural Wages Board (1991–99) and Director of the Centre for Agricultural Strategy (1990–97).

Jury Trial

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many and what percentage of defendants who opted for trial by jury in either-way offences and pleaded guilty at the Crown court were committed together with co-defendants who contested indictments at the Crown court, in the most recent year for which figures are available; [99562]

(2) how many and what percentage of defendants who opted for trial by jury in either-way offences and pleaded guilty in the Crown Court pleaded guilty to (a) charges or (b) counts different from those upon which they were committed, in the most recent year for which figures are available; [99563]

(3) how many and what percentage of defendants who opted for trial by jury in either-way offences and pleaded guilty at the Crown court received sentences at the Crown court which could not have been passed by the committing magistrates court, in the most recent year for which figures are available. [99561]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In 1998, 42 per cent. of the 40,000 defendants who pleaded guilty to either-way offences in the Crown court received sentences which could not have been passed by the committing magistrates courts. These figures relate both to cases directed by the magistrates and to those where the defendant has elected; it is not possible to separate them.

The other information requested is not collected centrally.

Departmental Estate

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his estimate is of the value of land and buildings, both leasehold and freehold, held by his core Department (i) in Scotland, (ii) in the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas and (iv) in total; and what is the value of (a) plant, machinery and vehicles, (b) IT and communications equipment and systems and (c) other taxable fixed assets. [99821]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 26 November 1999]: Currently, the core Home Office holds land and buildings, both leasehold and freehold, valued at £92,462,000, all of which are in England and Wales.

Plant, machinery and vehicles are valued at £12,077,000; Information Technology and communications systems and equipment are valued at £12,633,000; and other tangible fixed assets are valued at £7,368,000.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his estimate is of the value of land and buildings (i) in Scotland, (ii) in the United Kingdom, (iii) overseas and (iv) in total held by (a) the UK Passport Agency, (b) the Forensic Science Service, (c) the Fire Service College, (d) the Prison Service and (e) each of the non-departmental public bodies within his Department's responsibility; and what is the value of other assets held by these bodies. [99822]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 26 November 1999]: As of 31 March 1999, the estimates of the value of land and buildings and other assets held by the United Kingdom Passport Agency, the Forensic Science Service, the Fire Service College and the Prison Service are set out in the table. All land and buildings are held in England and Wales.

£000

	Land and buildings	Other assets
United Kingdom Passport Agency	—	1,646
Forensic Service College	16,227	12,207
Fire Service College	10,591	8,065
Prison Service	4,225,200	90,500

Unfortunately, information on assets held by the Home Office's non-departmental public bodies is not centrally available and will need to be collected. I will write to the hon. Member when the information is available to me.

Detention Centre, Oakington

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when planning permission was obtained for the proposed detention centre at Oakington; what conditions were attached to the permission by the planning authority; and which of those conditions his Department does not intend to accept. [101340]

Mrs. Roche: Planning permission was obtained from South Cambridgeshire District Council on 10 November 1999. The Council proposed the following "conditions":

After three years, the use will be discontinued unless in the third year the Secretary of State notifies to the Local Planning Authority the need for a further year (and so on on a yearly basis) and shall take account of representations made by the Local Planning Authority when any such extensions are proposed;

There shall not be accommodated at the Centre any persons known to have committed within the last five years any criminal offence which if committed in England and Wales would be an imprisonable offence;

There shall not be accommodated at the Centre any persons known to have an infectious, notifiable disease;

No detainee shall be allowed to leave the Centre other than under escort;

The site of the Centre shall not be extended nor anything built thereon without further consultation under Circular 18/84: Crown land and Crown development;

Detainees not deported will not be placed in South Cambridgeshire District;

The number of detainees shall not materially exceed 400; and

For so long as the Centre is in use, the Secretary of State shall cause to be set up a Local Liaison Committee consisting of Home Office representation, a representative of the operators, the Local Planning Authority and the local communities. The Local Liaison Committee shall meet as often as is requisite but at least annually to discuss, avoid and resolve any local community problems arising out of the use of the site as an immigration reception centre.

My officials will shortly be writing to South Cambridgeshire District Council to confirm Home Office acceptance of the planning issues and to indicate that we broadly agree with the other points.

Police Recruitment (Graduate Scheme)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the ethnic balance of successful candidates in the police accelerated scheme for graduates. [101600]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Graduate Liaison Office of Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary makes strenuous efforts to attract applications to the Accelerated Promotion Scheme for Graduates (APS(G)) from high calibre graduates, irrespective of background. However, there is still some way to go to improve the numbers and quality of ethnic minority candidates and their subsequent success at the various stages of the selection process.

The ethnic balance of the APS(G) was examined in the context of an ongoing review of the Scheme. A number of recommendations are under consideration including the way in which the Scheme is marketed, the possible appointment of a Graduate Liaison Officer with a specific responsibility for ethnic minority candidates, and the setting of targets for ethnic minority recruitment.

The Assessment and Consultancy Unit (ACU), which designs and monitors the final assessment centre selection for the scheme, has already let a contract for an Equal Opportunities audit of this part of the process. ACU is also committed to conducting follow-up research on candidates who do join the scheme, with a view to validating the selection process and informing the qualities which should be sought in good applicants from any background.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ensure that cultural questions facing Police Accelerated Scheme for Graduates candidates are not discriminatory. [101601]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Selection for the APS(G) involves several stages, with preliminary selection taking place in police forces. The Home Office issues guidance to all forces on the conduct of their Force Boards, with specific reference to ensuring fairness to all applicants.

The final assessment centre (known as the Extended Interview) involves a wide range of tests and exercises, designed to give every candidate maximum opportunity to demonstrate his or her competencies and also to promote maximum objectivity in assessment. All assessors receive training from the Assessment and Consultancy Unit for this task, and the Director and Co-Directors of Police Extended Interviews monitor the process to ensure consistent standards and fairness. Every effort is made to ensure that the questions and tests used are not unfair to any group of candidates. Before being used at assessment centres, new exercises are trialled with typical samples of the candidate population, including ethnic minority candidates.

A contract for an equal opportunities audit of the extended interview process has recently been let in order to obtain an independent assessment of the fairness of the process and to identify areas for further improvement.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the letters to him dated 9 August, 16 September and 14 October from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Briken Qinami. [101806]

Mrs. Roche: I am very sorry my right hon. Friend has not received a reply to his letters. I will be writing to him shortly.

National Black Police Association

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what message he sent to the inaugural meeting of the National Black Police Association. [101598]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I sent two messages of support to the inaugural meeting of the National Black Police Association. One was a written message that was printed in the conference programme. The other was a short video message, which was shown at the conference.

In both messages, I set out the Government's continued commitment to tackling racism and promoting equality of opportunity, as well as my support for the work and aims of the National Black Police Association.

I thanked the police service as a whole for the way in which they have responded quickly, not only to the message of the Lawrence report, but to the recommendations. I also sent my congratulations to the National Black Police Association for all they have achieved during the past 12 months. I made it clear that, if we are to achieve our shared vision; not only of a police service that is representative of the community it serves, but also one that positively celebrates within its ranks and attitudes the diversity of society, then we must all work together.

Road Accidents

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the contribution that modern technology can make to speedier on-the-scene accident analysis to reduce congestion after road collisions. [101683]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Work in this field, particularly on the use of precision photographic techniques from which precise accident measurements can be derived, is being taken forward by the police service.

Criminal Justice (Mentally Disordered People)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the National Schizophrenia Fellowship's reports "Picking up the Pieces: Mental Illness and the Criminal Justice System" and "The National Diversion/Liaison Scheme Register"; and if he will implement the recommendation that mental health awareness skills should be part of a minimum training package for all police officers. [100808]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government welcome the publication of these reports, which discuss important aspects of managing the response to mentally disordered people who come into contact with the criminal justice system. Effective local inter-agency arrangements around the country are essential if their needs are to be addressed properly. The Home Office and Department of Health are working together to encourage local agencies and services to develop the most suitable arrangements in the light of local circumstances. I understand that police officers in both the Metropolitan Police and other forces in England and Wales receive formal training on mental illness as part of their probationer training. It is open to chief officers to provide additional training on this subject if there is a particular need for it.

City Status

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects an announcement on which towns have been granted city status. [101967]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Her Majesty the Queen has said that she intends to mark the Millennium by a grant of city status and a competition was announced in May of this year with a closing date of 1 September. No date has yet been set for the announcement of the result.

Asylum Seekers

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the Scottish local authorities which have responded to his Department's request, for the purposes of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1999, to identify accommodation that they regard as suitable for asylum seekers; and if he will make a statement. [101707]

Mrs. Roche: Discussions are ongoing with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, with regard to identifying accommodation for asylum seekers in connection with the new arrangements for support under the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. Responses from individual local authorities are being treated as confidential at this stage.

Police Disciplinary Notices

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many senior police officers in Cleveland have been served with Regulation 6 disciplinary notices in connection with Operation Dollar; and if he will make a statement. [102090]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 6 December 1999, Official Report, column 392W.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Football

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the football matches which are in category A under Part IV of the Broadcasting Act 1996 as amended. [102096]

Janet Anderson: All matches in the finals tournament of the FIFA World Cup and the European Football Championships, the FA Cup Final and the Scottish FA Cup Final (in Scotland) were included as Group A events in the list of events maintained under Part IV of the Broadcasting Act 1996 which was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 25 June 1998, Official Report, column 601W. The revised list had effect from that day.

Lottery Terminals

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what discussions he had with the National Lottery Commission prior to the announcement that existing lottery terminals will be required to be replaced in the event of a new operator being appointed to run the national lottery; [102142]

(2) what estimate he has made of the cost of replacing all existing lottery terminals; [102141]

(3) what estimate he has made of the cost to the Good Causes Fund of writing off the value of existing lottery terminals. [102140]

Mr. Chris Smith: The decision to require the successful applicant for the new National Lottery licence to install new terminals was taken by the National Lottery Commission. I had a meeting with the National Lottery Commissioners on 29 November 1999 at which they briefed me on the contents of the announcement made the following day. The Commission is independent of Government and neither I, nor any other Minister, had any say in this decision.

The National Lottery Commission has a statutory responsibility to ensure that the National Lottery is run with all due propriety, to protect the interests of players, and subject to satisfying those two criteria, to maximise the amount the Lottery raises for good causes. The Commission took the view that a competition is the best way to ensure that the amount raised for good causes is maximised, and therefore insisted on new technology for National Lottery terminals to remove an obstacle to competition.

I have made no estimate of the cost of replacing the existing National Lottery terminals.

HEALTH

General Medical Council

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to improve Governmental supervision of the work of the General Medical Council. [100738]

Ms Stuart: We have stated our commitment to professional self-regulation of the healthcare professions, provided such arrangements can be modernised to offer patients appropriate protection.

We will work with the professions, the regulatory bodies, the National Health Service and patient representative groups to strengthen the existing systems of professional self-regulation by ensuring that they are open, responsive and publicly accountable.

The General Medical Council is making good progress in its proposals to introduce arrangements for the revalidation of doctors' registration. These will be underpinned in the NHS by arrangements for continued professional development announced in "A First Class Service" and the Chief Medical Officer's proposals for the annual appraisal of all NHS doctors announced in "Supporting doctors, protecting patients". The same document set out the modern principles of professional self-regulation against which the General Medical Council and other bodies will be judged.

Children in Care

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures the Government are taking to strengthen the role of the corporate parent to ensure that looked-after children reach their full potential. [100735]

Mr. Hutton: On 21 September 1998, we launched the £375 million three-year Quality Protects Programme which is designed to improve the management and delivery of children's social services. There is a particular emphasis on improving the life chances of children looked after by local authorities.

Chief executives have an important responsibility for ensuring that their council acts as corporate parents to the children in their care and that all council departments play their part in the implementation of Quality Protects. Chief executives are required to approve the Quality Protects Management action plan and to ensure that it is not seen solely as a Social Services document.

As part of the Quality Protects programme the Department for Education and Employment and the Department of Health have jointly drafted guidance on the education of children looked after by local authorities. This is specifically aimed at assisting local authorities in their role of corporate parent to promote and support the education of their looked-after children.

Elected councillors have a vital role to play in ensuring that Quality Protects has the corporate commitment needed to deliver good life chances for vulnerable children. The Government in partnership with the Local Government Association have recently sent a Guide on Quality Protects to all councillors reminding them of their corporate parent responsibilities and giving guidance on their role in implementing Quality Protects.

We believe that local authorities' responsibilities towards young people in and leaving care should correspond more closely to those of responsible parents. That means providing more support and assistance for children beyond the age of 16. The Children (Leaving Care) Bill, which had its Second Reading in the House of Lords on 7 December, will change the system to give young people the support they need and deserve in preparing for and leaving care. Young people in and leaving care should be able to expect this from their corporate parent.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what resources the Government are planning to set aside to provide training for foster carers and residential care staff about the education system and on ensuring that children in their care are in appropriate education. [100721]

Mr. Hutton: We are providing £2 million funding through a sub-programme in the training support programme (TSP) in 1999–2000 for training foster carers, with emphasis being put on the attainment of level 3 of the National Vocational Qualification (NVQ) Award "Caring for Children and Young People". This award contains a unit of competence entitled "Promote and Maximise Educational Opportunities and Achievements for Individual Children and Young People", which describes best practice in supporting children and young people to sustain and/or access educational or learning opportunities, or return to education. It is intended to continue this sub-programme for the next two years at the same rate.

The TSP also includes a £2.5 million sub-programme for residential child care staff to attain their level 3 NVQ in the "Caring for Children and Young People" award. This programme will also continue for the following two years but will rise to £3 million next year.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of this year's school leavers who are looked after by local authorities are in (a) further or continuing education, (b) employment and (c) training. [100737]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the education of looked-after children is not currently collected centrally. The Department has established a new statistical collection to obtain information of this kind from local authorities in England. The first figures will be published during 2001.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many looked-after children (a) have statements, (b) are placed in day special schools, (c) are placed in residential schools and (d) are in schools for children with educational and behavioural difficulties. [100733]

Mr. Hutton: At 31 March 1999, about 1,000 looked-after children were placed in residential schools. Information on the numbers of looked after children attending day special schools or schools for educationally and behaviourally difficult children is not collected centrally. The Department has established a new statistical collection to obtain information on outcome indicators for looked-after children, including the numbers with statements of special educational needs. The first figures will be published during 2001.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many local authorities have a designated post with responsibility for the education of looked-after children. [100736]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what targets, including GCSE targets, the Government are setting for looked-after children. [100619]

Mr. Hutton: We have set National Priority Performance Target no. xiii:

> "Improve the educational attainment of children looked after by local authorities, by increasing to at least 50 per cent. by 2001 the proportion of children leaving care at 16 or later with at least a General Certificate of Secondary Education or General National Vocational Qualification; and to 75 per cent. by 2003".

The Quality Protects programme sets out national objectives for improving children's services. Objective 4 focuses on improving the educational outcomes for children looked after

> "to ensure that children looked after gain maximum life chance benefits from educational opportunities, health care and social care".

There are a number of sub-objectives towards bringing the overall performance of looked-after children in National Curriculum tests closer into line with local children generally.

The Department has established three new statistical collections to obtain information about the education, training and employment of looked-after children, both while they are in care and after they have left care. The first figures on educational attainment will be published in the autumn of 2000.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps the Government plan to take to reduce the number of moves in care for looked-after children. [100732]

Mr. Hutton: We are committed to ensuring that children should have as stable an experience as possible while looked after by local authorities. Stability of carer is essential for a child to have a successful outcome from care. The three-year Quality Protects programme, launched in September 1998, has as one of its key objectives to increase the choice of adoption, foster and residential placements for looked-after children because, without a good choice, inappropriate placements are made, which result in placement breakdown. Placement choice is a priority area for expenditure of the children's social services special grant in 1999–2000 and remains a priority for 2000–01. A significant target which we set out in the National Priorities Guidance is for local authorities to ensure that the number of children looked after who have three or more placements does not exceed 16 per cent. by 2001.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps the Government are taking to ensure that local authorities have adequate data on the educational achievements attained and choices post-16 of looked-after children. [100734]

Mr. Hutton: One of the projects within the Quality Protects programme is working with local authorities to determine their basic information requirements for managing and planning children's services. This is exploring both the specification of the data requirements and the systems used to collect and analyse them. Information on the educational attainment of children looked after, and indeed children in need more generally, will certainly be included along with other outcome measures of children's welfare. The improvement of management information is one of the priorities for expenditure of the children's social services special grant.

Children in Care (Kent)

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children were placed for foster care in Kent by each London borough in the last year for which figures are available; and what the equivalent figures were for the last three years. [101720]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not available centrally. The Department is aware, however, that Kent county council is reporting difficulties with the availability of sufficient foster placements, and one possible factor is the number of looked-after children being placed in Kent by London boroughs. The social services inspectorate is currently discussing this issue with directors of social services in London.

The Department has introduced a range of initiatives to improve the recruitment and retention of foster carers nationally. Through the Quality Protects programme a key objective is to increase the choice of adoption, foster and residential placements for children in care. Significant additional moneys have been made available to local authorities to increase the level of training for foster carers, and we have also recently announced the development of a national advertising campaign to recruit more foster carers.

Mental Health Act Detainees (Deaths)

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Mental Health Act Commission will publish data on the deaths of detained patients; and if he will make a statement. [101065]

Mr. Hutton: Validation of the data for the first two years of systematic collection—February 1997 to January 1999—has taken longer than expected and is still ongoing. The numbers involved in this study are very small for statistical purposes. A preliminary review of the data has indicated that adding a third year's data—February 1999 to January 2000—will increase the strength of the data considerably and increase the possibility that general conclusions may be drawn from the overall study. The Mental Health Act Commission aims to publish a report on the deaths of detained patients by May 2000.

Strokes

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many individuals were treated by each specialist stroke unit in each of the last five years; and what is the average cost for treating an individual in a specialist unit; [100868]

(2) what percentage of those who are registered disabled are disabled as a result of a stroke. [100871]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested.

The Effective Health Care Bulletin of March 1992 on stroke rehabilitation shows that 100,000 first strokes occur in Britain each year. We do not collect figures for the numbers of strokes which cause disability but not death; however, in broad terms there are around 120,000 people in the United Kingdom each year who have a stroke, there are about 56,000 deaths, and of those who survive beyond four weeks about half are left with a significant disability.

NHS Dentistry (Bolton)

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will pilot the phone and go National Health Service dental access centres in Bolton. [101318]

Mr. Hutton: Expressions of interest for the third wave of phone and go dental access centres are currently being considered. There are no plans at present to pilot a centre in Bolton.

Care Homes

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to ensure that registration authorities for care homes will be required to (a) list staff registered with the General Social Care Council and (b) list staff not registered with the General Social Care Council, in annual inspection reports published by registration authorities; [101899]

(2) when he proposes to place proposed legislation for his General Social Care Council before the House; and when he plans for it to become operational; [101901]

(3) if he will create a new quality standard mark that care homes can display in their promotional material to indicate that all staff are registered with a national organisation; [101898]

(4) what duty will be imposed on managers of care homes to register their staff with his planned General Social Care Council. [101900]

Mr. Hutton: The Care Standards Bill, which includes legislative proposals for the General Social Care Council, was introduced into another place on 2 December 1999. We intend to establish the General Social Care Council on 1 April 2001.

We intend that the General Social Care Council will have the power to open a register for social care staff. In order to register with the Council an individual worker will need to have completed satisfactorily a period of training approved by the Council and to have satisfied the Council as to his or her being otherwise competent and safe to practice in social care.

When the Government believe that it will be a further safeguard to the public to restrict certain jobs to workers who are registered with the Council my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will seek to make regulations for that purpose. Meanwhile there are no plans to offer a logo that can be displayed by care homes to indicate that staff are registered with the Council. The Care Standards Bill also contains proposals to create the National Care Standards Commission to register and regulate care homes. Registration with the Commission will be an appropriate indication that standards of quality are being monitored in a care home by a Government-sponsored body.

There are no plans to include information about staff registered with the General Social Care Council in inspection reports by the National Care Standards Commission.

Agency Nurses

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much the NHS paid for agency nurses in 1998–99, broken down by NHS region. [101968]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

SCOTLAND

GM Food

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the research funded by his Department into genetically modified food and crops giving (a) the research project title, (b) the project reference number, (c) the research contractors, (d) the date on which the research was completed or is due to be completed and (e) the date on which the results will be published. [101754]

Dr. Reid: The specific matters raised are devolved and are now for the Scottish Parliament.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Primary Education

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she plans to meet Government leaders of developing countries to discuss their commitment to improving primary education. [100872]

Clare Short: We are committed to the International Development Targets of achieving universal primary education by 2015 and gender equality in primary and secondary schooling by 2005. In my meetings with representatives of developing country governments, I take every opportunity to discuss their commitment to, and progress in, achieving these targets.

I will participate in the World Forum on Education in Dakar next April and will try to ensure that we make the most of this opportunity to reaffirm the commitment to the world community to the educational vision and principles of Jomtien. At Dakar we will assess the progress that has been made since Jomtien and will pay particular attention to analysing why some countries, including some of the poorest, have managed to achieve considerably more than others. We hope to achieve a strong commitment from the North and the South to the implementation of strategies for achieving effective education for all by 2015.

EC Reconstruction Programmes

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what is her policy on the establishment of an agency charged with the implementation of European Community reconstruction programmes, as set out in the Cologne Presidency Conclusions. [101106]

Clare Short: My Department's policy is to encourage the EC to devolve more authority from Brussels to its overseas delegations. This should improve the EC's responsiveness to beneficiary countries and its co-ordination with other donors. I therefore fully support the establishment of an EC agency responsible for the delivery of long-term reconstruction assistance to Kosovo. This agency will have its operational centre in Pristina and administrative headquarters in Thessaloniki. We will monitor the agency to ensure that it is effective and based on sound economic principles.

Southern Africa

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what funding her Department has provided to the regional action programme on small arms in southern Africa. [101928]

Clare Short: Last year we funded a seminar which drafted the regional action programme on small arms, subsequently endorsed by US/SADC Ministers in Vienna.

We have also made a grant of up to £80,000 available to Saferworld and the South African Institute for Security Studies to enable them to help all interested parties in taking this programme forward.

We will continue to support the effort to reduce the number of small arms in Southern Africa.

Commonwealth Development Corporation

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on progress towards creation of the Commonwealth Development Corporation public private partnership. [102476]

Clare Short: CDC was transformed into a public limited company (with the name "CDC Group plc") on 8 December. I will place copies of the company's memorandum and articles of association, and of its investment policy and statement of business principles, in the Library of the House.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Entry Clearance Officers

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what audit is done on the performance and operation of entry clearance officers in British embassies and consulates. [101910]

Mr. Vaz: The performance and operation of individual entry clearance officers (ECOs) in overseas Posts is assessed in the first instance by their Entry Clearance Managers (ECMs). ECMs are required to review all refusal decisions taken by ECOs within 24 hours, and to review a percentage of visas issued within a defined timescale.

In common with all FCO staff, ECOs, both UK based and locally engaged, receive annual appraisals of performance which are carried out by Line Managers.

As part of the overall management of the entry clearance operation overseas, the FCO's Migration and Visa Division (MVD) monitors key performance indicators from data sent by overseas posts in monthly and annual statistical returns.

The data allow the Division to monitor and analyse Posts' and ECO's performance to ensure that best use is being made of available resources.

In addition, MVD carries out operational reviews of Entry Clearance Sections. These, together with Reviews carried out by Internal Audit teams and the Management Consultancy Service of the FCO, provide a further means of monitoring the performance of Entry Clearance staff and Posts.

The Independent Monitor (Asylum and Appeals Act 1993), Dame Elizabeth Anson DBE, JP, DL, also carries out independent checks of applications refused which do not carry a right of appeal. Her Annual Report is laid before Parliament.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what training is made available to foreign nationals working in the entry clearance offices of British embassies and consulates. [101911]

Mr. Vaz: All entry clearance officers, regardless of nationality, attend an initial three week training course in London.

Locally engaged clerical staff and other support staff receive desk training in their overseas Posts supplemented by distance learning packages supplied by the FCO. Many also benefit from attendance on our three day regional training courses conducted in all regions of the world on a three year cycle by visiting training staff from London. Where numbers merit it, separate training is provided for interpreters.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Tony Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of whether investing in the National Ignition Facility is consistent with Britain's obligations under (a) the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and (b) the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty; and if he will make a statement. [102130]

Mr. Hain: HMG are fully committed to fulfilling our obligations under the NPT and the CTBT. This investment is fully consistent with those obligations and will ensure that the United Kingdom has the capability to underwrite the integrity of our nuclear warheads without recourse to nuclear testing.

Mr. Tony Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he had with colleagues prior to the Government's decision to invest in the National Ignition Facility; and if he will make a statement. [102129]

Mr. Hain: None. The decision to invest in the National Ignition Facility was taken by the Secretary of State for Defence.

Ghana

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made on human rights issues to the Government of Ghana in the last two years; and if he will make a statement. [101974]

Mr. Hain: Over the last two years, we have regularly raised our concerns over the Trokosi system with the Ghanaian Government and with the Ghanaian High Commissioner in the UK. We maintain contact with the Commissioner for Human Rights and Administrative Justice in Ghana and have supported projects promoting human rights. We continue to monitor the human rights situation and welcome information from NGOs on human rights in Ghana.

Departmental Salaries

Mr. Grieve: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what currency the total of each salary paid to employees of his Department is expressed on his Department's computer systems. [102066]

Mr. Hain: Details of salaries paid to UK based staff are not held on the FCO's computer systems. Salary calculations are carried out by use of a private sector bureau. Employee pay slips show net salaries in sterling and the equivalent Euro amount.

Arms Brokers

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Ministry of Defence on the establishment of an arms broker company list; and if he will make a statement. [101925]

Mr. Hain: The Government are considering the question of controls on the involvement of UK persons in the trafficking or brokering of arms and other goods controlled for strategic reasons as part of the review of the proposals in the White Paper on Strategic Export Controls of July 1998, in the light of comments made by respondents to the White Paper. The Government will announce proposals for new export control legislation following conclusion of the review.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning last month's meeting of the Working Group on Arms Exports on the issue of the control of arms brokers. [101927]

Mr. Hain: The CFSP Working Group on Conventional Arms Exports met on 25 November and discussed a range of issues relating to arms transfers, including possible controls on trafficking and brokering. There was widespread recognition of the need for EU member states to give serious attention to the problem of trafficking and brokering. Member states also acknowledged, however, the potential difficulties of uniform EU-wide action, given their different national approaches to regulation of the arms trade and to the question of extraterritorial legislation, as well as the need to consider the inter-pillar implications of any new controls. The Working Group agreed to exchange further views on how to take forward discussion of this issue under the Portuguese Presidency. The UK will continue to play a constructive role.

Indonesia

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Indonesian Government regarding West Papua and Aceh. [101924]

Mr. Battle: We maintain a regular dialogue with the Indonesian Government through which we discuss a range of issues, including the situations in Irian Jaya and Aceh. Our Embassy in Jakarta monitors closely events in Irian Jaya and Aceh, including by periodic visits to the provinces. Teams from the Embassy last visited Irian Jaya and Aceh on 25 November-2 December and 22–24 November respectively, where they met senior officials, opposition leaders, non-governmental organisations and human rights groups. I last met the Ambassador on 25 November and discussed these matters with him.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

General Commissioners of Income Tax

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department for what reasons the Acton and Kensington Advisory Committee on Appointment of General Commissioners of Income Tax has been without a chairman since 1997. [101724]

Jane Kennedy: The Acton and Kensington Advisory Committee on General Commissioners of Income Tax has been without a chairman since 1997 following the failure of the Committee to recommend a successor. The work of the Committee is being undertaken by the Lord Chancellor's Department while arrangements for the future are being considered.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many general commissioners of income tax there were in the Acton and Kensington area on (a) 1 April 1996, (b) 1 April 1997, (c) 1 April 1998 and (d) 1 April 1999. [101725]

Jane Kennedy: The number of general commissioners of income tax in the Acton and Kensington area on the dates specified were:

1 April 1996—40

1 April 1997—40

1 April 1998—40

1 April 1999—39.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many of the advisory committees on appointment of general commissioners of income tax in England and Wales are without chairmen. [101726]

Jane Kennedy: There are three without chairmen: Dyfed Ceredigion Advisory Committee, Acton and Kensington Advisory Committee and Westminster and Southwark Advisory Committee.

Bilateral Concordat (Scotland)

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he expects to publish the bilateral concordat between the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Scottish Executive. [102478]

Jane Kennedy: I am pleased to announce that my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor and the Deputy First Minister and Minister for Justice have agreed the text of the Concordat between the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Scottish Executive. Copies of the Concordat have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses, and the text is available on the Lord Chancellor's Department website (www.open.gov.uk/lcd—see 'What's New?').

I hope that the Concordat will mark the beginning of a fruitful and co-operative working relationship between the Department and the Executive.

PRIME MINISTER

Rural Economies

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Prime Minister when he will publish the Performance and Innovation Unit's report on rural economies. [102550]

The Prime Minister: The Performance and Innovation Unit report "Rural Economies" will be published tomorrow and copies will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

CABINET OFFICE

Task Forces

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what rules apply to the selection and conduct of appointees to Government Task Forces. [100893]

Mr. Stringer: Task Forces are set up to report on a specific issue within a specified timescale. There are no formal rules relating to the selection and conduct of appointees. Members are drawn from the public and private sectors, and are appointed for their particular knowledge, hands-on experience and/or expertise.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what has been the cost of setting up and servicing the Task Forces established by the Government since 2 May 1997. [100895]

Mr. Stringer: The information requested is not held centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Individual Ministers are responsible for decisions to establish Task Forces within their area of responsibility. In most cases, members of Task Forces are unpaid with Departments meeting out-of-pocket expenses only.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) how many Task Forces have been set up since 2 May 1997; [100896]

(2) if she will list by department the names of people appointed to sit on Task Forces established since 2 May 1997. [100894]

Mr. Stringer: Details of Task Forces established since May 1997 have been deposited in the Library. Those Task Forces which are classified as Non-Departmental Public Bodies are excluded from the table as information on them is published in the annual "Public Bodies" publication. The table provides the name of the Chairman of individual Task Forces as well as a breakdown of membership between the private, public and voluntary sectors. More detailed information on the individuals appointed to each Task Force is not held centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

TREASURY

Financial Services (Self-regulation)

Mr. Love: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many financial services company staff have been disciplined by the regulator in each of the last 10 years; how many of those staff lost their employment as a result; and if he will make a statement. [99640]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The number of individuals disciplined by the self-regulatory organisations since 1990 are as follows:

Calendar year	Number
1990	3
1991	5
1992	13
1993	10
1994	34
1995	22
1996	38
1997	35
1998	24
1999 (to date)	17
Total	201

Formal disciplinary action against individuals by the self-regulatory organisations can take several forms. These include public reprimand, fine, imposition of conditions on employment or termination or suspension of an individual's personal registration.

These numbers do not include instances of shortcomings among other staff which have been dealt with by other internal corrective procedures within their employer firms. Such action can, for instance, include retraining or even dismissal. The regulators do not monitor the number of staff dismissed as a result of their disciplinary action.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact on tax revenues of the national minimum wage. [101304]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 6 December 1999]: The Government have provided evidence to the Low Pay Commission, which is due to report by the end of the year on the initial impact of the National Minimum Wage. A copy of this evidence is available in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many people he estimates have benefited from the national minimum wage in (a) Scotland, (b) Wales, (c) Bristol, (d) Greater London, (e) Cornwall, (f) the West Country and (g) Cumbria; [101302]

(2) how many public sector workers have benefited from the national minimum wage. [101303]

(3) how many unskilled workers he estimates have benefited from the national minimum wage. [101306]

(4) how many families he estimates have benefited from the national minimum wage. [101305]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answers 6 December 1999]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Jim Murphy, dated 9 December 1999:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your four recent parliamentary questions about people who have benefited from the national minimum wage. I am replying in Dr. Holt's absence.

Definitive estimates on the number of people that have benefited from the national minimum wage are not yet available. Currently available estimates for assessing the effect take data from both the New Earnings Survey and the Labour Force Survey and adjust them for known limitations in each. However, the latest adjusted estimates are based on data for the spring (March—May) 1999 Labour Force Survey and this period spans the introduction date for the national minimum wage legislation. As a result, the adjusted estimates may be giving a misleading picture of the effect of the minimum wage legislation since employees might legitimately have been earning below the minimum wage rates in March 1999.

The currently available estimates were published in an ONS First Release on 14 October and show that the number of people earning below the minimum wage rates fell significantly between 1998 and 1999. A copy of this first release will be available in the House of Commons Library.

Funerals

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to regulate the pre-payment of funerals. [102122]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Treasury is still considering the responses to the consultation it held earlier this year and will announce its decision in due course.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many public interest immunity certificates each Treasury Minister has signed since May 1997 (a) in respect of and (b) at the request of, which Department, board and agency; and on what dates. [101812]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Treasury Ministers have signed no public interest immunity certificates since May 1997.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many top rate taxpayers will be eligible to receive the Working Families Tax Credit in the next financial year; [101810]

(2) how many households with an income of over £25,000 will be eligible to receive the Working Families Tax Credit in the next financial year. [101813]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 419W.

Taxation (Administrative Costs)

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the administration costs associated with collecting VAT in each of the last five years. [101906]

Dawn Primarolo: The administrative costs of collecting VAT are shown in the published Annual Report of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, at Table B, and are described as the "Cost of Collection of VAT". The costs given include running and non running costs and are net of Appropriations in Aid.

The figures for 1994–95 are shown in the Annual Report for the year ending March 1996. 1995–96 and 1996–97 figures are shown in the Annual Report for the year ending March 1997. 1997–98 and 1998–99 figures are shown in the Annual Report for the year ending March 1999.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the administration costs to the Inland Revenue, incurred in assessing eligibility for each (a) income tax and (b) corporation tax (i) relief, (ii) threshold and (iii) allowance in each of the last five years. [101907]

Dawn Primarolo: Breakdowns of the administrative costs are not readily available in the detail requested.

Details of the total costs of administering the Inland Revenue Department can be found on p.53 of the Board of Inland Revenue's Annual Report and the costs of administering each of Income Tax and Corporation Tax, expressed as a ratio of the tax collected can be found in Table 1 (p.33) of the Report.

A copy of the Annual Report can be found in the Library.

Tax Allowances

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to the Treasury in the (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98 tax years of the individual basic tax allowance. [101904]

Dawn Primarolo: The costs of the income tax personal allowance in 1996–97 and 1997–98 were published in table 1.6 of the 1997 and 1998 editions of "Inland Revenue Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library. These figures exclude the costs of the extra element for those aged 65 and over and do not cover individuals who are not on Inland Revenue records because their income is below the personal allowance.

Bilateral Concordats

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to publish the bilateral concordats between his Department, the Scottish Executive and the Cabinet of the National Assembly for Wales. [102477]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I am pleased to announce that the texts of the Concordats between the Treasury and the Scottish Executive, and the Treasury and the Cabinet of the National Assembly for Wales, have been agreed between the parties. Copies have today been placed in the Libraries of both Houses, and the texts will be available on the Treasury's website.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the most recent meeting of the Standing Committee on Preparations for EMU. [102549]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The most recent meeting of the Standing Committee took place on 18 November 1999. I have arranged for copies of the minutes to be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Ghana

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the level of (a) bilateral, (b) private sector and (c) multi-lateral debts with Ghana for each of the past five years; and of this what proportion has been (i) written off and (ii) repaid. [101975]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The World Bank publication "Global Development Finance: Country Tables 1999" gives the following figures on Ghanaian debt for 1993, 1994, 1995, 1996 and 1997. The latest available year data are not provided on debt write off.

Figures US$ million

	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997
Level of debt
Bilateral	916	1,060	1,140	1,121	1,075
Private Sector	308	387	450	430	437
Multi-lateral	2,404	2,700	2,971	3,118	3,179

Amount US$ million

	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997
Principal repayments
Bilateral	27	50	43	46	34
Private Sector	47	61	80	98	108
Multi-lateral	41	51	73	54	51
Interest repayments
Bilateral	28	27	12	35	27
Private Sector	14	19	6	27	26
Multi-lateral	41	35	40	42	40

Small Businesses

Helen Jackson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact of recent tax announcements on small businesses. [100539]

Dawn Primarolo: The effects of the tax announcements are shown in the relevant tables of the Red Book. A number of these measures are of particular benefit to small businesses.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 340

SESSION 1999–2000

29th November—9th December 1999

Printed indexes to Hansard

The volume index is one of three printed indexes to Commons Hansard produced from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Indexing Service (POLIS). It contains references to material in the bound volumes of Hansard. The other indexes produced are:

- The fortnightly index to Hansard. This covers the same date range as the volume index but references are to the column numbering in the daily parts and weekly edition of Hansard.
- The sessional index to Hansard. This contains references to material in the bound volumes for a whole session.

Indexes on the Parliamentary website

Fortnightly, volume and sessional indexes covering material from the beginning of the 1999/2000 session will also appear on the Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk with links to the full text of Hansard.

SCOPE

The indexes include entries covering:

- The content of all material recorded in Hansard, including debates, procedural motions and questions.
- The names of all Members contributing to the Parliamentary business recorded in Hansard.
- The names of some types of Parliamentary business whenever they occur in Hansard. These are 'Ministerial statements', 'Business statements', 'Opposition days' and 'Estimates days'.

ARRANGEMENT

- All headings are in one word-by-word alphabetical sequence, with Members' contribution entries distinguished from other entries by italics.
- Where a Member contributes to Parliamentary business and is the subject of Parliamentary business there are separate contribution and subject entries, the subject entry coming first.
- Entries beginning 'Mac' and 'Mc' are sorted in one sequence as 'Mac'.
- 'St', when abbreviated for Saint, is filed as 'Saint'.
- Numbers are filed as if spelt out, e.g. '10 Downing Street' as if 'Ten Downing Street'.

HEADINGS

Choice of headings

- Specificity—Entries summarise the overall content of a debate or question as specifically as the various POLIS thesauruses allow. For example, Education, Higher education, Universities or the name of a particular university is used depending on the breadth of the item.
- Name headings—Specific entries are included for the names of people, places, institutions, organisations, committees, programmes, initiatives, publications and legislation when these constitute the overall subject of an item.
- Organisations and subjects—Organisation entries are preferred for material about the general performance, administration and staffing of an organisation (for example, United Kingdom Passports Agency, Standards). Subject entries are preferred for what organisations do as part of their duties (for example, Passports, Fees and charges).

Geographical coverage

- Subject headings—Subject headings are assumed to refer to the whole of England, Great Britain or the United Kingdom unless otherwise stated.
- Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales—Material relating to the whole of Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales is indexed under these headings.
- Places within the UK—Material about specific towns, areas and institutions is entered under the name of the specific town, area or institution.
- Foreign countries—Most material relating to foreign countries is collected under the name of that country. Some additional material may be found under the names of—groups of countries, areas within countries, geographical features, place names associated with particular issues, politicians and heads of state, international bodies, and institutions and companies operating in those countries.
- EC/EU material—General material about the European Communities and European institutions as bodies is entered under 'European Communities' and 'EC institutions'. Organisational material about specific communities and institutions is entered under the name of the body, for example 'European Coal and Steel Community' or 'European Parliament'. Material about what the Communities and institutions are doing or propose to do is entered under various subject headings beginning 'EC' such as 'EC environmental policy'.

Parliamentary material and business

- Material about Parliament—This is indexed under 'Parliament', the names of the two Houses, the 'Palace of Westminster' and parts of the Parliamentary estate (such as 'Portcullis House').
- Committees—Material about committees is indexed under 'Committees', types of committee (such as 'Select committees') and the names of individual committees (such as 'Home Affairs Select Committee').
- Parliamentary proceedings/procedures—Material discussing these is indexed under the specific type of proceeding (such as 'Parliamentary questions' or 'Oral questions'), procedure (such as 'Calling of Members') or issue (such as 'Unparliamentary expressions').
- Legislation—Entries for Parliamentary proceedings on bills and statutory instruments are entered under their titles. Where the lead word of the bill or statutory instrument does not provide a full or clear indication of the subject there are additional subject entries when the bill or instrument is debated. For example, debates on the 'Child Support Pensions and Social Security Bill' have entries under 'Pensions' and 'Social security benefits' as well as under the title of the Bill.
- Members' names—These are given in the form by which the Member prefers to be known.
- Speaker and Chair—Contributions by the Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker and deputies'. Contributions from the chair during Committees of the Whole House are brought together under 'Chairman of Committee of the Whole House'. Significant rulings and statements (as opposed to routine comments) are indicated by the sub-heading 'Rulings and statements' in both cases.

Guidance on headings

- Cross references—'See' references indicate all the material has been entered under another heading. 'See also' references indicate that additional information may be found under another heading.
- Concept thesaurus—A copy of the subject thesaurus to POLIS, listing the concept entries used in the index, is available on the Parliamentary website. A hard copy is available from the Head of the POLIS Unit, House of Commons Library, 1 Derby Gate, London, SW1A 2DG (020 7219 6456).

REFERENCES

- References in the indexes are to columns rather than pages.
- References to debates, but not questions, are accompanied by the date of the item.
- There are separate sequences in Hansard for the material taken on the floor of the House, Westminster Hall sittings and written questions:
  - References consisting of a number by itself indicate material taken on the floor of the House.
  - References ending in 'wh' indicate Westminster Hall sittings.
  - References ending in 'w' indicate written questions.
- References under all headings except the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in one numerical sequence irrespective of whether the material is taken on the floor of the House, is discussed at a Westminster Hall sitting or is a written question.
- References under the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in numerical sequence under the following headings:
  - Debates etc. (which includes interventions and points of order as well as significant contributions to debates);
  - Sittings in Westminster Hall (covering all debates held as part of the Westminster Hall sittings); and
  - Questions (which includes written, oral and private notice questions).

ABBREVIATIONS

The following abbreviations are used in connection with the progress of bills:

- 1R=First reading
- 2R=Second reading
- Com=Committee stage
- Rep=Report stage
- 3R=Third reading
- res=resolution
- amendt(s)=amendment(s)
- *=matter taken formally without debate or division.
